A gift to children who attain twenty-one, or to such children as attain twenty-one, is a gift to a contingent class, and will only vest in those who attain twenty-one, though there may be a gift of interest or other circumstances, which, in a gift to a class upon a contingency, as, for instance, to children at twenty-one, might have the effect of vesting the bequest.¹ Under a gift to a class when the youngest attains twenty-one, all who attain twenty-one take vested interests.² And if there is a clear gift to the class, a direction that the fund is to be divided when the youngest child attains twenty-one, will not postpone vesting.³ If the income is given to the class till the youngest attains twenty-one, and then the principal, they all take vested interests.⁴ It is said to be a rule of construction that any provision in regard to a particular member of a class affecting or defining the time of vesting, or tending to determine whether the estate was intended to be vested or contingent, should be applied to all the members of the class, although the rule is not of universal application.⁵

(8) Residuary Bequests.—The fact that the gift is residuary, strengthens the presumption in favor of vesting, since intestacy may be the consequence of holding it contingent.⁶

(9) Foregoing Rules Yield to a Clear Contrary Intent.—The foregoing rules apply only in the absence of an intent to the contrary. Hence, if it is clear, from the language of the will, that the attainment of the specified age is a condition precedent to the vesting, the legacy will be contingent, notwithstanding the gift is distinct from the direction to pay. Thus, a gift to A, to be paid in case he reaches the age of twenty-one and not otherwise, is contingent.¹ So where there is an express direction as to the time of vesting, all questions of construction are out of the case.²

(10) Gift of Interest to A for Life, and at His Death, the Principal to B.—A gift of the interest of a fund to one for life, and at his death, of the principal to another, gives the latter a vested interest, transmissible to his representatives, in case he dies before the life-tenant. Under such a limitation, the distinction between time annexed to the gift, and time annexed to the payment, is unimportant, as all the interests vest together. The same principle obviously applies to any number of life estates.³

"In many cases, however, 'vested' has been used as equivalent to indefeasible or payable. Thus, if the shares of members of a class are directed to be vested at a certain time, and there is a gift over to the other members of the class of the shares of those dying before that time, without issue, vested will mean payable. Taylor v. Frobisher, 5 De G. & S. 191. So, too, if legatees are treated as taking vested shares before the time fixed for vesting, vested must mean payable. This will be the case, if a time is appointed for vesting, and maintenance is given, if any child entitled on the death of the tenant for life to a vested or presumptive share should be under the age appointed for vesting, where the word presumptive refers to the possibility of accruer. Berkeley v. Swinburne, 16 Sim. 275; Baxter's Trust, 4 N. R. 131; 10 Jur. N. S. 485. Similarly, if, in the event of any child dying before the time of vesting, leaving children, there is a gift of the share such child would have had, if living, to his issue, the direction as to vesting will be referred to payment. In re Edmondson's Estate, L. R., 5 Eq. 389; Poole v. Bott, 11 Hare 33. Or, again, it may appear that the testator has used the terms 'vested' and 'paid' interchangeably. In re Edmondson's Estate, L. R., 5 Eq. 389;

Williams v. Haythorne, L. R., 6 Ch. 782; In re Parr's Trust, 41 L. J. Ch. 170. And when there is a direction to pay legacies at the death of the tenant for life, a subsequent direction as to vesting at twenty-one will be referred to indefeasible vesting or possession. Barnet v. Barnet, 29 Beav. 239; Simpson v. Peach, L. R., 16 Eq. 209. When there is a gift to children who survive their parent, a direction as to vesting will not make the gift vest in any who do not survive their parent. In re Payne, 25 Beav. 556; Williams v. Haythorne, L. R., 6 Ch. 782. See Draycott v. Wood, 5 W. R. 158. If, however, the proviso as to vesting is intended to introduce a new gift, evidenced by the fact, for instance, that it applies to prior legatees who die leaving issue, and not merely to such of them as survive the tenant for life, it will override the previous contingency of surviving the tenants for life. Williams v. Russell, 10 Jur. N. S. 168. A direction that legatees are to be beneficially interested at a certain period, refers only to vesting in possession. M'Lachlan v. Taitt, 28 Beav. 407; 2 De G. (11) Direction to Pay at Specified Time.—A legacy to be paid at a specified time in the future, which is sure to arrive eventually, as one year after the death of the life tenant, is not thereby made contingent.¹

d. VESTING OF LEGACIES CHARGED ON LAND.—The vesting of legacies charged on land is governed by principles derived from the common law, and the distinction between a clear gift distinct from the direction to pay, and a gift contained in the direction to pay or divide, does not exist. In the absence of an intent to the contrary, such legacies, whether given at twenty-one, or payable at twenty-one, or other future time, and whether interest be given meantime or not, do not vest until the time appointed for payment,² unless the postponement is for the convenience of the

In Van Wyck v. Bloodgood, 1 Bradf. (N.Y.) 167, where the authorities are reviewed, Bradford, Surrogate, said: There is a large class of cases, to which no exception exists, where, by the terms of the gift, the time is connected with some event to happen to the donee, such as marriage or puberty, so as to make a description of the person who is to take, and necessarily to imply, that if the legatee does not sustain the character, the legacy will fail. (Dawson v. Killet, 1 Bro. C. C. 119.) Death, in such a case, before the event occurs, in removing the legatee, prevents the happening of the event, and the completion or fulfillment of the description. Such legacies are palpably conditional from the very nature of the case, because the life of the beneficiary is involved and included in the very contingency specified; so that the contingency does not transpire because the legatee dies. But where the time is not connected with an act to be done by, or an event to happen to the legatee, but, on the contrary, with some independent occurrence, such as the death of another person, that being a thing which must happen, and the time, therefore, being in that sense certain, there would seem to be nothing in the mere specification of such a future time, which in itself implies a condition."

Hence, a legacy to take effect upon the life tenant's "decease or remarriage," is vested. Williams v. Freeman, 98 N.Y. 577; Scofield v. Olcott, 120 Ill. 362; Thrasher v. Ingram, 32 Ala. 646.

Thus, a devise of real estate to the widow until the testator's eldest son is twenty-one, was then followed by a devise of a farm to said son, subject to bequests of $1,000 each to the three daughters of the testator, "the interest on which shall be paid them by my said son, from his maturity until they shall respectively marry or attain the age of twenty-one years, at which times, or within six months thereafter, he shall pay to each, as she marries, or arrives at that age, the sum of five hundred dollars, and the remaining five hundred within eighteen months after her marriage or maturity, and these sums and the interest I charge upon the land given to my son." It was held upon a suit brought by the administrator of one of the daughters, who was two years older than the said son, but died unmarried and before she had attained the age of twenty-one, that the devise was vested and its payment deferred by the provisions of the will, with a view to the convenience of the estate and not in respect of the person of the legatee. O'Byrne v. O'Byrne, 9 Md. 512.

Testator Devised as Follows:—"It is my will and desire that my property, including lands, tenements, negroes, horses, and stock of every kind, and everything of value that I may die seised and possessed of, shall be equally divided between my wife, E., my daughter, E. W., and my son, R." It was held that this clause of the will conveyed a present gift to the legatees, and was not controlled by the next clause, in which the testator used the following language: "It is my will and desire that all my property be kept together for the use and benefit of my said wife and children, unless my wife should marry, or my children become of age, in which event or events, I wish the property divided as above;" the sole effect of the latter clause being merely to postpone the division, which postponement was for the convenience of the estate. *Young v. g. VESTING OF MIXED FUNDS.—The vesting of gifts of mixed funds is governed by the rule applicable to realty.¹

h. WHETHER A CONTINGENCY AFFECTING ONE OF THE SERIES OF LIMITATIONS AFFECTS ALL.—If the ulterior limitations are immediately consecutive on the particular contingent estate in unbroken continuity, and no intention or purpose is expressed with reference to that estate in contradistinction to the others, the whole will be considered to hinge upon the same contingency.² But where an intention or purpose is expressed with ref-

The principle applies, "although the contingency relate personally to the object of the particular estate, and therefore appears not reasonably applied to the ulterior limitations. Thus, where an estate for life is made to depend on the contingency of the object of it being alive at the period when the preceding estates determine, limitations consecutive on that estate have been held to be contingent on the same event, for want of something in the will to authorize a distinction between them."

1 Jarm. on Wills (5th ed.) *830; Davis v. Norton, 2 P. Wms. 390.

It must not be forgotten, however, that the rule is merely one of construction, and will not be followed if in conflict with the intention. Thus, in Doe v. Ford, 2 El. & Bl. 970; 75 E. C. L. 968, by marriage settlement, C., the husband, in consideration of the intended marriage and of the fortune of S., the wife, to which C. was to become entitled on the marriage, released land to the use of himself in fee until the marriage; and, after the marriage, to the use of himself for life; remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; and, after the decease of C., in case S. should survive him, to the use of S. for life; remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; and, after the decease of the survivor of C. and S., in case there should be only one child of the marriage, then living, and no other child then dead leaving issue, to the use of such child in fee; but, in case there should happen to be more than one such child living at the decease of the survivor of C. and S., or any child or children then dead leaving issue, then to the use of all such children of C. and S., and such children's children, respectively, for such estates as C. and S. should jointly appoint, and, in default of such appointment, as the survivor should appoint; and, in default of such appointment, to the use of all the children of the marriage, as tenants in common, and of the heirs of their respective bodies, with cross remainders; and "for default of all such issue," to the use of four brothers and sisters of S., as tenants in common in fee. S. survived C.; there were two children of the marriage, both of whom died, without leaving issue, in the lifetime of S. No appointments were made. It was held by Lord Campbell, C. J., Coleridge and Wightman, J.J., that the remainder to S.'s brothers and sisters took effect, as it was not a limitation in remainder after the determination of the estates given to the children, as tenants in common in tail, by the limitation immediately preceding, but was an independent limitation to take effect in case there was, at the time of the death of the survivor of C. and S., no issue in whom any of the previous limitations could vest. In this case Coleridge, J., said: "It must be admitted that this limitation follows on the preceding ones, which commence with the first particular contingent estate, in unbroken continuity; and no special purpose is mentioned with reference to it, which contradistinguishes it from them; and, therefore, it was contended that all hinged on the same contingency, and that, falling

the first, the last failed also. But it is clear that this, though the general rule, is not an inflexible one. If there be an unbroken series of limitations, commencing with one which depends on a contingency, it is not unreasonable to infer an intention to make the whole consecutive series one and entire, and therefore all depending on the first contingency. If a testator's or a settlor's language shows that, in disposing of a property, a particular contingency has been present to his mind, and that the limitations, one after another, have been framed with a view to the happening or not, as the case may be, of that event, it is reasonable to infer that that was present to his mind as a condition governing the whole; and then it must operate to prevent, or occasion, as the case may be, the arising of the last, equally with the first, or any intermediate limitation. But this proceeds on intention, not on any technical rule. The decisions will be found to proceed upon the examination, in each case, of the language, to ascertain the intention; and therefore, I think it needless to go through them. The result seems to me to be, that the links may be separated from each other, and must be, where the language of the instrument leads to the inference that the settlor so intended, and, as I said, no technical rule prevents us from giving effect to it. Now, looking at the recital and the limitations themselves in the settlement before us, it seems to me that the settlor may be understood as agreeing with his wife; first, that he and she and then their children, if any, should be provided for; but if they too should die leaving no child or child's child living at their decease, then her family should be next considered. He evidently places these as next in succession to his wife and her children; but to make the provision fail because there were no such children, is directly inconsistent with this intention; it is to make that very event defeat the limitation to them, upon the happening of which it was intended to take effect. Nay, according to this construction, the limitation in question never could take effect in any event. If there were such surviving child, then the contingency does not occur upon the happening of which alone it was, by the express language, to take effect; and if there be no such child then the construction excludes it because of the failure of that first estate. It would seem strange to adopt a rule of construction, the application of which will make the instrument inoperative in any event. Mr. Rudall almost admitted that his arguments for the plaintiff would have failed if the words had been 'for default of all such children' instead of 'issue.' That difference seems to me immaterial here; and if anything is to turn on a very nice examination of the terms, I would rather say that the settlor, by using the words 'for default of all such issue,' collects all the preceding steps of the series into one, and separates them from that which follows, making the last an alternative to the former."

M. died in the lifetime of her husband; and the question was, whether the remainders did not fail by this event; but it was held that the contingency affected her

The following distinctions have been adopted by Theobald: "When a particular estate is limited upon a contingency, and the subsequent estates are limited as remainders upon it, the contingency prima facie applies to the whole series of limitations. Doe v. Sheppard, Dougl. 75; Toldervy v. Colt, 1 Y. & C. 240, 627; 1 M. & W. 250.

"Similarly, when an interest is given to a person, and then in a certain event a different interest is given with limitations over, the contingency applies to all the subsequent limitations. Gray v. Golding, 6 Jur. N. S. 474; Cattley v. Vincent, 15 Beav. 198; Findon v. Findon, 24 Beav. 83; Lett v. Randall, 10 Sim. 112; Paylor v. Pegg, 24 Beav. 105.

"On the other hand, if the subsequent limitations, or any of them, can be looked upon as independent gifts, they will not be liable to the contingency of preceding gifts. Lethieullier v. Tracy, 3 Atk. 774; Ambly v. Boosey v. Gardener, 5 De G. M. & G. 122; Doutty v. Laver, 14 Jur. 188; Partridge v. Foster, 35 Beav. 545; In re Blight, 13 Ch. Div. 858.

"In the same way, if a particular gift is expressed to be made contingent from motives applicable to that gift only, subsequent gifts will not be contingent. Horton v. Whittaker, 1 T. R. 346.

"And if subsequent gifts can be read as given, subject to the prior limitations, they will not be liable to the contingencies of prior gifts. Sheffield v. Coventry, 2 De G. M. & G. 551. See Pearson v. Rutter, 3 De G. M. & G. 398; 6 H. L. Cas. 61; Hole v. Davies, 34 Beav. 345.

"In the same way, when there has been a gift in one event to one set of issue in fee, and upon another event to another set of issue in tail, a gift over in default of such issue may be construed as referring to a failure of all the prior limitations, and not merely as a remainder dependent upon the limitations to the second class of issue taking effect. Doe v. Ford, 2 El. & Bl. 970; 75 E. C. L. 968.

"As to whether, in a devise of Whiteacre to A and his issue, and then to B and his issue, and of Blackacre to B and his issue, and then to A and his issue, and, in default of issue of A and B, over, the ultimate gift includes both estates, see Gordon v. Gordon, L. R., 5 H. L. 254. See also Adshead v. Willetts, 29 Beav. 358." Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 477.

The subject is also discussed by Fearne Cont. Rem. 235.

When the word "item" or "likewise" is used, the effect is to make a prima facie case for disconnection from the previously expressed contingency, which the context may either maintain or refute. 1 Jarm. on Wills, § 833; Lethieullier v. Tracy, 3 Atk. 774; Paylor v. Pegg, 24 Beav. 105.

will preserve the prior interest, even if the divesting contingency happens, is a point upon which authorities differ.¹

b. OF CONSTRUING AN INTEREST TO BE ABSOLUTE RATHER THAN DEFEASIBLE.—In doubtful cases, an interest whether vested or contingent, ought, if possible, to be construed as absolute or indefeasible, in the first instance, rather than as defeasible; but if it cannot be construed to be an absolute interest in the first instance, at all events, such a construction ought to be put upon the conditional expressions which render it defeasible, as to confine their operation to as short a period as possible, so that it may become an absolute interest as soon as it can fairly be so considered.²

c. CONTINGENT INTERESTS SUBJECT TO A CONDITION SUBSEQUENT.—A contingent interest may be subject to a condition subsequent.³

"This would seem clearly deducible from the well-known rule that conditions are odious, and shall be construed strictly; a rule which would appear to apply to those conditions which are termed mixed conditions, as well as to conditions which are simply destructive. For, if it applies to conditions subsequent which are simply destructive and upon which an estate is to be defeated, and made to revert to the heir, who is favored by the law, it would seem to apply also to those conditions which are both destructive and creative, and upon which an estate is to be divested, and a new estate is to arise in favor of another person, by way of conditional limitation.

"The person claiming under a prior limitation, and his children, being of course the primary objects of the grantor's or testator's bounty or consideration, and the persons claiming under the limitation over being only secondary objects of such bounty or consideration, it is, of course, reasonable to lean in favor of the primary objects, by construing their interest to be absolute in the first instance, or as early as by fair consideration it can be considered to be so, rather than to lean in favor of the secondary objects, by construing the interest of the primary objects to be defeasible.

"The law favors the free uncontrolled use and enjoyment of property, and the power of alienation, whereas the defeasible quality of an interest tends most materially to abridge both." Smith Ex. Int., §§ 224-226.

"Similarly, an estate to arise upon a condition which cuts down a previous estate will, if possible, be construed as a remainder by looking upon the condition as forming part of the limitation of the previous estate. "Upon the same principle, the ordinary limitation to trustees to preserve contingent remainders is a vested remainder, the prior estate being looked upon as lasting till forfeiture by the prior taker. *Smith v. Trust or Charge Distinguished from Condition.—In Woodward v. Walling, 31 Iowa 533, a clause in a will was in substantially the following form: "I give and bequeath to my son, Elisha J., my real estate (describing it) during his natural life, and after his decease to descend to his heirs, provided, however, that the said Elisha J. shall provide a home for his sister, Oriel, till her marriage, and then to give her an outfit equal to what her sisters have received at their marriage, provided, however, that if the said Elisha J. does not accept of the provisions of this will within eighteen months from the date hereof, then said property to revert to his sister Oriel." Held, while by the terms of the will an estate was devised over to the daughter upon the noncompliance with the second proviso or condition by the son, that the first condition did not thus operate as a limitation upon the estate devised to him and his heirs, and therefore that a breach or non-performance of such condition did not have the effect of divesting his title under the will, but merely operated as a trust or charge upon the estate for its performance.

In this case, the court, by Beck, J., said: "There are two distinct and separate conditions embodied in the instrument; the first imposing upon the defendant the obligation to furnish to plaintiff a home and outfit; the second, that he accept the provisions of the will in eighteen months. The language under which plaintiff claims a devise over to her in case of non-performance of the condition, is so intimately and entirely coupled with the words of the last condition that it would be a great violence to the rules of our language, to make it extend to the first condition. The second condition, with the devise over, make one sentence full and complete. We know of no rule of construction, or principle of our language, which will permit us to make the adjunct of this sentence which declares the devise over to plaintiff, qualify, limit, or in any manner affect the preceding sentence containing the devise to defendant and the first condition. The devise over to plaintiff is only on condition of the failure of defendant to accept under the will. That this is the effect of the language there can be no ground on which to build a doubt; that such was the intention of the deviser cannot be questioned, for the language and structure of the will can express nothing else.

"We come now to consider the first condition. Under the rule just stated, the forfeiture of this condition, if there were a devise over dependent thereon, would divest defendant of the title. But, as we have seen there is no devise over coupled with this condition, we must then inquire whether the non-performance of the condition produces the same effect, namely, divests defendants of the title conferred by the will.

"When there is no limitation over, in a devise upon a condition, raising an estate in another upon its breach, the condition or proviso is not always construed as a limitation whereby the first estate devised may be defeated. Greenleaf's Cruise, tit. 16, ch. 2, § 34. As the intention of the testator must be followed, the estate devised upon condition will be defeated or upheld after the condition broken, as such intention may be discovered in the language and construction of the will. It appears quite plain to us, that the testator in the will before us did not intend that the estate devised to the defendant should terminate upon his failure to perform the condition first expressed. The language of the instrument fails to convey any such intention. That such intention existed we cannot presume, for the law does not favor forfeitures, and will not, by implication or construction, create them. That the intention did not exist in the mind of the testator appears quite certain, from the fact that the question was before her, and contemplated by her, and yet no such intention is expressed. The question of forfeiture of the estate on account of the non-performance of the condition we know was contemplated by the testator, because she provided for a forfeiture upon the failure of the devisee to perform another condition subsequently expressed. Here are two conditions distinctly and separately prescribed. The non-performance of one, it is declared, shall defeat the estate. But it is not so expressed as to the other. The subject of the forfeiture of the estate upon breach of conditions being in the mind of the deviser, we must presume that it was the intention of the deviser that forfeiture should extend only to the case wherein it is prescribed. Such would be the construction applied to all written instruments containing like expressions. A limitation, too, whereby an estate may be determined, must be clearly expressed in order to be enforced as such. 2 Redfield on Wills 668, § 18. It certainly ought not to rest upon construction which will do violence to the rules of our language, and is not in accord with the usual manner of expressing our intentions.

"The condition under consideration, being for the benefit of plaintiff, without any expressed intention that its breach shall work a forfeiture of the estate, should be regarded as creating a trust or charge upon the land in her favor, to be enforced as other trusts and charges, and not as a limitation upon the estate devised. This is the doctrine announced in many cases arising under similar conditions. An extended review of these cases is not called for; a simple citation of those which have come under our observation is deemed sufficient. Fox v. Phelps, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 393; Doe v. Woods, Busb. (N. Car.) 290; Taft v. Morse, 4 Met. (Mass.) 523; Ward v. Ward, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 511; Sheldon v. Purple, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 528; Hanna's Appeal, 31 Pa. St. 53; *Lockett v. It is our opinion that the first condition expressed in the will does not operate as a limitation upon the estate therein devised to defendant and his heirs, and therefore, that a breach or non-performance of such condition does not operate to divest the title held under the will." Compare Hogeboom v. Hall, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 146; Lindsey v. Lindsey, 45 Ind. 552; Hanna's Appeal, 31 Pa. St. 53.

Gifts to Executors.—A general or specific legacy given by a testator to his executors, whether under the title of executor or not, is prima facie given to them in that character, and, therefore, they are not entitled to it if they decline or are incapable of undertaking the office. Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 287; Reed v. Devaynes, 2 Cox 285; Calvert v. Sebbon, 4 Beav. 222; Hanbury v. Spooner, 5 Beav. 630; In re Hawkins' Trusts, 33 Beav. 570; Piggott v. Green, 6 Sim. 72; Slaney v. Watney, L. R., 2 Eq. 418.

In America, the rule has been recognized, although the force of the presumption is weakened by the fact that the executor is entitled to commissions. Billingslea v. Moore, 14 Ga. 370; Morris v. Kent, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 175; Rothmahler v. Myers, 4 Desaus. (S. Car.) 215. See Kirkland v. Narramore, 105 Mass. 31.

To entitle the executor to take the legacy, it is sufficient if he either prove the will, which he may do at any time before the estate is fully administered, or act as executor. Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 287; Hollingsworth v. Grasett, 15 Sim. 52; Angermann v. Ford, 29 Beav. 349; Harrison v. Rowley, 4 Ves. Jr. 212; Lewis v. Mathews, L. R., 8 Eq. 277.

In Lewis v. Mathews, L. R., 8 Eq. 281, Makins, V. C., said: "As a general rule, there must be unequivocal evidence of an intention to act, and that evidence is best given by the probate of the will."

It seems, however, that if the legacy is directed to be paid within twelve months, and there is nothing to show that the executor refuses to act, he is entitled to his legacy if he survives the twelve months. Brydges v. Wotton, 1 Ves. & B. 134. But if the executor acts fraudulently, the mere taking out probate will not entitle him to his legacy. Harford v. Browning, 1 Cox 302.

The presumption that a legacy to an executor is given to him in that character for his trouble, may be rebutted:

"1. If some other motive is expressed, as if the gift is to 'my friend and executor.' In re Denby, 3 De G. F. & J. 350; Dix v. Reed, 1 Sim. & Stu. 237; Burgess v. Burgess, 1 Colly. 367; Bubb v. Yelverton, L. R., 13 Eq. 131.

"2. If the gifts to the executors are unequal in amount, or a legacy is given to one and not the other. Cockerell v. Barber, 2 Russ. 585; Jewis v. Lawrence, L. R., 8 Eq. 345; Wildes v. Davies, 1 S. & G. 475.

"3. If the gift is after a life interest. In re Reeves' Trusts, 4 Ch. Div. 841.

"4. If there is a direction that in the event of the executor's death before the testator, his legacy is to go to his next of kin. In re Banbury's Trusts, 1r. R., 10 Eq. 408.

"5. The presumption does not arise if the gift is of residue. Parsons v. Saffery, 9 Pr. 578; Griffith v. Pruen, 11 Sim. 202; Christian v. Devereux, 12 Sim. 264." Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 287, 288.

Testamentary Trustees — Gifts to.—The above principles applicable to gifts to one who is executor, apply as well to gifts to testamentary trustees. Hollingsworth v. Grasett, 15 Sim. 52.

But in the case of a bequest to a testamentary trustee, the legacy does not vest if he die after probate without doing any act to accept the trust, although before the executor had settled the estate. Kirkland v. Narramore, 105 Mass. 31.

Conditions—Limitations—Conditional Limitations.—"By the common law, a condition annexed to real estate could be reserved only to the grantor or deviser and his heirs. Upon a breach of the condition, the estate of the grantee or devisee was not ipso facto terminated, but the law permitted it to continue beyond the time when the contingency upon which it was given or granted happened, and until an entry or claim was made by the grantor or his heirs, or the heirs of the deviser, who alone had the right to take advantage of a breach. 2 Bl. Com. 156; 4 Kent's Com. (6th ed.) 122, 127. Hence arose the distinction between a condition and a conditional limitation. A condition, followed by a limitation over to a third person in case the condition be not fulfilled or there be a breach of it, is termed a conditional limitation.

"A condition determines an estate after breach, upon entry or claim by a grantor or his heirs, or the heirs of the deviser. A limitation marks the period which determines the estate, without any act on the part of him who has the next expectant interest. Upon the happening of the prescribed contingency, the estate first limited comes at once to an end, and the subsequent estate arises. If it were otherwise, it would be in the power of the heir to defeat the limitation over, by neglecting or refusing to enter for breach of the condition. This distinction was originally introduced in the case of wills, to get rid of the embarrassment arising from the rule of the ancient common law, that an estate could not be limited to a stranger, upon an event which went to abridge or destroy an estate previously limited. A conditional limitation is therefore of a mixed nature, partaking both of a condition and of a limitation; of a condition, because it defeats the estate previously limited; and of a limitation, because, upon the happening of the contingency, the estate passes to the person having the next expectant interest, without entry or claim.

"There is a further distinction in the nature of estates on condition, and those created by conditional limitation, which it may be material to notice. Where an estate in fee is created on condition, the entire interest does not pass out of the grantor by the same instrument or conveyance. All that remains, after the gift or grant takes effect, continues in the grantor and goes to his heirs. This is the right of entry, as we have already seen, which, from the nature of the grant, is reserved to the grantor and his heirs only, and which gives them the right to enter as of their old estate, upon the breach of the condition. This possibility of reverter, as it is termed, arises in the grantor or deviser immediately on the creation of the conditional estate. It is otherwise where the estate in fee is limited over to a third person in case of a breach of the condition. Then the entire estate, by the same instrument, passes out of the grantor or deviser. The first estate vests immediately, but the expectant interest does not take effect until the happening of the contingency upon which it was limited to arise. But both owe their existence to the same grant or gift; they are created uno flatu; and being an ultimate disposition of the entire fee, as well after as before the breach of the condition, there is nothing left in the grantor or deviser or his heirs. The right or possibility of reverter, which, on the creation of an estate in fee on condition merely, would remain in him, is given over by the limitation which is to take effect on the breach of the condition.

"One material difference, therefore, between an estate in fee on condition and on a conditional limitation, is briefly this: that the former leaves in the grantor a vested right, which by its very nature is reserved to him, as a present existing interest, transmissible to his heirs; while the latter passes the whole interest of the grantor at once, and creates an estate to arise and vest in a third person, upon a contingency, at a future and uncertain period of time. A grant of a fee on condition only creates an estate of a base or determinable nature in the grantee, leaving the right or possibility of reverter vested in the grantor. Such an interest or right in the grantor, as it does not arise and take effect upon a future uncertain or remote contingency, is not liable to the objection of violating the rule against perpetuities, in the same degree with other conditional and contingent interests in real estate of an executory character. The possibility of reverter, being a vested interest in real property, is capable at all times of being released to the person holding the estate on condition, or his grantee, and, if so released, vests an absolute and indefeasible title thereto. The grant or devise of a fee on condition does not, therefore, fetter and tie up estates, so as to prevent their alienation, and thus contravene the policy of the law which aims to secure the free

b. CONDITIONS PRECEDENT AND SUBSEQUENT DISTINGUISHED.—A condition precedent is one which must be performed before the interest affected by it can vest. A condition subsequent is one by which an interest already vested may be divested,¹ or a contingent interest defeated before vesting.² Whether a condition is precedent or subsequent is a question of construction, in regard to which very little help can be derived from decided cases. It may, however, be observed, that as between a contingent remainder and a vested remainder, subject to a divesting contingency, the question depends upon whether the condition is incorporated into the gift to, or description of, the remainder-man, or is added as a separate clause after words which have already given a vested interest.³ The fact that the condition requires something to be done which may take time, is a circumstance in favor of construing it as a condition subsequent.⁴ On the other hand, the fact that the condition involves and unembarrassed disposition of real property. It is otherwise with gifts or grants of estates in fee, with limitations over upon a condition or event of an uncertain or indeterminate nature. The limitation over being executory, and depending on a condition, or an event which may never happen, passes no vested interest or estate. It is impossible to ascertain in whom the ultimate right to the estate may vest, or whether it will ever vest at all, and therefore no conveyance or mode of alienation can pass an absolute title, because it is wholly uncertain in whom the estate will vest on the happening of the event or breach of the condition upon which the ulterior gift is to take effect.

"Such limitations include certain estates in remainder, as well as gifts and grants, which, when made by will, are termed executory devises, and when contained in conveyances to uses, assume the name of springing or shifting uses." Bigelow, J., in Brattle Square Church v. Grant, 3 Gray (Mass.) 146.

Where, in a testamentary writing, the words "in the event of its becoming necessary," equivalent to "if it become," or "provided it become," etc., were employed, it was held that a conditional bequest and not a limitation was intended by the testator. Mackay v. Moore, Dudley (Ga.) 94. See further, upon the subject, 4 Kent's Com. *127; 1 Greenleaf's Cruise, tit. 16, ch. 2, § 30; Newell v. Nichols, 75 N. Y. 78; Hooper v. Cummings, 45 Me. 359; *Bangor v. c. TIME OF PERFORMANCE—IGNORANCE OF THE EXISTENCE OF CONDITION AS AN EXCUSE FOR NON-PERFORMANCE.—Conditions, whether precedent or subsequent, must be performed within a reasonable time.²

A condition subsequent not performed, owing to the ignorance of the devisee or legatee of its existence, nevertheless works a forfeiture where the property is given over, both in the case of real and personal estate,³ unless the devisee is also the heir, who has a title independent of the will.⁴ Upon the same principle it has been held that a legacy not claimed within the time specified by the will is subject to a clause of forfeiture, although the legatee

d. IMPOSSIBLE, IMPOLITIC, IMMORAL, OR ILLEGAL CONDITIONS.—As regards realty, if the condition upon which a devise depends is impossible, impolitic, immoral, or illegal, in its creation, or afterwards so becomes, otherwise than by the act of the testator, the devise is itself void;³ if it becomes impossible by the act of the testator, the condition is itself discharged.⁴ As regards personalty, by the rule of the civil law which has been adopted by courts of equity, where a condition precedent is originally impossible, or is made so by the act or default of the testator, or is illegal as involving malum prohibitum, the bequest is absolute. But where the performance of the condition is the sole motive of the bequest, or its impossibility was unknown to the testator, or the condition which was possible in its creation has since become impossible by act of God, or where it is illegal, as involving malum in se, both gift and condition are void.⁵ Legacies charged on

Thus, in Carter v. Carter, 39 Ala. 579, it was held that a devise or legacy, the vesting of which was made to depend on the precedent condition, that certain slaves, which belonged to the father of the legatees, should be manumitted by him or suffered to go at large and enjoy the proceeds of their own labor, was defeated by such void condition.

A testator, who died in 1849, left of force his will bearing date Oct. 2, 1840, in the following language, to wit: "After all my debts are paid I will and bequeath to my brother F. all of my property, on certain conditions made with him. Should he decline taking it, I will and bequeath it to the Rev. B., on the same conditions. I appoint my said brother F. my executor." Shortly after testator's death, F. qualified as executor. With the will were found several unattested papers signed by the testator, and bearing dates subsequent to the date of the will, in which he, the testator, expressed his desire, and declared it to be one of the conditions mentioned in his will, that his slaves should be emancipated, if it could be done without evasion of the law, and in which he ordered certain legacies to be paid, and, in a certain contingency, distribution of his whole estate. To a bill filed by the next of kin to the testator, claiming that a trust resulted to them, F. answered and stated that he had never, before testator's decease, seen either his will or any of the papers accompanying it, "although testator had at different times conversed with him upon the first and principal subject mentioned in the papers accompanying land are governed by the rules peculiar to realty;¹ a legacy charged on both real and personal property will, so far as it is payable out of each species of property, be governed by the rules applicable to that species.² If the performance of a condition subsequent is impossible or illegal at the time of its creation, or afterwards becomes impossible, either by the act of God or of the law, or of the grantee, the devise or legacy to which it is annexed becomes absolute.³

e. CONDITIONS IN RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE—(1) As to Real Estate.—It seems to be the better opinion that as the principles governing this species of property are derived from the common law, a condition subsequent in reasonable restraint of marriage, annexed to an estate for life or in fee, is valid;⁴ and as the doctrine his will (the emancipation of his slaves), and relied implicitly upon this defendant's integrity for carrying out his intentions as far as he could without practicing any evasion of the law."

It was held that the conditions upon which F. held the estate being, as stated in his answer, for the benefit of the slaves of testator, were void by the provisions of the act of 1841. Johnson v. Clarkson, 3 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 305.

Thus, in O'Brien v. Barkley (Supreme Ct.), 60 N. Y. St. Rep. 520, it was held that a provision in a will that the devise, unless the devisee shall live apart from her husband, shall go to third persons, is a condition subsequent, and void as against public policy.

So where the gift is on condition that the legatees support and care for A, if A refuse the legatee's offer of support the gift becomes absolute. Livingston v. Gordon, 84 N. Y. 136. And the better opinion is that such is the case even where there is a gift over. Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 450; 2 Jarm. Wills (5th ed.) 12; Collett v. Collett, 35 Beav. 312; Sutcliffe v. Richardson, L. R., 13 Eq. 606. See Livingston v. Gordon, 84 N. Y. 136.

Void Conditions Subsequent.—Upon the same principle, if the condition subsequent be void, the original gift becomes absolute. Jones v. Habersham, 3 Woods (U. S.) 443. In this case, Bradley, Circ. J., in considering the terms of a devise containing conditions subsequent, said: "This gift is objected to on account of the condition against alienation. . . . The condition is nothing but a condition subsequent, and, if void, does not vitiate the gift."

4. Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 453. See Jones v. Jones, 1 Q. B. Div. 279; also observations of Jessel, M. R., in Bellairs v. Bellairs, L. R., 18 Eq. 510; Haughton v. Haughton, 1 Moll. 611; Phillips v. Medbury, 7 Conn. 573; Gilson, C. J., in Com. v. Stauffer, 10 Pa. St. 354.

Such is undoubtedly the case where the restraint is partial only, as where the condition required marriage with consent, Salters v. Jewks, 2 Ch. Rep. 95; Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 454; Hogan v. Curtin, 88 N. Y. 171; or forbids marriage under age, or with persons of a particular family or nationality. Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 454, citing Stackpole v. Beaumont, 3 Ves.

of conditions in terrorem does not apply to realty, the condition is good even though there is no gift over.¹ But a condition in general restraint of marriage is void, if imposed upon a tenant in tail, as repugnant to the nature of the estate.²

(2) Personalty.—In the case of personalty, a condition subsequent in general restraint of marriage is void.³ The rule is derived from the civil law by which all conditions in restraint of marriage were absolutely void, and marriage simply was a sufficient compliance with a condition requiring marriage with consent or with a particular individual, or any other restrictive circumstance.⁴ By the English law, however, the principle has been so

Jr. 89; Perrin v. Lyon, 9 East 170; Duggan v. Kelly, 10 J. R. Eq. 295; Hodgson v. Halford, 11 Ch. Div. 959; Jenner v. Turner, 29 W. R. 99; Haughton v. Haughton, 1 Moll. 611; Phillips v. Ferguson, 85 Va. 509.

But with regard to the validity of conditions in general restraint of marriage, annexed to devises of realty, authorities differ. On the one hand, it may be said that the invalidity of such conditions in regard to personalty is due to principles derived from the civil law, and introduced into the administration of personalty by ecclesiastics, not recognized by the common law in regard to realty. In fact, the rules derived from the civil law were merely rules of construction, as appears from the fact that the testator could evade the rule by throwing the sentence into the form of a limitation, which would be impossible if the rule were really founded upon any broad principle of public policy. See observations of Sir G. Jessel, M. R., in Bellairs v. Bellairs, L. R., 18 Eq. 516. On the other hand, Jarman and other writers are of opinion that conditions in general restraint of marriage are void upon the broad ground of public policy, applicable alike to real and personal property, since to give either man or woman property subject to such a condition is to encourage illicit connections. 2 Jarm. on Wills 50; notes to Scott v. Tyler, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. (4th Am. ed.), pt. I, 475, 501; Story Eq. Jur., § 280 et seq.; Lord Ellenborough, in Perrin v. Lynn, 9 East 170; Lord Blackburn, in Jones v. Jones, 1 Q. B. 4. 2 Jarm. on Wills (5th ed.) *44. In Stackpole v. Beaumont, 3 Ves. Jr. 96, Lord Loughborough said, in regard to the recognition of the doctrine by courts of equity: "It is impossible to reconcile the authorities, or range them under one sensible, plain, general rule. There can be no ground in the construction of legacies for a distinction between legacies out of personal and out of real estate. The construction ought to be precisely the same. I do not see more importance, in reality, in the distinction between conditions precedent and subsequent. The case of all these questions is plainly this: In deciding questions that arise upon legacies out of land, the court very properly followed the rule that the common law prescribes and common sense supports, to hold the condition binding where it is not illegal. Where it is illegal, the condition would be rejected, and the gift pure. When the rule came to be applied to personal estate, the court felt the difficulty, upon the supposition that the ecclesiastical court had adopted a positive rule from the civil law upon legatory questions, and the inconvenience of proceeding by a different rule in the concurrent far modified that a condition subsequent in partial restraint of marriage, as conditions not to marry a particular person,¹ or not to marry under twenty-one,² or other reasonable age,³ or without consent, are sustained if there is a gift over;⁴ but without a gift jurisdiction (it is not right to call it so), in the resort to this court instead of the ecclesiastical court, upon legatory questions; which after the Restoration was very frequent, and in the beginning embarrassed the court. Distinction upon distinction was taken to get out of the supposed difficulty. How it should ever have come to be a rule of decision in the ecclesiastical court is impossible to be accounted for, but upon this circumstance, that in the unenlightened ages, soon after the revival of letters, there was a blind superstitious adherence to the text of the civil law. They never reasoned; but only looked into the books, and transferred the rules, without weighing the circumstances, as positive rules to guide them. It is beyond imagination, except from that circumstance, how, in a Christian country, they should have adopted the rule of the Roman law with regard to conditions as to marriage.

"First, where there is an absolute unlimited liberty of divorce, all rules as to marriage are inapplicable to a system of religion and law where divorce is not permitted. Next, the favor to marriage, and the objection to the restraint of it, was a mere political regulation applicable to the circumstances of the Roman empire at that time, and inapplicable to other countries. After the civil war, the depopulation occasioned by it led to habits of celibacy. In the time of Augustus the Julian law, which went too far, and was corrected by the Lex Papia Poppæa, not only offered encouragement to marriage, but laid heavy impositions upon celibacy. That being established as a rule in restraint of celibacy (it is an odd expression), and for the encouragement of all persons who would contract marriage, it necessarily followed that no person could act contrary to it by imposing restraints directly contrary to the law. Therefore it became a rule of construction that these conditions were null. It is difficult to apply that to a country where there is no law to restrain individuals from exercising their own discretion as to the time and circumstances of the marriage their children or objects of bounty may contract."

Is the English Rule One of Policy or Merely of Construction?—Upon this question Sir G. Jessel, M. R., said, in Bellairs v. Bellairs, L. R., 18 Eq. 516: "Now if the rule were really one of policy you never could evade it by a change in the form of words. But it is admitted you can so evade it; that if you put it in the form of limitation—if, for example, you had given this life interest to this young lady until she married, and then upon marriage had given it over—it is not disputed that that would have been good. Therefore, it seems to be a rule of construction. The reason of the rule may have been policy; but the actual question the court has to decide is whether, according to the construction, it is a condition or a limitation, and if it is found to be a condition, then the reason which made that condition in terrorem only may have been founded on policy or supposed policy; but it is the construction that decides that it is to be in terrorem, and therefore, strictly speaking, it is a question whether the testator has absolutely prohibited the marriage, or whether he has intended merely to threaten that which he knows cannot be carried into effect, because the court construes it to be in terrorem. I think, therefore, the rule is rather to be considered an arbitrary rule of construction than to be founded on public policy, and I should hold, if it were merely a gift of money arising from the sale of real estate, that it is governed by the rules applicable to personal legacies."

over, such conditions are held merely in terrorem and void.¹ With regard to conditions precedent, it has been held that a bequest to A, if he marries B, only takes effect in that event, and the fact that he married C in the testator's lifetime, and with his approval, is immaterial.² A condition precedent requiring consent to marriage generally, without limitation of age, is good, if there is a gift over;³ but if not, it is considered in terrorem merely and void.⁴ A condition precedent in partial restraint of marriage, as not to marry under a certain age, or requiring consent to marriage if under a certain age, is good, even though there is no gift over.⁵

after his death does not obviate the necessity for the consent of the persons named in the will. Lowry v. Patterson, Ir. R., 8 Eq. 372. In Reynish v. Martin, 3 Atk. 331, Lord Hardwicke said, in speaking of a legacy on condition that legatee marry with consent: "I apprehend that taking this as a mere personal legacy, the plaintiff, by the rules of the civil and ecclesiastical law, and which have been constantly adhered to in this court, will be entitled to the legacy; for it is an established rule in the civil law, and has long been the doctrine of this court, that where a personal legacy is given to a child on condition of marrying with consent, this is not looked on as a condition annexed to the legacy, but as a declaration of the testator in terrorem."

"This rule is so strictly adhered to in the ecclesiastical court, that the marrying without consent is not considered there as a breach of the condition,

The doctrine may be evaded by expressing the restriction in the form of a limitation, it being presumed in such case that the intention is to provide for the person while he remains unmarried and not to prevent him from marrying again,¹ and a although the legacy is actually given over; but that rule has not been carried so far in this court, for in many instances here it has been considered as a breach of the condition, and the legacy thereby forfeited; but that differs from the present case, because here the legacy is given to Mary only, without any limitation over.

"But then it was objected that there is a strong and material difference between a condition precedent and subsequent, and this being a condition precedent, and as the condition was not performed, nothing vested, because the event was not come on which the legacy was to take effect.

"Undoubtedly this is true in general both in law and equity; but I do not find that the civil or ecclesiastical law have made any distinction between conditions precedent and subsequent, but that in both cases the condition as such is merely void.

"This rule of the ecclesiastical court was strongly relied on in the case of Harvey and Aston (1 T. Atk. 361), but it was the opinion of all the judges who assisted in that case that it was not to be carried so far in this court; and the distinction taken by Lord Chief Baron Comyns, in his argument in that case, is extremely right, and very well reconciles the difference, vide Com. Rep. 738; and the reason is, because the civil law considering the condition, whether precedent or subsequent, as unlawful and absolutely void, the legacy stands pure and simple.

"But in our law, where the condition is precedent, the legatary takes nothing till the condition is performed, and consequently has no right to come and demand the legacy; but it is otherwise where the condition is subsequent, for in that case the legatary has a right, and the court will decree him the legacy; but this difference only holds where the legacy is a charge on the real assets, and, therefore, if this had been merely a personal legacy, should have been of opinion that as the marriage without consent would not have precluded Mary of her right to this legacy in the ecclesiastical court, no more would it have done so here."

"It is difficult to understand how this could be otherwise, for in such a case there is nothing to give an interest beyond the marriage. If you suppose the case of a gift of a certain interest, and that interest sought to be abridged by a condition, you may strike out the condition, and leave the original gift in operation; but if the gift is until marriage, and no longer, there is nothing to carry the gift beyond the marriage. With reference to that point, and also in order that the grounds of my decision might clearly appear to those parties against whom it might be, I wished to look into the authorities; and I am satisfied, from an examination of the authorities, that there is no reason to alter my opinion, that a gift until marriage, and when the party marries then over, is a valid limitation. In the case of a widow, there is no question of the validity of such a limitation. It was decided in Jordan v. Holkham, Amb. 209, that, where an estate was given during widowhood, the estate was determinable by the second marriage; and an annuity given during widowhood is also good. Barton v. Barton, 2 Vern. 308. In Scott v. Tyler, 2 Dick. 712, Lord Thurlow, speaking of the change which the civil law had undergone in its descent, observes that, in the Novels, widowhood was excepted, and an injunction to keep that state was a lawful condition, Scott v. Tyler, 2 Dick. 721, was certainly a peculiar case; but, referring to the canon law, Lord Thurlow, citing Godolphin, says that the use of a thing may be given 'during celibacy for the purpose of intermediate maintenance, and will not be interpreted maliciously to a charge of restraining marriage,' 2 Dick. 722; affirming, therefore, the general doctrine that a gift until marriage would be good. In

(5) Restraints Upon Second Marriage.—Conditions restraining a widow from second marriage constituted an exception to the rule of the civil law,⁵ and consequently they are valid in respect to personal property if there is a gift over; and in respect to real property, they are valid either with or without a gift over.⁶ In the case of Low v. Peers, C. J. Wilmot's Cases 369, Chief Justice Wilmot goes through the cases upon the subject and shows that, according to his apprehension of the law, a gift until marriage is perfectly good. He notices the case of college fellowships, of customs of manors, of limitations of estates during celibacy, and the express distinction between limitations and conditions, and he remarks that the distinction is recognized and established, and that the common law allows it. I may refer to the cases, and amongst them to the later ones of Bird v. Hunsdon, 2 Swanst. 342, and Marples v. Bainbridge, 1 Madd. 590, as affirming the same proposition. In those cases all the reasons the court referred to were superfluous, if a limitation during celibacy is not good." Wigram, V. C., in Morley v. Rennoldson, 2 Hare 580.

(6) Performance and Waiver.—Where there is a gift upon marriage with consent, the legatee has her whole life to perform the condition, and the legacy is not forfeited by first marriage without consent,² unless the will contains an express provision for her in such event.³ If the condition require the consent of several persons, who are executors or trustees, the consent of those who renounce is unnecessary.⁴ So a condition requiring the consent of several persons is performed by obtaining the consent of the Instances of Condition Held Valid as to Realty.—The testator bequeathed his property to his wife for life, but, if she married, she was to give up all the property to be equally divided between her and his children. She had two children by the testator, and one by a previous marriage. She married in 1850, and died in 1851; one of the testator's children died in 1857. It was held that the widow was entitled to an estate for life in all the estate, in the event she remained single, but if she married, she was entitled to one-third in fee. Lane v. Crutchfield, 3 Head (Tenn.) 452.

A testator by his will gave his wife $1,000 in money and a negro boy absolutely; and also, during her natural life or widowhood, all the remainder of his property, both real and personal. He also provided that his wife should not be required to give bond and security for the forthcoming of said property at her death, but that she should have the free use and control of all said property during her natural life or widowhood; he also made provision that at his wife's death the property should be equally divided between his brothers and sisters, and their heirs, etc. It was held that, by the proper construction of the will, the wife did not take a life estate, in the event she married—that her interest in the property, except the money and the negro boy, terminated upon her marriage. Duncan v. Philips, 3 Head (Tenn.) 415.

Condition Valid as to Personalty Where There Is a Gift Over.—A testator ordered a sum of money to be secured on his real estate, upon the sale thereof by his executors, and the annual interest of it to be paid to his widow during her life or widowhood; and made provision that, if she should marry again, such yearly bequest should cease and terminate; and the principal sum, so secured, should be distributed, with the residue of his estate, among the grandsons of the testator; the widow accepted under the will, and afterwards contracted a second marriage; it was held that the condition was not void, and that on the marriage of the widow her right to the annual payment of such interest determined. Cornell v. Lovett, 35 Pa. St. 100.

Where There Is No Gift Over.—A testator ordered his executors to pay to his widow, in lieu of dower, the yearly sum of $600 during her natural life, if she should so long remain his widow, out of the income of his property, real and personal, "and if she shall marry again, this yearly payment is to cease." There was no specific disposition of such annuity in case of her marriage. It was held that she was entitled to the annuity notwithstanding a second marriage, the devise being in restraint of marriage. McIlvaine v. Gethen, 3 Whart. (Pa.) 575.

survivors.¹ Subsequent approbation by the executors of a marriage without consent is not a performance of the condition.² The condition does not apply to a second marriage.³ The consent of the testator to a marriage in his lifetime satisfies the condition,⁴ but his consent to a marriage to take place after his death, does not obviate the necessity for the consent of the persons named in the will.⁵ A gift till marriage fails, if the legatee marries in testator's lifetime, even with his consent.⁶

f. CONDITION NOT TO CONTEST WILL.—A condition not to contest the will is valid as regards realty, with or without a gift over upon breach;⁷ as regards personalty, it is valid if there is a gift over; if not, it is considered in terrorem and void.⁸

Those cases do not seem to me to touch the present. The plain intention in such cases is to provide for the event, not of any marriage, but of an improvident marriage; and the consent of the testator proves that he did not consider the marriage to be improvident. But here the provision in the will applies to any marriage, whether provident or improvident. So far as they go, however, these cases seem to be rather against than in favor of the lady, for I can find no trace in them of its ever having been supposed that the legatees could take if the marriage was without the testator's consent, and yet they would be so entitled if the will was to be construed as referring only to marriages after the death of the testator."

Instances illustrating the Rule.—A testator, after having devised his home farm to his wife for life, remainder over in fee to his single daughters as tenants in common, and his other estate to his son in fee, proceeded in a codicil, reciting the purchase, since the execution of the will, of a tract of woodland, called Swanston Lot, to devise the said parcel to his wife, daughters, and son, "on the express condition that the same is not at any time to be cleared or converted into arable land, but that they are respectively to be allowed to take therefrom as much wood and timber as will be required and necessary, with care, for the purpose for which it was purchased as aforesaid" (as a support for the home farm, and the property devised to the son). It was held that the several devisees took a fee simple in Swanston Lot, and that the attempt of the testator to prescribe in what manner his gift should be used, to be made available to all time, was void. Smith v. Clark, 10 Md. 186.

A testator, after ordering that "all his worldly substance shall be disposed of," proceeded to say, that it was his will and desire that a certain farm "fall into the possession of B., laying this injunction and prohibition, not to leave the same to any but the legitimate heirs of B.'s father's family, at his, B.'s, decease." It was held that this evinced a general intent to give the fee to B., with an apparent particular intent in relation to the power of alienation, which particular intent was void, because inconsistent with a reasonable enjoyment of the fee. M'Cullough v. Gilmore, 11 Pa. St. 370.

Compare Cross v. Robinson, 21 Conn. 379. In this case the testator devised to his wife the use and improvement of one-half of his real estate during her widowhood, and then devised to his five sons in fee, subject to such estate in his wife, all his property, both real and personal, provided that none of the real estate, so given to his five sons, should be sold until three years after the widowhood of his wife, unless sold to some of said five sons, meaning to have it improved all together until that time. By conveyances, in the first instance, from one to another of the sons, and thence to strangers, before the expiration of the time limited in the will, three-fifths of the estate passed to the plaintiffs. In an action of ejectment, brought after the death of the testator's wife, but still before the expiration of said time, against one of the devisees, it was held that the object of the clause in the will limiting the power of alienation was to protect the widow in the enjoyment of her interest, without the annoyance which might result from the occupancy of a stranger with her, and not to deprive the sons of all power of alienation during the period specified; hence, the title of the plaintiffs was not repugnant to the will. Cross v. Robinson, 21 Conn. 379.

23. Survivorship—a. WORDS OF SURVIVORSHIP—TO WHAT PERIOD REFERRED.—Where the gift is to take effect in possession immediately upon the testator's decease, words of survivorship are regarded as intended to provide against the death of the objects of the gift in the lifetime of the testator, and prima facie refer to his death.⁶ Early English cases extended the rule to

"There is no doubt that property may be given to a man until he shall become bankrupt. It is equally clear, generally speaking, that if property is given to a man for his life, the donor cannot take away the incidents to a life estate; and, as I have observed, a disposition to a man until he shall become bankrupt, and, after his bankruptcy, over, is quite different from an attempt to give to him for his life, with a proviso that he shall not sell or alien it. If that condition is so expressed as to amount to a limitation, reducing the interest short of a life estate, neither the man nor his assignees can have it beyond the period limited." Where a testator, by a residuary clause, devised the residue of his real and personal property "to the survivors of his brothers and sisters," designating them, it was held that this was a devise of an estate in common to all the devisees who should survive the testator, with the right of possession immediately after his decease, and not a devise upon a contingency to the two out of the three persons named who might survive the third. Brimmer v. Sohler, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 118.

B., by his last will, after giving specific parts of his real and personal property to each of his five sons, by name, devised as follows: "After the above-mentioned articles are taken out of my movable estate, let the remainder be valued by indifferent men, agreed upon for that purpose, and then be divided as my heirs can agree among themselves; and if any of my sons aforesaid should die without lawful issue, then let his or their part or parts be divided equally among the survivors, unless it should happen that he or they, so dying, should leave a wife behind, in which case she shall take back what she brought with her and one hundred pounds besides, and only the remainder shall be divided as aforesaid." It was held that if the limitation had rested alone on the dying without lawful issue, it would have failed; yet, the devise over being to the survivors, it would be construed to mean children living at the death of the party, and not a general failure of issue. Moffat v. Strong, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 12.

"Where the objects are tenants in common, it was for a long period considered that, indefinite survivorship being inconsistent with a tenancy in common, some period was to be found to which the words of survivorship could be referred. This reasoning, however, is obviously inconclusive; for although survivorship is not incident to a tenancy in common, yet there is no inconsistency between a tenancy in common and an express limitation to survivors. The testator's intention that the property shall devolve to the survivors is better effected by an express gift to them than by a joint tenancy, the survivorship which is incidental to the latter being liable to be defeated by a severance of the tenancy. In seeking for a period to which the words of survivorship could be referred, the obvious rule, where the gift took effect in possession, immediately on the testator's decease, was to treat these words as intended to provide against the death of the objects in the lifetime of the testator, the devise affording no other point of time to which they could be referred; accordingly we find this to be the established construction." 2 Jarm. on Wills (5th ed.) *721.

"Where, however, the gift was not immediate (i. e., in possession), there being a prior life or other particular interest carved out, so that there was another period to which the words in question could be referred, the point was one of greater difficulty. In these cases, indeed, as well as in those of the other class, the courts for a long period uniformly applied the words of survivorship to the death of the testator, on the notion (as already observed) that there was no other mode of reconciling them with the words of severance creating a tenancy in common. The weight ascribed to this argument, however, was still more extraordinary in these than in the former cases; for, even if indefinite survivorship were inconsistent with a tenancy in common (but which it clearly was not), yet surely there could be no incongruity between such an interest and a limitation to the survivors at a given period; nevertheless, decision rapidly followed decision, in which, on reasoning of this kind, survivorship was held, in cases of this sort, to refer to the period of the testator's decease." 2 Jarm. on Wills (5th ed.) *722.

abandoned this position and adopted the rule that whether the gift be immediate or postponed, and whether the property be real or personal, words of survivorship prima facie refer to the period of division. If there is no previous interest given, the period of division is the death of the testator, and survivors at his death take the whole; but if a previous life estate be given, then the period of division is the death of the life tenant, and survivors at such death take the whole.¹ Authorities in the United States may Gifts to Be Paid at Twenty-one, After a Life Interest with Benefit of Survivorship.—"If there is a life interest and a period of division as well, for instance, a gift to A for life, then to a class to be paid at twenty-one, with a clause of survivorship, the question is more complicated. In such cases survivorship refers most naturally to the words with which it is placed in immediate connection.

A testator made certain specific devises and bequests to several of his children. He then gave to his wife a life estate in his real and personal property not specifically disposed of. He then declared that his real and personal property, after the decease of his wife, unless his wife should choose to give up the estate before her decease, should be sold and divided among certain of his children; and then declared that if any of his children should die without lawful issue of the body begotten, then his, her or their share or legacy should be equally divided among the survivors, share and share alike. It was held that he used the term survivors with reference to the period when the estate should be divided after the happening of the event mentioned in his will, to wit, the death of his wife. *Williamson v. "Thus, if the testator provides for the children of legatees between whom there is to be survivorship only in case they do not survive him, or gives large powers of making advances during the lifetime of the tenant for life, to legatees among whom there is to be survivorship, it may appear that survivors were to be determined at his death. Mr. Jarman, after a careful examination of the English authorities, says: "The result then would seem to be that the word 'survivor,' when unexplained by the context, must be interpreted according to its literal import; but the conviction that this construction most commonly defeats the actual intention of testators, has induced a readiness in the courts to yield to the slightest indication in the context of an intention to use the word in the sense of 'other.' But the present state of the authorities seems hardly to justify the hope that litigation has reached its limits on this often-occurring slip, and should teach to framers of wills the necessity of increased attention to its avoidance." 2 Jarman Wills (5th ed.) *710.

Mr. Theobald has attempted the following classification of English authorities:

"1. If there is an absolute gift to several persons, with a gift to the survivors, if any die without issue, survivors must be construed in its ordinary sense. Crowder v. Stone, 3 Russ. 217; Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, 2 Myl. & K. 441; Stead v. Platt, 18 Beav. 50; Greenwood v. Percy, 26 Beav. 572.

"2. Where there is a gift over, to take place only in case the event on which the property is limited to the first legatees, among whom there is to be survivorship, happens in respect of all the legatees, survivor will be construed other, so as not to cause an intestacy. For instance, if the bequests are to A, B, and C, payable at twenty-one, and if either die under twenty-one, his share to the survivors, and if two die under twenty-one, the whole to the survivor, and if all die under twenty-one, then over, the share of one dying under twenty-one would go to one who had predeceased him, but attained twenty-one, and to the survivor equally. Wilmot v. Wilmot, 8 Ves. Jr. 10; In re Jackson's Trust, 14 Ir. Ch. 472. The same construction was adopted in Re Connellan's Trust, 16 Ir. Ch. 524, though there was no gift over, but quære.

"In these cases, the testator intends the property to go over as a whole, or not at all. As the whole cannot go over where the event does not happen in respect of all the first legatees, there is no other disposition of the shares in respect of which it happens, except among the first legatees themselves, and, in order to allow them to take, the word survivor must be read other.

"3. Where there is a devise to sons and the heirs of their bodies, and if any die without issue to the survivors and the heirs of their bodies, and if all die without issue, over, survivorship will be referred to the stirpes and not to the first takers, and the share of a son dying without issue will go among the issue of a son previously deceased and the surviving sons. Doe v. Wainwright, 5 T. R. 427; Smith v. Osborne, 6 H. L. Cas. 376.

"In such cases, the testator has expressed his intention of benefitting the line of issue, and the survivorship contemplated is one between the respective stirpes and not between the first takers merely, and this, coupled with the gift over, which can only take effect if all the sons die without issue, is sufficient to enlarge the meaning of the word survivor.

"It is immaterial whether the word is survivors or such as survive. In re Tharp's Estate, 1 De G. J. & S. 453.

"And the same construction will be adopted even if there is no gift over to interpret the testator's intention. Harman v. Dickenson, 1 Bro. C. C. 91. See 34 Beav. 352; Williams v. James, 20 W. R. 1010; Tufnell v. Borrell, L. R., 20 Eq. 194.

"4. The same will be the case where the will gives life estates with limitations expressly to issue, followed by a gift, on failure of issue of any of the tenants for life, to the surviving tenants for life for their lives and then to their issue, and an ultimate gift over on failure of issue of all the tenants for life; and it makes no difference whether the gift be to survivors for life and then to their issue, or to survivors in like manner as the original shares were given. Lowe v. Land, 1 Jur. 377; In re Keep's Will, 32 Beav. 122; In re Tharp's Estate, 1 De G. J. & S. 453; Holland v. Allsop, 29 Beav. 498; Hurry v. Morgan, L. R., 3 Eq. 152; Badger v. Gregory, L. R., 8 Eq. 78; Waite v. Littlewood, L. R., 8 Ch. 70; In re Palmer's Trusts, L. R., 19 Eq. 320; Wake v. Varah, 2 Ch. Div. 348; In re Row's Estate, 43 L. J. Ch. 347.

"There is the same evidence of intention to benefit the issue, and the gift over shows that survivorship is contemplated, not merely between the first takers, but between the respective stirpes.

"5. Whether the same construction would be adopted in the absence of an ultimate gift over seems unsettled. The observations made in Wake v. Varah, 2 Ch. Div. 348, and Beckwith v. Beckwith, 46 L. J. Ch. Div. 97, are in favor of a strict construction of the word survivors under such circumstances. See too Milsom v. Awdry, 5 Ves. Jr. 465. But the attention of the court in those cases was not called to the cases in which a gift over has been held to be immaterial. Hodge v. Foote, 34 Beav. 349; In re Beck's Trusts, 16 W. R. 189; 37 L. J. Ch. 233; In re Arnold's Trusts, L. R., 10 Eq. 252, recently followed in Re Walker, 12 Ch. Div. 205.

"In re Corbett's Trusts, Johns. 591, may be supported on the ground that the testator expressly provided for the surviving issue of the children of the tenants for life, thus excluding an intention of also providing for children of tenants for life dying before the period of accruer, besides which the case was one in which absolute gifts were subsequently cut down by settlement.

"In Beckwith v. Beckwith, 46 L. J. Ch. Div. 97, the gift was to 'other daughters surviving,' so that to give surviving a stirpital construction would in effect have been to reject the word entirely.

"If accruing shares are given to the survivors or survivor for their joint lives, and after the decease of the survivor to the children of the survivors or survivor, the surviving tenant for life will take the whole for life, though probably the children of predeceasing tenants for life would take on his death. Winterton v. Crawford, 1 R. & M. 407.

"6. But if the gift to survivors is not given in the same manner as the original shares, there is no evidence that stirpital survivorship was intended, and the word will be construed strictly.

"Thus, where, the prior limitations being for life with remainder to children, the gift is to survivors absolutely, and not to survivors for life, and then to their children, although there is a gift over of the whole upon death of all without issue, the intention to benefit the lines of issue is not sufficiently indicated, and the word survivors will be construed strictly. Twist v. Herbert, 28 L. T. N. S. 489.

"Survivors must, a fortiori, be strictly construed where there is no gift over. Leeming v. Sherratt, 2 Hare 14; Lee v. Stone, 1 Exch. 674; In re Corbett's Trusts, Johns. 591, the residuary gift; Browne v. Rainsford, Ir. R., 1 Eq. 384.

"In such a case, however, there may be a general intention expressed to benefit the stirpes and not merely the surviving parents; for instance, by a preliminary statement of the intention that the property is to be divided among the children of several parents, without any mention of survivorship between the parents. Hawkins v. Hamerton, 16 Sim. 410.

"7. It seems, when the original limitations are for life with remainder to children in tail, and if any of the tenants for life die without children, to the surviving tenants for life in tail, followed by a gift over in case of a total failure of issue of all the tenants for life, the stirpital construction would not be adopted. See Maden v. Taylor, 45 L. J. Ch. 569. See, however, Cooper v. MacDonald, L. R., 16 Eq. 258.

"8. Where the shares of some members of the class are settled and others not, and the gift over is to the survivors of the class in the same way as the original shares, the case is more difficult.

"In such a case the word survivors was construed others, chiefly by the force of a gift over in default of all the objects to be benefited. Lucena v. Lucena, 7 Ch. Div. 255.

"If the gift is to a class of sons and daughters, and the daughters' shares are, by a separate clause, directed to be settled and given over in default of issue to the surviving sons and daughters, in the same way as the original shares, survivors would possibly not be construed as others. DeGaragnol v. Liardet, 32 Beav. 608; In re Usticke, 35 Beav. 338. See Nevill v. Boddam, 28 Beav. 554.

"On the other hand, if the shares of daughters dying without issue, given to surviving members of the class, are directed to be settled for the benefit of the other shares, survivors will be read others, at any rate as regards the settled shares. Jackson v. Sparks, 38 L. J. Ch. 75; and see the judgment of the M. R. in Lucena v. Lucena, 7 Ch. Div. 255.

"Upon similar principles, if there is an absolute gift to several, with a gift to their issue, if they die leaving issue, and if any die without issue, to the survivors, subject to the same executory limitation in favor of issue as the original shares, survivorship will be referred to the stirpes, and not merely to the individuals. Eyre v. Marsden, 2 Keen 564; 4 Myl. & C. 231; Cross v. Maltby, L. R., 20 Eq. 378. See Le Jeune v. Le Jeune, 2 Keen 701.

"But if the gift to survivors is absolute, and not subject to the same defeasibility in favor of issue as the original shares, survivors must be construed strictly, though there may be a gift over in the event of the death of all the legatees without issue. Ferguson v. Dunbar, 3 Bro. C. C. 468, n.

"Under a gift, in default of children of a daughter, to the others or other of his children by name, equally between them if more than one, the word others will not be read as survivors. In re Hagen's Trusts, 46 L. J. Ch. 665.

"Nor, under a gift to a son by name and the survivors of the testator's daughters, is it necessary that the son should survive in order to take. In re Bates, 11 W. R. 768." Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 503.

It is very doubtful how far these requirements would be adopted in the United States. The tendency of the

c. ACCRUED SHARES.—Clauses disposing of the shares of the devisees and legatees dying before a given period or event, do not, without a positive and distinct indication of intention, extend to shares accruing under those clauses so as to pass them a second time. Thus, where a man gives a sum of money to be divided amongst four persons, as tenants in common, and declares that if one of them dies before twenty-one or marriage, it shall survive to the others, if one dies and three are living, the share of that one so dying will survive to the other three, but if a second dies, nothing will survive to the remainder but the second's original share, for the accruing share is as a new legacy, and there is no further survivorship.¹ authorities in this country is to place each decision, to a great extent at least, upon the peculiar provisions of the particular will.

In Taylor v. Foster, 17 Ohio St. 166, the rule was not observed. See Turner v. Withers, 23 Md. 43.

Thus, a testator made the following devise: "My will is, that all the remaining part of my lands, not sold or otherwise disposed of, be equally divided among my surviving daughters;" and, "It is my will that shall either of my daughters be dead, or die without issue, the before-mentioned land shall be divided between the surviving ones." The testator left four daughters living at his death, who all died successively; the one dying last but one alone leaving issue, a daughter, who, with other nephews and nieces, were the heirs at law of her last dying. It was held that the limitation over to the survivors was valid; that an interest or share, having once survived, did not again survive, but, upon the death of her taking by survivorship, descended to her heirs. Lewis v. Claiborne, 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 369.

Part—Portion.—The rule applies where the word "part" or "portion" is used instead of share. Bright v. Rowe, 3 Myl. & K. 316; Goodwin v.

Finlayson, 25 Beav. 65; Cambridge v. Rous, 25 Beav. 416.

What Will Pass Accrued Shares.—Upon this subject Theobald has made the following classification of the English authorities. "If, for instance, accrued shares are directed to go in the same manner as original shares. Cursham v. Newland, 2 Beav. 145; Milsom v. Awdry, 5 Ves. Jr. 465; Eyre v. Marsden, 4 Myl. & C. 231; Giles v. Melsom, L. R., 6 H. L. Cas. 24.

"2. And when original and accrued shares have once been consolidated by a direction, for instance, that they are to go in the same manner, 'there is no occasion to carry on any separate account of the original share from the accrued share,' and both will pass under the word share. In re Hutchinson, 5 De G. & S. 681.

"3. If 'his or her share or shares,' are spoken of where only one original share has been previously given, so that the words cannot be satisfied reddendo singula singulis, as might be the case if the words were 'his, her or their share or shares,' accrued shares will be carried over. Wilmott v. Flewitt, 13 W. R. 856. And apparently 'share and shares and interest' would carry accrued shares. Douglas v. Andrews, 14 Beav. 347.

"4. Accrued shares will pass where the testator, though he speaks of individual shares, yet shows that he looks on the fund as existing at the period of distribution as an aggregate and previously undivided fund, by speaking of it, for instance, as the trust fund. Worldidge v. Churchill, 3 Bro. C. C. 465; Leeming v. Sherratt, 2 Hare 14; Sillick v. Booth, 1 Y. & C. C. 121, 739; Barker v. Lea, T. & R. 413. So, where the whole fund is given to a class with benefit of survivorship, the words of

24. Substitution—a. DEFINITION.—Although every executory limitation intended to destroy prior intervals in certain contingencies is in the widest sense substitutional, the term is generally applied to limitation intended to provide for the death of prior devisees or legatees before the period of distribution.¹ Thus, a direct gift to A or his children, goes to A if he survives the testator, and to his children if he does not.² If the gift be preceded by a life interest, the substitutional gift takes effect whether A dies in the lifetime of the testator or the tenant for life.³

b*. GIFTS OVER ON DEATH UNDER SPECIFIED CIRCUMSTANCES.—Wherever there is a gift, whether immediate or deferred, to individuals, a gift over in case the devisee or legatee die under specified circumstances, takes effect, if the event happens in the testator's lifetime.⁴ The rule applies even though the legatee or survivorship apply to the whole, accrued as well as original shares. In re Crawhall's Trusts, 2 Jur. N. S. 892.

"5. And a gift over of the whole is convincing evidence of the same intention. In such a case 'share must have been meant to include every interest, accruing as well as original, for otherwise the estate would go away from the issue piecemeal; whereas, it is obvious, nothing was intended to go over, but that all should go over at once on failure of the issue of all the children, as if all but one had died without issue who was intended to take all.' Doe v. Birkhead, 4 Exch. 110; Douglas v. Andrews, 14 Beav. 347; Dutton v. Crowdy, 33 Beav. 272; Langley v. Langley, L. R., 6 Ir. 277.

"6. And if the bequest is of residue, the presumption against intestacy will assist the court in passing accrued with original shares. Goodman v. Goodman, 1 De G. & S. 695.

"7. Accrued shares are similarly not liable to the same restrictions as original shares, in the absence of a clearly expressed intention so to restrict them, Gibbons v. Langdon, 6 Sim. 260; Ware v. Watson, 7 De G. M. & G. 248; and on the other hand, Trickey v. Trickey, 3 Myl. & K. 560; In re Jarman's Trusts, L. R., 1 Eq. 71; Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, Ir. R., 7 Eq. 436." Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 517.

It is not believed that in the present condition of the American decisions any corresponding classification is possible. It is highly probable, however, that in the future, Theobald's classification may be followed in doubtful cases.

As ordinarily stated, the rule seems applicable only to personality. But upon both principle and authority, it seems to apply to both realty and personality. Hannam v. Sims, 2 De G. & J. 151; State v. Lyons, 5 Harr. (Del.) 196. See Goodall v. McLean, 2 Bradf. (N. Y.) 306.

devisee be dead at the date of the will, the presumption being that the testator was ignorant of the fact.¹

c. GIFTS OVER TO EXECUTORS, ADMINISTRATORS OR REPRESENTATIVES.—An immediate gift to A or his executors, administrators or personal representatives will not lapse by A's death before the testator,² but if the bequest to A be by way of remainder after a life interest, the substitutional provision is held to apply only to the case of the legatee dying between the death of the testator and that of the life tenant.³ Upon the same principle a legacy to A, to be paid one year from the testator's death or to his representatives, will lapse if A dies before the testator.⁴ Of course, if the word "representatives" can be construed next of kin, a gift to the other representatives is prima facie substitutional whether immediate or postponed.⁵ A bequest to A, his executors or administrators, merely gives A the absolute interest and will lapse by his death, although the gift be immediate.⁶

d. GIFTS TO CLASSES, SUBSTITUTIONAL AND INDEPENDENT GIFTS.—Substitutional gifts of the shares of members of a class differ from substitutional gifts of bequests to individuals named in the will, the principle of distinction being that, to determine whether such gifts are to take effect, the test in the case of a bequest to a class must necessarily be this: Was the deceased, whose supposed share is claimed, or was he not, ever a member of the class? In other words, was he, or was he not, ever an object of the gift? If not, there can be no substitution.⁷ Thus if a testator gives a legacy to a class of persons, as to the children of A, and goes on to provide, that in case of the death of any one of the children of A before the period of distribution, the issue of such child shall take their parent's share, such issue cannot take unless the parent might have taken, and consequently, if a child of A be dead at the date of the will or at the death of the testator, the issue of that child cannot take anything.⁸ Where Pennsylvania.—It seems that this distinction has been ignored, the rule being, that even in gifts, the alternative gift takes effect if the first legatee be one who would have taken as a member of the class, had he lived to the period of distribution. May's Appeal, 41 Pa. St. 522. See Long v. Labor, 8 Pa. St.

the testator provides that if any of the class die in his lifetime, the share of the members so dying is to go to their issue, he must be supposed to have in mind living persons, subject to the contingency of such persons continuing to live up to the time of his death, and the class is ascertained at the date of the will. Therefore, the issue of those who die after the date of the will take by substitution to the exclusion of the issue of those who died before the date.¹ But if the gift to the issue is original and independent, they take even though their parents died in the lifetime of the testator, or even before the date of the will.²

In determining whether any particular limitation is original or substitutional, it should be remembered that a gift to issue is substitutional when the share which the issue are to take is by a prior clause expressed to be given to the parent of such issue; and

In Christopherson v. Naylor, 1 Meriv. 320, under a bequest "to each and every the child and children of my brother and sisters which shall be living at the time of my death; but, if any child or children of my said brother and sisters shall happen to die in my lifetime, and leave issue, then the legacy or legacies hereby intended for such child or children so dying, shall be for his, her, or their issue," it was held that the issue only took by substitution, and that therefore only the issue of such children as were living at the date of the will were entitled in the event of the death of their respective parents during the testator's lifetime, Sir W. Grant saying: "The question, in this case, does not depend on the words 'shall happen to die in my lifetime.' Though, according to strict construction, importing futurity, those words might have been understood as speaking of the event, at whatever time it may happen. But the context necessarily excludes this construction. The nephews and nieces are, here, the primary legatees. Nothing whatever is given to their issue, except in the way of substitution. In order to claim, therefore, under the will, these substituted legatees must point out the original legatees in whose place they demand to stand. But, of the nephews and nieces of the testator, none could have taken besides those who were living at the date of the will. The issue of those who were dead at that time can, consequently, show no object of substitution; and to give them original legacies would be, in effect, to make a new will for the testator."

Exception.—The testator's language may, however, show that he intended the issue of persons dead at the date of the will, who would have been members of the class if alive, to take their parents' share, and in such case the intent will be given effect. Thus, where the testator directed the residue of his property to be "equally divided among my brothers and sisters and their heirs," and when the will was made there were living three brothers, one sister, and children and grandchildren of two deceased sisters; and it appeared that testator knew of the decease of his two sisters, and of the existence of their issue, it was held that the heirs of the deceased sisters took by representation equally with surviving brothers and sisters. *Huntress v. original if the share which the issue are to take is not by a prior clause expressed to be given to the parent of such issue.¹ If the gift to issue is original, it is not necessary for the issue to survive their own parent;² if substitutional, it is necessary;³ but whether in the case of an original⁴ or substitutional gift, it is necessary for the issue to survive the period of distribution.⁵

These peculiarities of original and substitutional bequests will best be understood by a careful examination of the opinion of Kindersley, V. C., in the leading case of Lanphier v. Buck, 2 D. & S. 484; better reported 34 L. J. Ch. 650. In this case a testator gave his residuary estate amongst his nephews and nieces, and after directing the share of his niece E. G., and also a sum of £1,000 which he had given her, to be held upon certain trusts, with an ultimate gift over from the benefit of which, as respected the £1,000, he excluded a niece M. L., he directed the shares of other nieces (including a niece

M. B.) and also certain sums of £1,000 given to them to be held for their separate use, respectively, for their lives, and then for their children living at their respective deceases; but in case all the children of his said other nieces, or of any or either of them, should die, either in their respective lifetimes, or after their deceases, under age and without leaving lawful issue, then upon trust "to pay, assign and transfer" their shares "equally amongst all and every his nephews and nieces who shall be living at such time or times, and to the issue of such of them as might be then dead, in equal shares and proportions (such issue to be entitled to its parent's share only), except as to the sums of £1,000 given to his other nieces, which he directed should not survive to his niece M. L., but be paid in the same manner as he had directed the £1,000 given to his niece E. G., in case of her decease without issue, or their all dying under age and without issue." The gift over of E. G.'s £1,000 was not made to take effect on E. G.'s death without issue, but "in case all the children of E. G. should die, either in her lifetime or after her decease under age, and without leaving lawful issue." M. B. died without ever having been married. Held, that the gift over took effect, that the word issue meant children of the nephews and nieces, and not issue generally; that the gift to the issue of the nephews and nieces was an original gift, and not a gift by substitution; that it was not necessary that the children who took a share should survive the tenant for life, or the gift being original, their parents.

In the above case Kindersley, V. C., said: "The gift over is to two classes, viz., the nephews and nieces who shall be living at the time when the preceding limitations terminate, and the issue (i. e., children) of such of the nephews and nieces as shall be then dead. And here it is necessary to attend to the distinction between original and substitutional gifts to issue. A gift to issue is substitutional when the share which the issue are to take is by a prior clause expressed to be given to the parent of such issue; and a gift to issue is an original gift when the share which the issue are to take is not by a prior clause expressed to be given to the parent of such issue. Thus, in the present case, the gift to the issue of such nephews and nieces as shall die before the termination of the prior limitations, is an original, and not a substitutional, gift to the issue, because the share which is to be taken by the issue of any predeceased nephew or niece is not by any prior clause expressed to be given to such predeceased nephew or niece. The issue who are to take are the issue of such nephews and nieces as shall die before the termination of the prior limitations; and nothing is given to such nephews and nieces as die before the termination of the preceding limitations, the gift to nephews and nieces being exclusively to such as shall be living at that time. On the other hand, if the gift be thus: on the death of A without issue, to nephews and nieces (generally), followed by a direction that if any of them shall die before the termination of the preceding limitations, the issue of such nephew or niece shall take his or her share—there the gift to the issue is substitutional, because the share which the issue are to take is by the prior clause given in the first instance to the nephew or niece, the parent of such issue.

"This distinction between original and substitutional gifts to issue may, at first sight, appear trivial; but a little consideration will show that, in more ways than one, it is of great importance with respect to consequences. In the former case the gift to the nephews and nieces is altogether contingent; nothing vests in any one nephew or niece until the happening of the event which terminates the prior limitations; in the latter case every nephew and niece takes a vested interest, liable only to be divested in case he or she dies before the happening of that event, leaving issue.

"And further, in the former case, the representative of any nephew or niece dying before the happening of that event, without having had issue, would take nothing; but in the latter case, if any nephew or niece should die before the event, without having had issue, his or her representative would take the share which was, in the first instance, given to and was vested in that nephew or niece, and which was not divested by his or her dying before the event, because there was no issue to take by way of substitution. The distinction, therefore, is not a trivial one, but substantial and important. The gift then, in this case, is clearly an original and independent gift to the issue (i. e., children) of any nephew or niece who died before the happening of the event which terminated the preceding limitations, viz., the death of Mary Buck, unmarried. And taken in conjunction with the gift to such nephews and nieces as should be living at that time, it does not, in principle or effect, differ from a gift, after the death of A without issue, to C and D and the children of B, in which case it is clear that all the children of B would take, whether they survived A or not. On what ground is the court to introduce, in the one case more than in the other, a condition that no child shall take who does not survive the termination of the prior limitations?

"And if the court cannot introduce such a condition where the gift to the issue (or children) is an original gift, what better reason can be assigned for doing so when the gift to the issue is substitutional? Nothing short of absolute necessity, arising out of the context, could justify such an interpolation; and it cannot be suggested that any such necessity is imposed by anything contained in this will. The reason generally assigned for holding that the issue ought to survive the termination of the prior limitations to be entitled to take, is, that it is not likely that the testator would have annexed the condition to the gift to the parents and not have annexed it to the gift to the children or issue. But it appears to me that this is altogether an insufficient ground, and that it violates a plain canon of construction for inserting the conditions. Besides, very good reason exists for imposing the condition on the parent, when the share is given to his or her issue, which does not apply to the gift to the issue.

"The conclusion, therefore, at which I have arrived is, that whether the gift to the issue be original or substitutional, the issue need not survive the happening of the event which terminates the preceding limitations.

"On examining the authorities on this question I find much difference of opinion. I think that the present Master of the Rolls, and the Lord Justice K. Bruce, are generally disposed to hold that the issue, in order to take, must survive the happening of the event which terminates the preceding limitations; although the Master of the Rolls, in Thompson v. Clive, 23 Beav. 283, and the Lord Justice Knight Bruce when Vice Chancellor, in Barker v. Barker, 5 De G. & S. 753, did not exclude such issue. On the other hand, I consider that the late Vice Chancellor of England, the Lord Justice Turner, the Vice Chancellor Stuart, and the Vice Chancellor Wood, have held that the issue need not survive the happening of the event which terminates the preceding limitations in order to take. And to these may be added Lord Langdale, although in Bennett v. Merriman, 6 Beav. 360, he excluded the issue who died before the happening of the event, on the ground of the special wording of the will, and even then expressing much doubt. Upon the whole, I think the preponderance of authority is decidedly in favor of the view which I have taken of this question. I may mention that two cases have come before myself, Harcourt v. Harcourt, 26 L. J. Ch. 536, and Humfrey v. Humfrey, 2 D. & S. 55. In one I decided in favor of the issue; in the other, with great reluctance, I followed the authorities then presented to me, which were the other way.

"The third question which has been raised is this: Assuming that the issue (i. e., the children) of nephews and nieces, in order to take, need not be living at the happening of the event which terminates the preceding limitations (which in the present case is the death of Mary Buck, without issue), must they survive their own parents? Supposing a nephew or niece died in the lifetime of Mary Buck, having had children, some one of whom predeceased its parent, will such child be entitled to take? I am of opinion that this depends upon the question whether the gift to the issue (or children) is an original or substitutional gift. If it be an original gift I see no more reason for imposing a condition that the child must survive Mary Buck. In either case, the imposing any such condition appears to me to be a violation of the plain rule of construction, which forbids the court to introduce anything into a testament, unless the context renders it absolutely necessary to do so. But, on the other hand, where the gift to the issue is not original, but sub-stitutional, that is, where the gift is in the first instance made to the parent, followed by a direction that if the parent dies before the happening of a certain event, his or her issue shall be substituted for the parent, the case is altogether different; for no substitution can take place till the death of the parent, and it would be absurd to talk of substituting for the parent at his death such of his children as were then already dead. The substitution must necessarily be of living children, not of dead children. And to hold this is not introducing into the will any condition not expressed by the testator; it is only giving effect to the testator's direction that the share, which is in the first instance given to and vested in the parent (i. e., the nephew or niece), should, in case of his or her death before the happening of a certain event, go to his or her children; that is, that the children should take, by way of substitution for their parent, the share previously given to the parent. In my opinion, therefore, the rule on this subject is, that if the gift to the issue is an original gift, they need not survive their own parent in order to take; but that if the gift to the issue is substitutional, then they must survive their parent in order to take by substitution."

Gift to Issue of Legatees Who Die Leaving Issue.—In concluding his remarks upon original and substitutional wills, in Lanphier v. Buck, 2 D. & S. 499, Kindersley, V. C., said: "There are cases where, although the gift to the issue (or children) is an original gift, the testator has, by his language, precluded children from taking who did not survive their parent. Thus, if the gift had been to such of the nephews and nieces as should be living at the happening of a certain event, and to the issue of such of the nephews and nieces as should have previously died leaving issue, those words would be a sufficient indication of the testator's intention that such children only as were left by their parent, that is, as survived their parent, should take."

In Thompson v. Clive, 23 Beav. 282, Romilly, M. R., so held as to the effect of the word leaving. But in Re Smith's Trusts, 7 Ch. Div. 665, Hall, V. C., held otherwise.

Further Distinctions.—Mr. Theobald has attempted to reconcile the English decisions upon this subject, by a series of refined distinctions not recognized in many instances by the judges who delivered the opinions. As a classification of the English authorities brought down to a late date, it cannot fail to be of interest.

"1. When there is a gift to several persons nominatim, with the substitution of their issue in the event of their death, the fact that one of the persons so named is dead at the date of the will will not prevent his issue from taking. Hannam v. Sims, 2 De G. & J. 151; Ive v. King, 16 Beav. 46; Hobgen v. Neale, L. R., 11 Eq. 48. See Barnes v. Jennings, L. R., 2 Eq. 448.

"2. If, however, the original gift is to a class, with a substitutional gift to issue, the question is, whether the issue take a share which has been given to a parent who is contemplated as capable of taking under the will, or whether they take a share which has not been previously given to their parent. In the former case, issue of parents dead at the date of the will will not take; in the latter they will.

"The important point is not whether the gift itself is substitutional, but whether the interests of persons who are contemplated as capable of taking under the will are given, in the event of their death, to substituted legatees.

"Thus, though a gift to such of a class as may be then living, or the issue of any then dead, is strictly substitutional, the issue, if they take at all, take original shares, since nothing is given to parents then dead. Attwood v. Alford, L. R., 2 Eq. 479.

"In the same way, a gift to parents 'then living,' and the issue of those then dead, is a direct substantive gift to the issue. Smith v. Smith, L. R., 5 Ch. 342; Martin v. Holgate, L. R., 1 H. L. Cas. 175. See Ashling v. Knowles, 3 Drew. 593; Ecles v. Ecles, 3 Drew. 447.

"a. If the gift is to parents and issue in one continuous sentence—as, for instance, to children then living, and the issue of those then dead—the issue of parents deceased at the date of the will take, though the issue may be directed to take only a parent's share, as this direction will be satisfied by a stirpital distribution. Tytherleigh v. Harbin, 6 Sim. 329; Rust v. Baker, 8 Sim. 443; Bebb v. Beckwith, 2 Beav. 308; Coulthurst v. Carter, 15 Beav. 421; In re Faulding's Trusts, 26 Beav. 263; In re Philp's Will, L. R., 7 Eq. 151; Heasman v. Pearse, L. R., 7 Ch. 275.

died before the testator was born would not take. Wingfield v. Wingfield, 9 Ch. Div. 658.

"If the gift is to 'my children then living, and the children of such of my said children as shall be then dead,' the testator, by using the term 'said' children, shows that he is contemplating a class of children living at the date of the will and capable of taking under it, and, therefore, children of those dead at the date of the will will not be admitted. In re Thompson's Trust, 2 W. R. 218; 5 De G. M. & G. 280. See Pell v. Catlow, 9 Sim. 372; Smith v. Pepper, 27 Beav. 86; Hall v. Woolley, 39 L. J. Ch. 106. On the other hand, if the gift is to brothers and sisters living at a particular time, and the children of such of the said brothers and sisters as should have died, and the testator has only one brother living at the date of the will, he cannot be referring to a class existing at the date of the will, and children of brothers and sisters dead at the date of the will will be admitted. In re Jordan's Trust, 2 N. R. 57; Giles v. Giles, 8 Sim. 360. See Jarvis v. Pond, 9 Sim. 549.

"If the children are expressed to be the children of parents who are beneficiaries under the will; if, for instance, the bequest is to 'my daughters and their children,' the children of a daughter dead at the date of the will take nothing. Parker v. Tootal, 11 H. L. Cas. 143. See Crook v. Whitley, 26 L. J. Ch. 350. But see Clay v. Pennington, 7 Sim. 370.

"b. When the gift is clearly substitutional, as in the case of a gift to a class or their issue, issue of members of the class dead at the date of the will will take. In re Sibley's Trusts, 5 Ch. Div. 494, overruling Congreve v. Palmer, 16 Beav. 435.

"This construction may be aided by the context. Thus, if none of the members of the original class are alive at the date of the will, or if the original class is brothers and sisters, and the testator has only one brother living at the date of the will, children of those then dead will come in. Gowling v. Thompson, L. R., 11 Eq. 366. See Barnaby v. Tassell, L. R., 11 Eq. 363; Jarvis v. Pond, 9 Sim. 549.

"c. Where the gift to the issue is in an independent clause, the question is whether the intention is to add fresh members to, or substitute them for, the original class.

"If the gift is to children living at the testator's death, with a direction that, if any should happen to die in his lifetime, the 'legacy' intended for such child should be for his issue, the word legacy shows that the testator meant to substitute only issue of parents who at the date of the will were capable of taking. Christopherson v. Naylor, 1 Meriv. 320; Hunter v. Cheshire, L. R., 8 Ch. 751. It may be doubted whether Phillips v. Phillips, 13 W. R. 170; 10 Jur. N. S. 1173, and Parsons v. Gulliford, 13 W. R. 170; 10 Jur. N. S. 231, can stand with these authorities. The same rule applies if there is no direct gift to issue, but only a direction that issue of parents dying are to stand in the place of their parents, or take their parents' share. Butter v. Ommaney, 4 Russ. 71; Gray v. Garman, 2 Hare 268; Atkinson v. Atkinson, Ir. R., 6 Eq. 184; In re Hotchkiss' Trusts, L. R., 8 Eq. 643; Habergham v. Ridehalgh, L. R., 9 Eq. 395; Kelsey v. Ellis, 38 L. T. N. S. 471.

"Where the gift was to such of the children of the testator's sisters as should survive the tenant for life, followed by a direction that in case any of such children should be dead at the testator's decease, leaving issue, such issue should take the share of their deceased parent, the issue of a child dead at the date of the will was not included. West v. Orr, 8 Ch. Div. 60. See Giles v. Giles, 8 Sim. 360.

"On the other hand, if the original gift is to a class, with a direction that the issue of any dying in the testator's lifetime, or before the period of distribution, should take the share their parents would have been entitled to if then living, the issue of those dead at the date of the will will be admitted, as the direction amounts to an independent gift, the word share being satisfied by a stirpital distribution. Loring v. Thomas, 1 D. & S. 497; In re Chapman's Will, 32 Beav. 382; Adams v. Adams, L. R., 14 Eq. 246.

"This rule has been applied where the original gift was to a class living at the death of the tenant for life. Harris v. Harris, 48 L. J. Ch. 321.

"In these cases it is not the share of the parents, or the share the parents are entitled to, which is given to the issue, but the share the parents would have been entitled to. In re Potter's Trusts, L. R., 8 Eq. 52, is a more difficult case, since there the gift was to nephews and nieces, and in case of the death of any of his said nephews and nieces, leaving issue, such issue to take the share their parents would have taken if living, the word 'said' showing that the testator referred to nephews and nieces capable of taking under the will. See In re Thompson's Trust, 2 W. R. 218; 5 De G. M. & G. 280.

"Perhaps issue of parents dead at the date of the will would not be admitted where other express provision is made for such issue. Waugh v. Waugh, 2 Myl. & K. 41.

"Whether the contingency of the original gift attaches to the substituted gift: When there is a life interest followed by a contingent gift to certain persons, and a gift, if they die before the contingency, to their children, the contingency attaching to the gift to the parents does not attach to that to the children, and the children take vested interests although they may not survive the contingency upon which the gift to the parents was to take effect. For instance, if the bequest is to A for life, then to 'such of my nephews as may be then living, and the children of such as may be then dead,' the children take vested interests upon their parents' death, whether they survive A or not.

"2. But if the gift to the children is substitutional there appears to be some difficulty. On the whole, the current of recent authority seems to be in favor of the same rule in the case of substitutional as of original gifts. Masters v. Scales, 13 Beav. 60; In re Turner, 34 L. J. Ch. 660; Lanphier v. Buck, 2 D. & S. 484; In re Merrick's Trusts, L. R., 1 Eq. 551.

"But a difficulty is created by the case of Pearson v. Stephen, in the House of Lords, 5 Bligh N. S. 203. There there was a gift to S. during coverture, and upon the death of her husband in her life to her absolutely, but if her husband should survive her, then to the testator's five sons and their respective issue per stirpes and not per capita; and it was held that in the event of S. dying in her husband's life, the sons of the testator living at such event would be absolutely entitled, but if any of the sons should die in the lifetime of S., leaving issue, such issue, if living at the death of S., would be entitled to the share their parents would have taken; but see the remarks of Kindersley, V.

25. Words Importing Death—To What Period Referred—a. WORDS REFERRING TO DEATH SIMPLY—DEATH TREATED AS A CONTINGENT EVENT—(1) When the Gift Is Immediate.—If there is an immediate gift to A, and a gift over in case of his death, or if he die, or any similar expression implying the death to be a contingent event, the gift over will take effect only in the event of A's death before the testator.¹ The rule applies where, after a gift to

"3. There is, however, this difference between a substitutional and original gift to the children, that in the former case only those children who survive the parents will take, while in the latter all the children will take, whether they survive the parents or not; but see Humfrey v. Humfrey, 2 D. & S. 129. 'The substitution takes place at the death of the nephew or niece. And then I see very good ground for saying there, by reason of its being substitution, you will not substitute dead people for the nephew or niece who has been living up to that time and has then just died.' Lanphier v. Buck, 2 D. & S. 484; 34 L. J. Ch. 657; In re Turner, 34 L. J. Ch. 660; In re Merrick's Trusts, L. R., 1 Eq. 551; Thompson v. Clive, 23 Beav. 282; *Crause v. R., 7 Ch. 275; In re Haskett, Smith's Trusts, 26 W. R. 418.

"Upon a similar principle, under a gift in certain events to a class, and the issue of such of them as shall then be dead, members of the class dying without issue before the events happen take a share. In re Wood, 29 W. R. 171.

"Whether the original and substituted class are mutually exclusive: When the gift is to a class or their issue, the further question arises whether the original and substituted legatees form two mutually exclusive classes, so that no substituted legatees can take if there are any members of the original class to take, or whether the issue of members of the original class dying can take with the surviving members of the original class.

"It is clear that if all the original class survive the period of distribution, they alone take. Sparks v. Restal, 24 Beav. 218; Margitson v. Hall, 10 Jur. N. S. 89;

12 W. R. 334. So, if none of the original class survive the period of distribution, the substituted legatees alone take. Willis v. Plaskett, 4 Beav. 208; Timins v. Stackhouse, 27 Beav. 434; Bolitho v. Hillyar, 34 Beav. 180; Attwood v. Alford, L. R., 2 Eq. 479.

"But if some of the original class die leaving children, and others survive the period of distribution: If the gift is to several persons nominatim as tenants in common, or their children, those who survive the period of distribution take, together with the children of those who die before it. Price v. Lockley, 6 Beav. 180. In the same way, in the case of a simple substitutional gift to children or their issue, to be divided amongst them in equal shares, the issue of a child dying after the testator, and before the period of distribution, take with the other children. Finlason v. Tatlock, L. R., 9 Eq. 258; Neelson v. Monro, 27 W. R. 936; In re Sibley's Trusts, 5 Ch. Div. 494. See Holland v. Wood, L. R., 11 Eq. 91.

"How the class of substituted legatees is to be ascertained, when the gift is to A for life, then to B or his issue:

"1. If B dies in the testator's lifetime, the class is ascertained at the testator's death. Ive v. King, 16 Beav. 46.

"2. If B survives the testator and dies in the lifetime of the tenant for life, the class is ascertained at B's death. Ive v. King, 16 Beav. 46; Hobgen v. Neale, L. R., 11 Eq. 48.

"But the class is not to be definitely ascertained at those periods, but will open to let in issue born afterwards and before the period of distribution. In re Sibley's Trusts, 5 Ch. Div. 494; In re Jones' Estate, 47 L. J. Ch. 775, overruling, on this point, Hobgen v. Neale, 11 Eq. 48." Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 494.

Whether, under a gift to several or their children, the children take per capita or per stirpes, see supra, this title, Construction of Gifts to Classes—Taking Per Capita or Per Stirpes.

several, there is a gift over "in case of the death of either in the lifetime of the others or other," since the death of one before the other is a certain and not a contingent event.¹

So, under a gift to A, and in case of "his decease, or at his decease, to B," A takes an absolute interest if he survives the testator.² But under a gift to A, and at his decease to B, A takes for life only, with remainder to B;³ so also, where the gift is to A for life, and in case of his death to B, as otherwise, the remainder

Thus, where a testator directed his estate to be equally divided, but, if any of his children happened to die, such child's share to go to the survivors, it was held that the death must occur in the lifetime of the testator. Sealy v. Laurens, 1 Desaus. (S. Car.) 137.

A testator devised "all his property, both real and personal," with certain specified exceptions, "to his wife;" the furniture she was to dispose of as she saw fit, "and all the rest of the property;" and then, in the concluding clause of the will, added: "In case of the death of both myself and wife, all the property and effects before mentioned as belonging to my wife shall revert to my mother." The wife survived the testator. It was held that under this will the wife took an absolute estate in the property devised to her. Dorsey v. Dorsey, 9 Md. 31.

"If, in such a case, the words are to be read literally, you have, in the first, the absolute gift, and then a gift over in the event of death, an event not contingent but certain, and in order to avoid the repugnancy of an absolute giving and an absolute taking away the court is forced to read the words 'in case of death' as meaning in case of death before the interest vests." Lord Cairns, in O'Mahoney v. Burdett, L. R., 7 H. L. Cas. 395. The context, however, may show that the testator referred to death at any time. Simpson v. Cherry, 34 S. Car. 68; *Fowler v. would not be disposed of.¹ In regard to realty, if the devisee gives A the fee, a gift over, in case of A's death, will be held to refer to his death before the testator.²

(2) When the Gift Is Postponed.—If the gift is after a life estate, or a time is appointed for payment, the words, "in case of death," refer to death at any time before the vesting in possession, whether before or after the death of the testator.³

b. WORDS REFERRING TO DEATH COUPLED WITH A CONTINGENCY.—It may be laid down as a general rule of construction that, where the context is silent, words referring to the death of a prior devisee or legatee, in connection with some collateral event, apply to the contingency happening at any time, as well after as before the death of the testator.⁴ The rule is the same whether the gift be immediate, as where the bequest is to A, and if she die unmarried, or without children or issue, to B;⁵ or postponed

In states in which the fee passes without words of limitation, it would seem to be immaterial whether the devise be to A and his heirs, or simply to A. Of course, if the devise merely gives A a life estate, the limitation over would probably be construed by way of remainder. Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 485; Bowen v. Scrowcroft, 2 Y. & C. 640. In Edwards v. Edwards, 15 Beav. 357, Romilly, M. R., held that if the gift be in remainder after a life interest, words importing death without children would prima facie be restricted to the event of death before the period of distribution.

For similar decisions in the United States, see Birney v. Richardson, 5 Dana (Ky.) 430; Wurts v. Paige, 19 N. J. Eq. 365; Wolfe v. Van Nostrand, 2 N. Y. 440; M'Graw v. Davenport, 6 Port. The doctrine was repudiated by the House of Lords. O'Mahoney v. Burdett, L. R., 7 H. L. Cas. 388; Ingram v. Soutten, L. R., 7 H. L. Cas. 408.

In O'Mahoney v. Burdett, L. R., 7 H. L. Cas. 395, Lord Cairns said, in referring to the decision of Romilly, M. R., in Edwards v. Edwards, 15 Beav. 357: "With regard to the second class of cases, namely, gifts to A for life, and if he shall die without children, over, the Master of the Rolls expresses himself thus: 'In the second of the supposed cases there is a manifest distinction. There the event spoken of, on which the legacy is to go over, is not a certain but a contingent event. It is not in case of the death of A, but in case of his death without children; and here it would be importing a meaning and adding words to the will, if it were to be construed to import as a condition which was to entitle B to take, that the death of A without children must happen before some particular period. In these cases, therefore, it has always been held that if at any time, whether before or after the death of the testator, A should die without leaving a child, the gift over takes effect and the legacy vests in B. This is established by the case of Farthing v. Allen, 2 Madd. 310, mentioned in Maddocks but reported only in Jarman on Wills, vol. 2, p. 688.' My Lords, I agree with these observations, but I must observe in passing that I am unable to understand how it is not, to use the expression of the Master of the Rolls, 'importing a meaning and adding words to the will,' if you construe it to imply, as a condition which is to entitle B to take, that the death of A without children must happen before some particular period, any more where there is not than where there is a previous life estate." In this case there was a gift of £1,000 consols to A for her life, after her death to her daughter B; "if B should die unmarried or without children, the consols I here will to revert to C." The will then appointed D residuary legatee. Both A and C died in the lifetime of the testatrix. On her death B entered into possession and married, but after some years died, without ever having had a child. Held, that on the death of B without children, the gift over to the residuary legatee took effect, and that it was not affected by the death of C in the lifetime of the testatrix. The gift to C failed by lapse, and the residuary legatee became entitled to take all that C, if living at the death of the testatrix, could have taken.

Instances in Which the Period of Defeasibility Is Limited.—"There may, however, be circumstances in the will limiting the defeasibility to some earlier time than the death of the legatee without issue. Some of the cases decided on the authority of Edwards v. Edwards, 15 Beav. 357, are probably not reconcilable with the rule laid down in Ingram v. Soutten, L. R., 7 H. L. Cas. 408. See Allen's Estate, 3 Dr. 380.

"1. Possibly, where there is a gift over, if any members of a class die without issue, to the survivors, the gift over must take effect, if at all, before the time when the survivors are to be ascertained.

"Thus, if the gift is immediate, the gift over may be limited to the happening of the event in the testator's lifetime. Johnson v. Smaling, 26 W. R. 231. See Apsey v. Apsey, 36 L. T. N. S. 941, a case apparently inconsistent with Bowers v. Bowers, L. R., 8 Eq. 283.

"If the gift is, after a life interest, to several, and if any die without issue to the survivors, the gift over may, in the same way, be limited to death without issue before the tenant for life. See Clark v. Henry, L. R., 11 Eq. 222; L. R., 6 Ch. 588; Besant v. Cox, 6 Ch. Div. 604.

"2. If the fund is vested in trustees who are directed to distribute it at a certain time, so that the trusts then determine, and the legatees who are to take upon the death of prior legatees without issue are contemplated as taking through the medium of the same trustees, there is prima facie reason for restricting the death without issue to death without issue before the period of distribution. Galland v. Leonard, 1 Swanst. 161; Wheable v. Withers, 16 Sim. 505; Edwards v. Edwards, 15 Beav. 357; Beckton v. Barton, 27 Beav. 99; Dean v. Handly, 2 H. & M. 635. See Smith v. Colman, 25 Beav. 217.

"But words directing payment or distribution at a certain time will not confine the contingency to that time, if the persons to take upon the death without issue of a prior legatee are not treated as taking through the medium of the same payment or distribution. Gosling v. Townshend, 17 Beav. 245; 2 W. R. 23.

"3. And if there are no trustees, but payment or division is directed at the death of the tenant for life, and all the subsequent dispositions are made with reference to the same payment or division, the death without issue will be confined to such death before the period of distribution. Olivant v. Wright, 1 Ch. Div. 346. See In re Anstice, 23 Beav. 135; Pearman v. Pearman, 33 Beav. 394.

"So, if there is a life tenancy and then a gift to a class to be paid when they respectively attain twenty-one, and, if any die without issue, to the survivors, to be paid at the same time as the original share, death without issue will be limited to such death under twenty-one. In re Johnson's Trusts, 10 L. T. N. S. 445; In re Hayne's Trusts, 18 L. T. N. S. 16.

"Similarly, if the gift is to A if living at the death of the tenant for life, and if not, to his children, and if he dies without children, over, the ultimate gift over is confined to the lifetime of the tenant for life. Andrews v. Lord, 8 W. R. 405. See Wood v. Wood, 35 Beav. 587; In re Hill's Trusts, L. R., 12 Eq. 302.

"4. When there is a gift over upon death, without issue, before a given time, of all the legatees whose shares have previously been given over upon death leaving issue indefinitely, or if the gift to the persons who are to take upon death of the prior legatees, without issue, is again given over upon the death of such persons before a certain time, there is a strong argument for restraining the prior gift over to death of the prior legatees without issue before the same time. In re Hayes' Will, 9 Jur. N. S. 1068; In re Sarjeant, 11 W. R. 203; Da Costa v. Keir, 3 Russ. 360. See Doe v. Sparrow, 13 East 359; Lloyd v. Davies, 15 C. B. 76; 80 E. C. L. 75.

"6. If the gift is followed by words of limitation or benefit, as 'to A, his heirs and assigns,' or 'to A forever,' or 'to A for his own use and benefit,' and the property is then given over upon contingencies, one or other of which must happen, as, for instance, upon death either with or without children, the defeasibility will be limited by the period of distribution, whether it is the testator's death or some other time, in order not to cut down the previous absolute interest to life interests merely. Doe v. Sparrow, 13 East 359; Clayton v. Lowe, 5 B. & Ald. 636; Gee v. Manchester, 17 Q. B. 737; 79 E. C. L. 735; Woodburne v. Woodburne, 23 L. J. Ch. 336; Da Costa v. Keir, 3 Russ. 360; Slaney v. Slaney, 33 Beav. 631.

"If, however, the gift is merely in general words, without any express indication that it is intended to be absolute, the fact that the contingencies upon which the property is given over in effect reduce the interest to a life interest, will not have the effect of confining the happening of the contingencies to the period of distribution. Gosling v. Townshend, 2 W. R. 23; Cooper v. Cooper, 1 K. & J. 658; Bowers v. Bowers, L. R., 8 Eq. 283; L. R., 5 Ch. 244.

26. Successive and Concurrent Interests—a. DEVISE TO A CLASS IN TAIL.—A devise to the sons of a person in tail is prima facie a gift to a class.¹ But, if there is a general intention manifest to

"7. It is not, however, necessary, in order to limit the defeasibility, that the gifts over should be upon contingencies, one or other of which must occur, so as to cut down the prior interest to a life estate, unless the defeasibility is limited.

"In Clayton v. Lowe, 5 B. & Ald. 636; Gee v. Manchester, 17 Q. B. 737, and Woodburne v. Woodburne, 23 L. J. Ch. 336, the interest of the surviving legatee would not necessarily have been reduced to a life estate, and if it is once clear that the legatee is to take an absolute interest, a gift over in one event is as inconsistent with that absolute interest as a gift over in several, one of which must occur. And accordingly, where the intention to give indefeasible interests at a particular time is clear, the gift over upon a single contingency, as upon death without issue, will be limited to death without issue before that time. Brotherton v. Bury, 18 Beav. 65; Ware v. Watson, 7 De G. M. & G. 248; In re Anstice, 23 Beav. 135; Clark v. Henry, L. R., 11 Eq. 222; L. R., 6 Ch. 588; perhaps Barker v. Cocks, 6 Beav. 82, and Davenport v. Bishopp, 2 Y. & C. C. 463, come under this head.

"8. If the gift is contingent, as to A at twenty-one, there is some reason for restricting a gift over upon death coupled with a contingency to such death under twenty-one. It seems clear that this construction would be adopted if the gift over is, upon the death of A leaving children, to his children, in order to provide for the children of A, if he dies under twenty-one leaving children. Home v. Pillans, 2 Myl. & K. 15.

"It seems the same would be the case if the person to take under the gift is the widow of the legatee. Randfield v. Randfield, 8 H. L. Cas. 225.

"The gift over upon death without issue cannot, however, be restricted to the time of vesting, where there is an express gift over upon death merely, before the time of vesting. Martineau v. Rogers, 8 De G. M. & G. 328.

"Whether the defeasibility would be limited where the gift over is to strangers is more doubtful. See Andrews v. Lord, 6 Jur. N. S. 865; and see In re Dowling's Trusts, L. R., 14 Eq. 463; Smith v. Spencer, 6 De G. M. & G. 631.

"9. Where there is a gift to two persons, and if either dies under twenty-one without issue, to the survivor, and if both die without issue, over, the defeasibility will be restricted to the age of twenty-one. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick, 13 Ves. Jr. 476; Thackeray v. Hampson, 2 Sim. & Stu. 214. See Else v. Else, L. R., 13 Eq. 196.

"10. When there is a gift at twenty-one, or upon marriage with consent, a gift over upon marriage without consent has been confined to the age of twenty-one. Desbody v. Boyville, 2 P. Wms. 547; Knapp v. Noyes, Amb. 662; Osborn v. Brown, 5 Ves. 527; West v. West, 4 Giff. 198; Duggan v. Kelly, 10 Ir. Eq. 295.

"11. It may be noticed that where there is a gift to several, and in case of the death of any to the survivors, and if they die without children, over, the gift, in case of death, will not be extended to mean death at any time, nor will the gift upon death without children be confined to such death in the lifetime of the testator. Clarke v. Lubbock, 1 Y. & C. C. 492; Child v. Giblett, 3 Myl. & K. 71." Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 486.

Alternative Gifts.—The doctrine as to alternative gifts (see part 6 of extract from Theobald) was recognized in Umstead's Appeal, 60 Pa. St. 365. Barrell v. Barrell, 38 N. J. Eq. 62.

Testator directed his trustees to purchase lands in the counties of N. and D., to be settled, on the death of the eldest son of J. S. without issue (which happened), to the use of every son of J. S. then living, or who should be born in the testator's lifetime, and the assigns of such son during his life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; but to permit such son and his assigns to receive the rents during his life, and after his decease to the use of such son's first and every other son successively in tail male, and on failure of such issue, to the testator's right heirs. Held, that the younger sons of J. S. took as tenants in common for life, with remainders as to each son's share to his first and other sons in tail male, with cross remainders keep the estates together in a single line of enjoyment, the members of the class will take successively.¹

b. GIFTS TO PARENT AND CHILDREN—(Compare supra, this title, Devise to A, or to A for Life, or to A and His Heirs, and if He Die Without Issue, Over; also Gift to A and His Children—Rule in Wild's Case).—Where a testator gives property to a parent and his children, simpliciter, and there are children then in existence, the children and the parent take the property together, either as joint tenants or as tenants in common, according to the words of the will; but if there be any superadded words, which import a desire that the property should be settled, the court will lay hold of the words, and will infer a gift to the parent for life with remainder to the children.²

W. C., after devising an estate for life to A. and B. in succession, with remainder in each case to trustees, devised the same estate to the first son of the body of B. in tail male; and in default of such issue to the second, third, and all and every other the son and sons of B. severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, to the third and all and every other the son and sons of the body of A., and the heirs male of such son and sons; and in default of such issue, to his own (the testator's) right heirs in fee. A. died in 1820, leaving six sons. B. died in 1845, without leaving issue male. Upon the death of B., J. C., the third son of A., entered into possession, and continued in possession down to the time of his death in 1856, and thereupon his eldest son entered into possession. On bill filed by the three younger sons of A., the court held that the devise to the third and all and every other the son and sons of the body of A. did not give them an estate in joint tenancy, or a tenancy in common, but an estate in succession in tail male, and that J. C. took the entirety; and he having executed a disentailing deed, his heir at law was entitled to the estate in fee. Cradock v. Cradock, 4 Jur. N. S. 626.

The fact that the gift is to testator's wife, in trust for herself and children, does not necessarily show that they are not to take concurrently. Newill v. Newill, L. R., 7 Ch. 253.

"But, if there is anything to show that the parent is to take a different interest from that of the children, he will take for life, with remainder to the children.

"1. If the bequest is to A and his children as tenants in common, if more than one, showing that the tenancy in common is to apply to children only, the father takes for life. Doe v. Burn-sall, 6 T. R. 30; 1 B. & P. 215, where issue must have meant children, by the force of the gift over in default of issue of such issue. See Doe v. Elvey, 4 East 313.

"2. A devise to A and his children, and the heirs of the parent and children, gives a joint estate in fee, or an estate tail to the parent, according as there are or are not children living at the time of the devise. Oates v. Jackson, 2 Stra. 1172; Underhill v. Roden, 2 Ch. Div. 494.

"But a devise to A and his children, and the heirs of the children, would give A an estate for life with remainder to his children. Jeffery v. Honey-wood, 4 Madd. 211, was decided on this ground, though it would seem the word heir referred to the parent as well as the children.

"3. If the bequest is to a father and his children, and there is a desire expressed that the whole fund should be settled or secured, a term which would have no meaning as applied to the father's interest as joint tenant, the father takes for life. Vaughan v. Headfort, 10 Sim. 639; Combe v. Hughes, L. R., 14 Eq. 415.

"If a continuing trust is created, which is contemplated as outlasting the parent's life, there is room for a similar argument in favor of a life interest in the parent. Ogle v. Corthorn, 9 Jur. 325.

"4. Whether, where the gift is to the separate use of the mother, it will be considered a sufficient indication of intention to cut the interest of the parent down to a life interest is not certain. On the whole, the better opinion seems to be that where the words creating the separate use apply to the whole fund or legacy, it will be construed as giving the mother a life interest. Newman v. Nightingale, 1 Cox 341; French v. French, 11 Sim. 257; Bain v. Lescher, 11 Sim. 397; Froggatt v. Wardell, 3 De G. & S. 685; Dawson v. Bourne, 16 Beav. 29; Jeffery v. De Vitre, 24 Beav. 296; Scott v. Scott, 11 Ir. Ch. 114; Ogle v. Corthorn, 9 Jur. 325, in which case the Vice Chancellor Wigram thought that a gift to the separate use was conclusive against the children participating with their mother. Combe v. Hughes, L. R., 14 Eq. 415. On the other hand the case of DeWitte v. De Witte, 11 Sim. 41, and Bustard v. Saunders, 7 Beav. 92 (which, however, only followed DeWitte v. DeWitte, 11 Sim. 41), are inconsistent with this rule.

"If the interest of the mother alone is given to her separate use, or the separate use attaches to the interests of all alike, no argument in favor of a life estate can be founded upon the separate use. Fisher v. Webster, L. R., 14 Eq. 283; Newsom's Trusts, L. R., 1 Ir. 373. The same is the case if her interest only is directed to cease on marriage. Izod v. Izod, 11 W. R. 452.

"5. If upon the marriage of their mother the fund is to be divided among the children, this affords an argument that it is not to be divided before, and the mother takes for life or till marriage. Mill v. Mill, Ir. R., 9 Eq. 104; Ir. R., 11 Eq. 158.

"6. If the whole fund is contemplated as remaining undisposed of, if there are no children, if there is a gift over for instance in default of children, the same construction is adopted. Audsley v. Horn, 26 Beav. 195; 1 De G. F. & J. 226. See Lampley v. Blower, 3 Atk. 396.

"7. If the children are contemplated as taking shares in the whole fund by a direction, for instance, that if there is but one child, the whole is to go to that child, since the children are to take the whole, the parent to take nothing must take a life interest. Garden v. Pulteney, Amb. 499; 2 Eden 323; Audsley v. Horn, 26 Beav. 195; 1 De G. F. & J. 226.

"8. If the bequest is such as expressly to include all the children of the parent, and not merely those in being at the period of distribution, it will be construed to give a life estate to the parent, with remainder to the children, since it is a singular intention to impute to the testator that the parent's interest in the estate should continually diminish on the birth of a new child. Jeffery v. De Vitre, 24 Beav. 296; Jeffery v. Honeywood, 4 Madd. 211.

"9. If the legacy is payable in part at once, and in part at a future period, the parent will take for life, as otherwise different classes of children might take the two portions. Morse v. Morse, 2 Sim. 485.

"10. If, in the event of the mother's death before the testator, the children are to take unequal shares, the presumption of joint tenancy is apparently rebutted. Armstrong v. Armstrong, 7 Eq. 518.

"11. If the children are contemplated as not enjoying the property till after their mother's death, by being called heirs, for instance, the parent takes for life only. Crawford v. Trotter, 4 Madd. 192; Ogle v. Corthorn, 9 Jur. 325; Wilson v. Vansittart, Amb. 561.

"12. There may be a reference to another gift, to assist the court in giving the parent a life interest. French v. French, 11 Sim. 257; In re Owen's Trusts, L. R., 12 Eq. 316.

"13. An executory trust for A and her children will be settled on A for life, and afterwards for her children. In re Bellasis' Trust, L. R., 12 Eq. 218." Theobald on Wills (2d ed.) 314.

Instances Illustrating the Rule.—

After several devises and bequests, the testator declared as follows: "All the residue and remainder of my estate, of every description, and wherever found, I order and direct to be divided into twenty-two shares, and divided as follows: to wit, S. four shares," etc.; then naming thirteen others, and giving each a different number of shares, the aggregate amounting to but twenty shares.

It was held that the remaining shares were undisposed of by the will, and did not pass to the legatees named. Duffield v. Morris, 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 348.

A testatrix made a will, wherein, after giving several legacies, she used these words: "The residue of my property, after paying my just debts, I give and bequeath to M. and D., constituting them residuary legatees to all my property not otherwise disposed of, whether real or personal, for their use and benefit, and after the death of D., what remains of her part to be put at interest for the benefit of P. and R." She afterwards made a codicil, wherein she said: "First. The one moiety or half of my estate, which in said will I devised to A. I do, by this codicil, devise jointly to said A. and his wife E., as a life estate, to hold, possess, and enjoy by them, or either of them who may survive the other, during his or her natural life. Second. The moiety which, etc., I devised to B., by this codicil my will is, that after the decease of said B., said moiety is to descend to C. and D. and F. equally." It was held that, as to the one moiety, M. and D. took but a life estate in the real estate, and the income only of the personal estate, and that the reversionary interest was to be regarded as undivided property of the testatrix, and was to be distributed to her next of kin by the statute of distributions. Pickering v. Langdon, 22 Me. 413.

Where a testator by his will expressed his intention to dispose of the bulk of his estate by deeds and notes, and, after certain specific bequests to his wife, gave a pecuniary legacy to one granddaughter, who, he declared, should have only the amount so bequeathed to her, but died without making any other disposition of his estate, it was held that he died intestate as to the property not specifically bequeathed, and that the same descended to his heirs at law, including the said granddaughter. Hitchcock v. Hitchcock, 35 Pa. St. 293.

pay his debts and to pay his wife twenty-two pounds, and gave legacies to his children by name, and ordered his executor to have his estate, real and personal, appraised, and if the value amounted to more than the sums bequeathed, the surplus was to be divided among the legatees in proportion to their legacies; and if less, then a deduction to be made in like proportion, provided that his debts should be first paid; and he declared that it was to be understood that all of the legatees and heirs named were to receive their several sums out of his estate, the lands and chattels which he left at his death, and he appointed two of his sons and legatees his executors. It was held that there was no devise of the real estate; that, at most, the executors only had a power to sell the land, and that, if so, the lands until sold descended to the heirs. Jackson v. Burr, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 104; Jackson v. Schaubert, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 187; Catton v. Taylor, 42 Barb. (N. Y.) 578; Reed v. Underhill, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 115.

Where it appeared from the face of the will that certain slaves directed to be emancipated (ineffectually) were not intended to be included in a clause bequeathing a residue, it was held that such slaves would go to the next of kin as property undisposed of by the will. Feimster v. Tucker, 5 Jones Eq. (N. Car.) 69.

Property Undisposed of in Consequence of Unexecuted Power.—A testator made the following devise: "I will and bequeath the residue of my estate to my wife, to manage the same as she may think most advisable, for her own support and for the support and education of our children, as long as she remains a widow, and should she again intermarry, it is my will that my property should be divided between her and my children, agreeable to the laws of North Carolina; and should she not intermarry until my children become of lawful age, I hereby invest her with full authority to divide my property among them as she may deem most expedient." It was held that the widow, remaining unmarried until her death, had no right to make disposition of this property at her discretion by will, but that in such event she had a life estate, and the property after her death was to be divided among the children of her testator, as it would have been divided if he had died intestate. Phifer v. Phifer, 6 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 155. See Holt v. Hogan, 5 Jones Eq. (N. In Fitch v. Weber, 6 Hare 145, the testatrix devised and bequeathed her real and personal estate in trust, as to the real estate, for sale, as soon after her decease as conveniently could be, and declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the proceeds of the sale as a fund of personal and not real estate, for which purpose such proceeds, or any part thereof, should not, in any event, lapse or result for the benefit of her heir at law; and, after giving legacies, the testatrix directed her trustees to pay and apply the residue of her estate and effects as she should, by any codicil to that her will, direct or appoint. The testatrix made no codicil. Held, that the heir at law was entitled to the proceeds of the real estate undisposed of by the will, Wigram, V. C., saying: "What, in the first place, is the purpose for which the testatrix says she excludes the heir? It is simply that the real estate may be made a fund of personal estate. But that purpose will not per se disinherit the heir, except for the purposes of the will; and if the purposes for which the heir at law is excluded may be taken as the measure of the intended effect of the exclusion, the clause will disinherit the heir for the purpose of the will, but no further."

"According to the older cases, a gift to the testator's widow, in lieu of all claims upon his estate or in lieu of thirds, does not deprive her of a share in property undisposed of. This has been so held where a complete disposition was attempted to be made by the testator. Pickering v. Stanford, 2 Ves.

c. UNEXHAUSTED INTEREST IN LANDS DEVISED FOR SPECIAL PURPOSES.—Where the whole legal estate is given for the purpose of satisfying trusts expressed, and these trusts do not, in their execution, exhaust the whole, so much of the beneficial interest as is not exhausted belongs to the heir. But where the whole legal interest is given for a particular purpose, with an intention to give to the devisee the beneficial interest, if the whole is not exhausted by that particular purpose, the surplus goes to the devisee, as it is intended to be given to him. Under this distinction a devise charged with debts gives the devisee the beneficial interest in the surplus; but a devise upon trust to pay debts gives rise to a resulting trust in the surplus for the benefit of the heir at law.¹

Jr. 272, 581; 3 Ves. Jr. 332, 492. And the same rule has been applied in cases where there was, on the face of the will, an intestacy. Johnson v. Johnson, 4 Beav. 318; Travenor v. Grindley, 32 L. T. N. S. 424. Possibly, if the words of exclusion are large and comprehensive, and there is an intestacy on the face of the will, a gift in lieu of all claims and demands would exclude the widow from a share in property undisposed of. Lett v. Randall, 3 S. & G. 83. Upon similar principles, a direction that one of the next of kin shall take no share in the testator's property will not prevent him from taking his share under the Statutes of Distribution. Johnson v. Johnson, 4 Beav. 318; Sykes v. Sykes, L. R., 4 Eq. 200; L. R., 3 Ch. 301. See Ramsay v. Shelmerdine, L. R., 1 Eq. 129; Gould v. Gould, 32 Beav. 391.

Vachell*, 5 Bro. P. C. 51; 11 Vin. Ab. 185. And a clause excluding some of the next of kin may be so framed as in effect to amount to a gift to the others. Bund v. Green, 12 Ch. "If I give to A and his heirs all my real estate, charged with my debts, that is a devise to him for a particular purpose, but not for that purpose only. If the devise is upon trust to pay my debts, that is a devise for a particular purpose, and nothing more. The former is a devise of an estate of inheritance for the purpose of giving the devisee the beneficial interest, subject to a particular purpose; the latter is a devise for a particular purpose, with no intention to give him any beneficial interest." Lord Eldon in King v. Denison, 1 Ves. & B. 272.

Every conversion, however absolute, will be deemed a conversion for the purpose of the will only, unless the testator distinctly indicates a different intention. Richards v. Miller, 62 Ill. 418.

Hence, when land is required to be converted into money for certain purposes, and more is sold than is required for those purposes, the surplus proceeds will be treated as land. Cook v. Cook, 20 N. J. Eq. 377.

f. DEVOLUTION OF INCREASE IN RENTALS DEVISED TO CHARITY—THETFORD SCHOOL CASE.—Where a testator gives for charitable purposes the whole of an estate, or all the rents of an estate, apportioning the rents so as to exhaust them in charity, any increase in the rents must be applied to the same charitable purposes.¹ So again, where a testator has expressed in his will

1. Beverley v. Atty. Gen'l, 6 H. L. Cas. 310; Thetford School Case, 8 Co. 130; Atty. Gen'l v. Johnson, Amb. 190; 2 Story's Eq. Jur., § 1178. See Atty. Gen'l v. Trinity Church, 9 Allen (Mass.) 422.

The principle had its origin in the Thetford School Case, 8 Co. 130 b., in which land of the value of £35 a year was devised to certain persons, and their heirs, for the maintenance of a preacher, etc., of a master and usher, and of a grammar school, and of certain poor people; special distribution was made amongst them by the testator in the same will; the sums distributed amounting in the whole to £35 per annum, the then yearly profit of the land. The land became of greater value. Held, that the revenue and profit of the said land should be employed to the increase of the stipend of the preacher, schoolmaster, etc., and poor, and if any surplusage remained, it should be expended for the maintenance of a greater number of poor, etc., and nothing should be converted by the devisees to their own use.

In Atty. Gen'l v. Bristol, 2 J. & W. 307, 320, Lord Eldon said: "The doctrine laid down in the Thetford Case, which has been adhered to since, was that if the whole land and rents of it at the time are given for a charity, those to whom the lands are given must, if there is an increase in the rents, apply them to charitable purposes. There are other cases where the same doctrine has been held, not only where the gift has been of lands, but where it has been of rents and profits. . . . If a testator gives all his lands to charitable uses, and then mentions some, but not so many as to exhaust the whole value of the land, yet the gift will carry all the rents and profits in point of application to charitable purposes."

And in referring to the application of the principle to a devise of rents and profits, he further observed, in Atty. Gen'l v. Skinners' Co., 2 Russ. 443: "There are many cases which have decided that, where it appears on the will itself what was the yearly value of the estates given to charitable purposes, and the testator has parceled among the different charities the whole of that yearly rent or value so attributed to the property, any future increase of rents must go to charity. The court seems to have said that the testator has himself declared what constitutes the whole of the estate, and that in parceling out his dispositions to charity, he has exhausted in charity what, he himself has said, constitutes the whole of the estate; and, from the circumstance of his knowing what was the then present value of the estate, and devoting it exclusively to charity, we have inferred an intention on his part that the whole of the estate should be given to charitable purposes. The doctrine of these cases is neither more nor less than this: A gift of the rents and profits of an estate is a gift of the estate itself; such a devise as I have just mentioned is the gift of the rents and profits; it is therefore a gift of the estate." Of course, if the particular objects of the charity have ceased to exist, so that the surplus cannot be so applied, a question might arise as to the application of the cy pres doctrine, as to which see Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen (Mass.) 539.

Cases Not Within the Rule.—"The cases not coming within the rule in the Thetford School Case will fall under two heads.

"1. Where the sums given to the various charitable objects do not exhaust the whole annual value of the lands at the time of the devise. (Atty. Gen'l v. Bristol, 2 J. & W. 294.) If property be given to a corporate body, and certain annual sums are directed to be paid thereout, which are less (by however small an amount) than the annual rents at the time of the devise, the rule does not apply, and the corporate body will in general be held to take the increased rents for their own benefit.

"Thus, in Atty. Gen'l v. Brazenose College, 2 Cl. & F. 295, where the rent was at the time of the devise £66. 13s. 4d. a year by the foundation accounts, that he intends to devote the whole of some particular property to charities, and has then gone on to say so much to one and so much to another, but not so as to exhaust the whole property, the court fastens upon the intention expressed in the beginning of the bequest, and although the testator has not so apportioned, yet, according to its well-known jurisdiction to make a scheme for charity, it has devoted the whole to charity.¹ Thus, if a testator gives the whole of his estate to charity, apportioning the rents, such as they are, amongst the different charitable objects, if those rents increase, the increase must go in the proportions in which the testator had given the original rents. So, if a testator declares his intention to give the whole to charity, but specifically appropriates only a certain part, still, the general intention in favor of charity prevails, and the proportion not appropriated by him will be appropriated by the court of chancery to charity.²

and the charges upon it amounted to £65 3s. 4d. only, the increased rents were held to belong to the college. So in Atty. Gen'l v. Trinity College, Cambridge, 34 Beav. 383, where the testator devised real estates, which he described as 'of the yearly value of fourscore pounds or thereabouts,' to the college, and at the testator's death the rents exceeded the specific payments to be made thereout by £1 6s. 8d., the college was entitled to the whole surplus rents.

"2. The rule in the Thetford School Case does not apply, where the whole rents at the time of the devise are disposed of by the will, but part only of the rents is given to charitable objects, and the remaining part, under the name of surplus or overplus, is given to a corporate body, or some other object not charitable. In such cases the charitable objects have no claim to absorb the whole of the increased rents, and the corporate body, or other person to whom the surplus rents are given, will in general be entitled, after making the specific payments to the charitable objects, to take the whole of the increased rents. (Southmolton v. Atty. Gen'l, 5 H. L. Cas. 1; Beverley v. Atty. Gen'l, 6 H. L. Cas. 310.)

"It may, however, be a question in such cases, whether there is to be a proportionate augmentation of the sums devoted to charitable purposes; but such a proportionate distribution of the increased rents will not, it appears, be made without a special intention appearing to that effect. (Atty. Gen'l v. Skinners' Co., 2 Russ. 438, 443.) However, where the testator directed lands of the value of £100 a year to be purchased, and gave £96 to charity, and gave 'the residue of the said sum, being £4 yearly,' to the Drapers' Company for their pains, it was held that all the objects were entitled ratably to the increased rents. (Atty. Gen'l v. Drapers' Co., 4 Beav. 67.)" Hawkins on Wills *65.

See also, for a case held not within the principle, by reason of the peculiar provisions of the will, Atty. Gen'l v. Trinity Church, 9 Allen (Mass.) 422.

So, also, "if the testator has manifested a general intention to give to charity, the failure of the particular mode in which the charity is to be effectuated shall not destroy the charity; but if the substantial intention is charity, the law will substitute another mode of devoting the property to charitable purposes, though the formal intention as to the mode cannot be accomplished." Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. Jr. 69.

2. Lord Cranworth, in Beverley v. Atty. Gen'l, 6 H. L. Cas. 319. In this case Lord Cranworth said, in speaking of the principles laid down in the text: "Now those are the general rules which have been acted upon for so long a period that it would be extremely dangerous and impolitic to enter into any question as to whether they were, in their inception, founded in very good sense or not. Many of the most eminent judges, from time to time, have pointed out that if the doctrine, which we are now familiar with, of resulting trusts had been understood in those days as it is understood now, in all probability that construction of those devises or bequests would never have been adopted, because it is a well-known rule of law that the heir at law is not to be disinherited of anything that would come by descent to him, unless by express words or necessary implication. And Lord Hardwicke and Lord Eldon both intimated their strong opinion that if the question was now untouched by decisions, if a testator gave only £35 a year to charity, and afterwards the estate became more valuable than £35 a year, the right of the heir at law would not be affected. I do not, however, propose now at all to question that general doctrine; whether rightly or wrongly established in its origin, the doctrine is now established, and it would be very improper to depart from it. But Lord Eldon remarked, in a case that came before him in investigating this matter, in which he gave a judgment which has been almost the foundation of all our reasoning on this subject since Atty. Gen'l v. Mayor of Bristol, 2 Jac. & W. 294, that, after all, this question must in each case be looked at as one of construction, in order to see what is the fair inference to be deduced from the will of the testator. There may be circumstances in the case to show that the general doctrine is not applicable. Lord Eldon says, in Atty. Gen'l v. Mayor of Bristol, 2 Jac. & W. 294: 'As far as I have read these ancient cases,' and it seems he had quite exhausted the subject by reading them all, 'they state it to depend upon the intention of the donor, and that one way of finding out that intention is, to inquire whether the whole of the annual value of the property was at the time of the foundation of the charity distributed amongst the objects of the charity. If it was, they say that that circumstance is evidence of the donor's intention to give the whole of the increased value to the same object.' The same doctrine was adopted by your Lordships' House in a case to which I shall presently call your attention, Mercers' Co. v. Atty. Gen'l, 2 Bligh N. S. 165, and which came before this House soon after Lord Lyndhurst had received the Great Seal, in 1827 or 1828. All these cases to which I have referred, in which the doctrine has been applied, are cases where the whole property has been given to charity. Up to a very recent period I have been unable to discover any case in which that doctrine has been applied where there was known by the testator to be any surplus of which he had not expressly or impliedly disposed. Lord Eldon remarked, in the Bristol Case: 'If I give an estate to trustees, and take notice that the payments are less than the amount of the rents, no case has gone so far as to say that the cestui que trust, even in the case of a charity, is entitled to the surplus.'

In the same case, Lord Wensleydale said: "There is no question whatever with respect to the principle of law which ought to be applied to the case. My noble and learned friend has explained the law laid down in the Thetford School Case, 8 Rep. 130b, ed. 1826, and afterwards in the case of Atty. Gen'l v. Mayor of Bristol, 2 Jac. & W. 294, and the other cases to which he has referred. There is no question at all that if a testator or a donor gives the whole rents of an estate to charity, all the improved rents must go to charity also. And if, according to the doctrine of the Thetford School Case, he apportioned all the rents amongst all the charitable objects existing at the time of his gift, although he makes no express declaration that the surplus shall be appropriated to charity, the surplus rents must be divided in the same way. And if he leaves the surplus rents to those persons who are to administer the fund, those surplus rents are not to go to charity, but to be for the benefit of the persons to whom he leaves them."

WINDMILL.—See note 2.

WINDOW.—A window is an opening in the wall of a building for the admission of light and air to the interior, and to enable those within to look out.³

WINE.—(See also INTOXICATING LIQUORS, vol. 11, p. 582).—Wine is the fermented juice of the grape.⁴

1. Before the Wind Distinguished from "Going off Large"—(See also NAVIGATION, vol. 16, p. 270).—There is, in nautical technicality, a difference between "going off large" and "going before the wind." "Going off large" is when the wind blows from some point abaft the beam, or over the quarter of the ship. "Going before the wind" is when the wind is free, comes over the stern, and the ship's yards are braced square across. Hall v. The Buffalo, 11 Fed. Cas., p. 214, No. 5927. Notwithstanding the technical distinction, the court said that the statute as to the exhibition of lights by sailing craft made no distinction between a vessel "going off large" and "going before the wind."

2. Warranty.—Defendant contracted with plaintiffs for the purchase of a certain windmill, tank fixtures, etc.; the warranty was on "the within ordered windmill." It was contended that the warranty on the windmill did not cover the tank; the court held otherwise, saying: "It is contended that the warranting 'the within ordered windmill,' indorsed on the back of the contract, does not cover the tank used in connection therewith. This position is not tenable. The word 'windmill' used in the contract of warranty refers to the whole machine as ordered by the defendant. Plaintiffs contracted to supply defendant with an appliance for drawing water and storing it for use of defendant's stock. Defendant was as much concerned in the tank or in the pump as in the mill proper. We construe the contract in the light of the circumstances, and, so construing, we must hold that the warranty includes tank, pump, mill—the whole plant." Fairbanks v. De Lissa, 36 Mo. App. 719.

3. Insurance Contract.—Hale v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co., 46 Mo. App. 508, citing Bouvier's and Worcester's Dictionaries. In that case, an insurance policy provided that plate glass windows of a certain size should be separately insured. Plaintiff contended that a plate glass front, which was immovable and stationary, was not a window, as the glass was part of the front of the building. This contention was upheld by the court, which said: "It is a matter of common information that glass enters almost as extensively into the construction of modern buildings as stone, wood, iron, etc. Its use is not so restricted in modern architecture as formerly. There are to be found, in almost any American city, houses into the structure of which glass so largely enters that they might, without impropriety, be characterized as 'glass houses.' These considerations would indicate that the clause in question is at least susceptible of the interpretation claimed by the assured. And the rule of construction in such cases is, that if there is a doubt in respect to the meaning of the terms of a clause of an insurance policy, that doubt must be resolved in favor of the interpretation of the assured, although intended otherwise by the insurer."

Covenant.—But, in Burt v. Haslett, 18 C. B. 162, 893; 86 E. C. L. 162, 893, it was held that a plate glass shop front fixed with wooden wedges, without screws, nails or glue, and removable without injury to the premises, was a window affixed or belonging to the premises within a covenant to deliver up the premises "with all windows," etc.

Bay Windows.—As to windows projecting over sidewalk, see STREETS AND SIDEWALKS, vol. 24, p. 38.

Spirituos Liquors.—In Caswell v. State, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 403, it was held that wine was not a spirituous liquor. The court said: "The question for consideration is, whether wine is a spirituous liquor within the meaning of the statute, passed in the year 1837, ch. 120, making it a misdemeanor to retail spirituous liquors. We think it is not. Wine is a fermented liquor. Spirits are distilled liquors. And this distinction exists, not only in common parlance, but is recognized by chemists and philologists. Mr. Webster, in his 18th definition of the word 'spirit,' calls it a strong, pungent, stimulating liquor, obtained by distillation, as rum, brandy, gin, whisky. Wine he defines to be the fermented juice of grapes. Dr. Johnson defines spirit to be an inflammable liquor, raised by distillation, and wine the fermented juice of the grape. The word 'spirit' is derived from the Latin word spiritus, one meaning of which is life. The discovery of the art of distillation belongs to the Alchemists, who made it in the course of their investigations after what they called the elixir vitae, a liquid the discovery of which was to render man immortal. When, by distillation, they had procured pure alcohol, judging from its effects, they for a while were deluded by the hope that the grand secret had been discovered, and called it aqua vitae, water of life. Brandy is still so called by the French, eau de vie. The English, in adopting a name, have taken the word spiritus as the root from which to form it, instead of the more common word vitæ." To the same effect are Caswell v. State, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 402; Fritz v. State, 1 Baxt. (Tenn.) 17; State v. Moore, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 118.

But in State v. Giersch, 98 N. Car. 720, it was held that where a statute of North Carolina prohibited the introduction and sale of spirituous liquors, those terms were generic and included all intoxicating liquors containing alcohol, whether distilled, fermented or vinous. This case is disapproved in Sarlls v. U. S., 152 U. S. 574, but is in line with Kizer v. Randleman, 5 Jones (N. Car.) 428.

Judicial Notice—Intoxicating Liquor.—The court takes judicial notice that wine is an intoxicating liquor. Wolf v. State, 59 Ark. 297, citing 11 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law 582. See also Jones v. Surprise, 64 N. H. 243; State v. Packer, 80 N. Car. 439; State v. Williamson, 21 Mo. 496.

1. Gambling Contracts.—In Pearce v. Foote, 113 Ill. 228; 55 Am. Rep. 414, it was held that option dealings in grain, where no property passes, or is expected by either party to pass, are void as gambling contracts, and money paid thereon may be recovered, under the statute, from the broker of the party as the "winner." The court said: "There is and can be no such thing as agency in the perpetration of crimes or misdemeanors, or indeed in the doing of any unlawful act. All persons actively participating are principals. Treating all the parties engaged as principals, it is immaterial to which one the money or property lost was in fact paid or delivered—whether to Hooker & Co., or to any of the parties on the board of trade with whom they may have made fictitious contracts, and lost—and paying to either principal is, in law, paying to the winner."

In Triplett v. Seelbach, 91 Ky. 32, it was held that the proprietor of a gaming house, who received a certain per cent. of the winnings of each game, called the "take-out," was interested in the winnings to that extent and was therefore a "winner" within the meaning of Kentucky statute which gives a right of action to the loser. The court said: "We do not understand that the winner, in the sense of said statute, must be one of the players, with cards in his hands; but if he is to receive a per cent. of the winnings by the actual player, he is, in the sense of the statute, a winner. He, according to an arrangement with the players and himself, is to receive a part of the winnings as his profits. Why should he not be regarded as a winner in the sense of the statute? He certainly has a community of interest in the stakes with whoever wins, and this interest is the result of an arrangement with all the players, and this arrangement and division makes him a joint wrongdoer with the winner; it makes no difference which one it may be. If, by an arrangement, the winning was divided between the actual player and another, there is no doubt that the latter would be responsible as a joint wrongdoer for the whole sum won as a winner. Here the arrangement does not make him a partner with any particular player as against the others, but it does make him jointly interested with the winner in the stakes. It is true that he may be indifferent as to which will be the winner; but as soon as one or the other has won, the arrangement gives him a joint interest in the winning with

WISH.—The courts have often to determine whether the word wish, as used by the testator, gives rise to a precatory trust. In the notes will be found some cases in which the term has been held to create such a trust, and others in which, under the circumstances, it has been held not to.¹

WITH.—The preposition with is, in general, used as denoting connection, appendage, company of, concomitance,² along with in place or time.

the actual player, which makes him, in the sense of the statute, a winner. It is not to be understood that the actual winner cannot recover from him said per cent. of his own stakes; but this is so because the statute gives the remedy against him in the sense that he is a winner, even from the successful player; but, nevertheless, he is jointly interested with the winner in the loser's losses, which makes him responsible for them as a joint wrongdoer. It is not the extent but the community of interest that makes wrongdoers responsible for the whole wrong. If each is to receive a certain amount of the result of the unlawful enterprise, this gives them such a community of interest as to render each responsible for the whole amount received."

1. In the following cases, a trust was held to have been created: McRee v. Means, 34 Ala. 349; Cook v. Ellington, 6 Jones Eq. (N. Car.) 371; Bliven v. Seymour, 88 N. Y. 469; Phillips v. Phillips, 112 N. Y. 197; 8 Am. St. Rep. 737; Liddard v. Liddard, 28 Beav. 266.

In the following cases, a trust was held not to have been created: Hopkins v. Glunt, 111 Pa. St. 287; Lines v. Darden, 5 Fla. 51; Montreal Bank v. Bower, 17 Ont. Rep. 548.

2. Hart v. Fanny Ann, 6 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 51.

Exemption Statutes.—A Vermont statute exempted from execution "two horses . . . with sufficient forage for the keeping of the same." It was held that the exemption of forage was an independent claim or right, not conditioned upon the debtor's having the exempt animals. The court said: "The preposition with, as here used, is to be construed as connecting two independent subjects rather than as joining a dependent or qualifying clause to one subject. It is the same as if it read, a yoke of oxen and in addition forage." Kimball v. Woodruff, 55 Vt. 229.

With and Of.—In Cochran v. State, 30 Ala. 546, it was held no variance where the indictment charged the playing to have been at a game of cards, and the statutory form charged the playing to have been at a game with cards.

Filing with.—The provision of the thirteenth section of the chapter of the Revised Statutes of Illinois, entitled "Ne exeat and Injunctions," authorizing affidavits filed with the bill and answer to be read on motions to dissolve injunctions, must not be construed as requiring the affidavits to be filed at the same time with the bill and answer to authorize them to be read, but only to be filed in the case with the bill or answer, no matter when, so it is before the hearing of the motion. Hummert v. Schwab, 54 Ill. 142.

But in Hossler v. Hartman, 82 Pa. St. 55, it was held to be a sufficient compliance with the rule that the plaintiff should file with his declaration or statement an affidavit of claim, that they both be filed at the same time; and that the rule did not require them to be attached or deposited in the same pigeonhole.

In order to recover an attorney's fee, the statute provided that an affidavit should be filed with the original papers. In Wilkins v. Troutner, 66 Iowa 559, the court said: "The statute uses the expression 'filed with the original papers.' It is said that 'with' is not synonymous with 'at the same time.' Ordinarily this may be so, but we think it must be so construed in the statute under consideration. If this is not so, then the statute is meaningless, unless it can be said that the affidavit may be filed with, that is, placed among, the original papers, and filed at any time after judgment; and clearly this is not the intent of the statute."

With Surety.—In Cavence v. Butler, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 53, in order to effectuate the intent of the legislature, the court construed the expression "he shall be bound with surety" as equivalent to "he shall be bound by surety" or "he shall find surety."

WITHDRAW.—To withdraw is to take away what has been enjoyed, to take from.¹

With Quick Child.—In Reg. v. Wycheley, 8 C. & P. 262; 34 E. C. L. 381, Gurney, B., said: "Quick with child is having conceived; with quick child is when the child is quickened." This distinction is denied, however, in State v. Cooper, 22 N. J. L. 52; 51 Am. Dec. 248. It is there said: "There is no foundation in law for this distinction. The ancient authorities show clearly that the terms are synonymous, both importing that the child had quickened in the womb, and that the period had arrived when the life of the infant, in contemplation of law, had commenced." In support of this statement, the opinion cites Boynton's Case, 14 St. Tr. 634; 1 Hale's P. C. 368, 4 B. C. 395. See also Mitchell v. Com., 78 Ky. 208; 39 Am. Rep. 227.

With an Officer.—A Pennsylvania statute provided that when defendant appealed, he should enter into a recognizance with the prothonotary in the nature of a special bail. It was held that this meant that the defendant should give sufficient security to be filed in the office of the prothonotary, and not taken out before him, that the recognizance could be entered into before such persons as are legally authorized to take bail in the court where the suit is pending. Jones v. Badger, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 461.

With All Faults.—In Shepherd v. Kain, 5 B. & Ald. 240, it is said "with all faults" must mean with all faults which it may have consistently with its being the thing described, and in that case, where a ship was advertised as "a copper fastened vessel, to be sold with all faults," and it appeared that she was not copper fastened, it was held that the vendor was liable for a breach of warranty.

The meaning of selling with all faults is that the purchaser shall make use of his eyes and understanding to discover what defects there are. But the vendor is not to make use of any artifice or practice to conceal faults, or to prevent the purchaser from discovering a fault, which he, the vendor, knew to exist. Mitch v. Andrews, 8 Ired. (N. Car.) 6.

With a Strong Hand.—In an indictment for forcible detainer, the words "and with a strong hand" should never be omitted. The same description and degree of force are necessary to constitute the offense of forcible detainer that are required to constitute a forcible entry. Greater force must be averred than is expressed by the phrase "with force and arms." The court said: "Greater force must be averred than is expressed by 'vi et armis.' The words 'and with a strong hand' should never be omitted. Whart. on Crim. Law, § 2047. These words mean something more than a common trespass. They imply that the entry was accompanied with that terror and violence which constitute the offense. Com. v. Shattuck, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 141. The same description and degree of force is necessary to constitute a forcible detainer as a forcible entry." Com. v. Brown, 138 Pa. St. 452. See also Rex v. Wilson, 8 T. R. 357; Com. v. Shattuck, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 141; Baude's Case, Cro. Jac. 41; FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER, vol. 8, p. 101.

With Liberty of a Port.—As to the effect of these words in a policy of marine insurance, see Allegre v. Maryland Ins. Co., 8 Gill & J. (Md.) 190; 29 Am. Dec. 536.

With in the Sense of By.—See Pettee v. Flewellen, 2 Ga. 239.

With Effect.—The common condition of an appeal bond is that the principal "shall prosecute his appeal with effect." The words "with effect," in such instrument, mean successfully. Perreau v. Bevan, 5 B. & C. 291; 11 E. C. L. 230; Legate v. Marr, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 404; Karthauss v. Owings, 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 134; Champomier v. Washington, 2 La. Ann. 1013. See also Robinson v. Brinson, 20 Tex. 439; Trent v. Rhomberg, 66 Tex. 249; Gould v. Warner, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 54; Babbitt v. Finn, 101 U. S. 7; Marryott v. Young, 33 N. J. L. 336.

In Hobart v. Hilliard, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 143, however, it is held that filing the transcript of the supreme court complies with the condition. But in Trent v. Rhomberg, 66 Tex. 249, and in Champomier v. Washington, 2 La. Ann. 1013, it is held that an abandonment of the appeal is a breach of the condition.

The Texas statute provides a penalty

for the "withdrawal" of field notes of a survey from the land office. It was held that the withdrawal contemplated by the statute was intended to designate the act of the owner or someone for him. The court said: "The primary meaning of the word 'withdraw' carries with it the idea that the act from which it results is the act of some person who has formerly possessed, who made the deposit, who owns or controls. Of the word, Mr. Richardson says: 'But to withdraw, e. g., implies a putting forth or forward, and then a drawing back from one person or thing to another; and considered in relation to that from which (is drawn) it denotes privation; but considered in relation to that to which (is drawn) it denotes reunion; agreeably to the meaning of the word with.' 'To draw back or away; to take back or away; to resume.' Mr. Webster gives to the word substantially the same meaning. If the legislature had intended to embrace a wrongful and unauthorized taking from the general land office, a taking wrongful to the owner and unauthorized by him, some appropriate words would certainly have been used to express such intention." Snider v. Methvin, 60 Tex. 498.

An agreement by a partner to "withdraw from the firm," means to withdraw at once; and it further means (1) "that the withdrawing partner shall make over to the continuing partners all his interest in the partnership and in the partnership assets, whether there be real or personal estate, whether there be outstanding contracts, or anything of the kind;" (2) "that the continuing partners shall indemnify the retiring partners against all the liabilities of the firm from that time forth. They take the assets, they take the benefit of the contracts, they take the chances of success for the future, and they must keep him indemnified." Gray v. Smith, 43 Ch. Div. 208.

Withdrawal of a Claim.—It is not a withdrawal of a claim, where it has been dismissed for failure to make parties and prosecute the same. Lynch v. Bond, 19 Ga. 314.

1. Distinguished from Conceal.—Withholding property is not equivalent to concealing property. The court said: "The argument of the appellee, that the word 'conceal' is manifestly the synonym of withholding, is not sustained by any lexicographer we have consulted, or the popular sense of the term. Secrecy is an essential ingredient of the act of concealment. 'To hide or withhold from observation, to cover or keep from sight,' are the meanings technically and popularly conveyed by the word 'conceal.' It can scarcely be imagined that the extraordinary power of requiring an answer upon oath, with the summary process of attachment, sequestration and commitment, were to be exercised by a court of special limited jurisdiction in every case in which the administrator or executor should allege a third person withheld property which belonged to the estate of the deceased." Taylor v. Bruscup, 27 Md. 226.

Withholding Commissions.—A United States statute provides that the postmaster general may withhold commissions, when he is satisfied that a postmaster has made false returns. It was held that an order of the postmaster general reciting that he is satisfied that a false return has been made, and fixing the compensation which he deemed reasonable, was not conclusive in a suit against the postmaster and sureties upon his official bond to recover the moneys alleged to have been illegally withheld. The court said: "The action of the postmaster general in assigning a postmaster to his proper class and fixing his salary accordingly, under such provisions of the statute, is essentially different from the exercise of the discretion conferred of withholding commissions on such returns as the postmaster general may be satisfied are false. To 'withhold' commissions seems fairly to imply a temporary suspension, rather than a total and final denial or rejection of the same. If such withholding is not conclusive upon the postmaster, how can the allowance made, while the commissions are being withheld, be treated or regarded as a final and conclusive adjudication as to the compensation the postmaster is, or shall be, entitled to receive? The court below regarded the order in question as provisional in its character, and accordingly held, in substance, that it did not so conclusively fix and determine the commissions and compensation of the postmaster as to make the statement of her accounts based thereon conclusive against her and her sureties. The contrary proposition urged on behalf of the United States involves the assertion that the falsity of the post-master's returns is actually and finally established by the order of the post-master general, and that the accounts adjusted in accordance therewith amount to more than prima facie evidence of the correctness of the balance claimed to be due from the defendants. We think this contention of the government cannot be sustained, and that the ruling of the circuit court on the question was correct." U. S. v. Dumas, 149 U. S. 278.

WITHIN—(See also AT, vol. 1, p. 890; IN, vol. 10, p. 322; TIME, COMPUTATION OF, vol. 26, p. 4)—referring both to time and place, means in the limits or compass of, not beyond, not later than,¹ in the inner part.²

1. Webster's Dictionary; Levert v. Read, 54 Ala. 531; Jennings v. Russell, 92 Ala. 606.

2. Webster's Dict. In several cases the courts have refused to accept this second definition, preferring, under the circumstances, that first given in the text. See Levert v. Read, 54 Ala. 531, and the examples set out in this note.

A statute provided that exceptions should be filed "within" ten days after service of notice of the filing of a commissioner's report. It was held that whether the exceptions are placed on file before or after the service, can make no difference. The court said: "Taking the statute literally, the question would turn on the meaning of the word 'within.' The primary meaning is, 'in the inner part or side of.' Worcester gives as examples these: 'Go, shut thyself within thy house.' Ezek. 3:24. 'That which is within the cup and platter.' Matt. 23:26. This meaning is therefore not applicable, as I think, to the word as used in the statute. The word is otherwise defined by both Worcester and Webster as 'not beyond;' and it is in this sense that it is used in the statute. The word 'within' is not one of such preciseness as to have but one meaning, and, in construing a statute, we must adopt that meaning always which has application to the subject." Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Eubanks, 32 Mo. App. 189.

So, where a statute provided that, to obtain a lien, a certificate should be filed "within four days" from the departure of the vessel, it was held that the certificate might be filed any time before the expiration of the four days, whether it was filed before or after the beginning of the four days being im-material; e. g., before the departure of the vessel. Young v. The Orpheus, 119 Mass. 179.

In Atherton v. Corliss, 101 Mass. 40, it was held that where a statute provided that a widow might waive the provision for her in her husband's will at any time "within six months after the probate of the will," a waiver before probate was sufficient, although counsel contended that by the use of the word "within," instead of "before," the legislature signified that the act was to be between some certain points of time. The court said: "The important question in the case is upon the interpretation of the phrase 'within six months after the probate of the will.' Is the reference to the probate of the will for the purpose of fixing merely the terminus ad quem? or does it also fix the terminus a quo? The main purpose undoubtedly is to fix a time when her right of election shall cease, and the presumption of the statute become absolute. But the words used, in strictness, would seem also to limit the right in the other direction, and confine it to the specified period subsequent to the actual probate of the will. If the provision related only to the right of the widow to claim her distributive share of the personal estate, regardless of the will, we should be disposed to give it this narrower construction. There is much force in the argument of the counsel for the appellant in favor of thus limiting the right of the widow to disturb the provisions of the will in respect of the personal estate."

Within a Certain Distance of a Road.

—To determine, under a New Jersey law to prevent accidents at crossings, whether a proposed new road is within 500 feet of an old one, the width of the old road, where it crosses the railroad, must be regarded. State v. Drummond, 45 N. J. L. 511.

Within a Certain Distance of a Named Place.

—A local law prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors within three miles of a named town, includes the corporate limits of the town. The court said: "It is urged that the act above referred to presents no obstacle to the granting of a license to the petitioner to sell spirituous, vinous or malt liquors within the limits of the town of Falkville. The contention is that the prohibition operates only in the area extending three miles in all directions from the outer limits of the town, and not in the town itself. To impute this meaning to the words of the statute would result in defeating the obvious purpose of its enactment. The extension of the prohibition beyond the town limits was manifestly designed to preclude the possibility of the suppression of the liquor traffic in the town itself being made ineffectual by its establishment in the immediate neighborhood. It is plain that the word 'within' as used in the statute means 'in the limits or compass of; not beyond.' Webster's International Dictionary. The intention would not have been more distinctly evidenced if the statute had expressly provided that the prohibition should be operative in the limits or compass of three miles of Falkville, or that it should not be of force beyond three miles of Falkville. Manifestly, the town itself is included within the defined limits, and only beyond those limits could the traffic in question be licensed. In Cook v. Johnson, 47 Conn. 175; 36 Am. Rep. 64, the court construed a contract which stipulated that the defendant should not practice dentistry 'within a radius of ten miles of Litchfield.' It was held that this expression meant 'within ten miles of the center of the village of Litchfield.' This construction seems natural and reasonable. It is unnecessary, however, to determine in this case whether the legislature intended the prohibition to cover an area extending three miles from the center of the town or three miles from its boundaries. Under either construction the town itself is within the designated territory." Jennings v. Russell, 92 Ala. 606.

Within the Inclosure — Distress.—In Pettit v. May, 34 Wis. 666, it was held where the plaintiff's horse, being in the street, was destroying the fence surrounding defendant's inclosure, he was liable to be distrained as doing damage within the inclosure. The court said: "The horse of the plaintiff was in the street, tearing down and destroying the defendant's fence surrounding his inclosure, at the time the defendant seized and held him as an animal damage feasant; and the first question to be determined is, whether the horse was liable to be distrained under such circumstances. Was the horse 'doing damage within his inclosure,' so as to authorize the defendant to distrain and keep him in the manner prescribed by the statute? The fence is a part of the inclosure of the owner or occupant of lands, and to injure or destroy that is, in our judgment, to do 'damage within the inclosure,' as those words are used and to be understood in the statute. Unlike the statute of Vermont, and perhaps those of some other states, which authorize any person to impound 'any beast found in his inclosure doing damage,' our statute seems to be more comprehensive, and it is unnecessary that the beast should be found in the inclosure in order to justify the distress, but suffices that it is taken doing damage therein, although itself on the outside. Such appears to be the reasonable and proper construction of the statute, and the court accordingly so holds and applies it."

Within a Street.—Where a statute gave power to assess, for expenses of road repair, all premises "within" certain streets, it was held that a yard—Kent and Essex Yard, Whitechapel—set back from one of such streets, and having other houses between it and the street, but the only access to which was from the street by means of carriage gates and along a private covered way, was "within" the street. Baddeley v. Gingell, 17 L. J. Exch. 63; 1 Exch. 319. In that case Alderson, B., said: "You cannot say that any house is literally within the street, and we must therefore come to the consideration of what is intended by the expression 'within;'" and the yard was held (see especially judgment of Parke, B.) to be "within" the street because its sole communication was by means of the street, and because it fronted and abutted on, and derived the benefit of the repairs to, the street.

Within or Under.—It seems difficult to see how a grant of "minerals" "within or under" land is fuller, and less liable to receive a restricted meaning, than if "under" alone were used; but this suggestion has been made. Per Romilly, M. R., Midland R. Co. v. Checkley, L. R. 4 Eq. 25; observed upon by Wickens, V. C., Het v. Gill, L. R., 7 Ch. 705, note.

Statute of Limitations.—(See also LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, vol. 13, p. 667).—A provision in the Pennsylvania statute gives a period of ten years after a removal of a disability, for bringing suits, and "in case such person or persons shall die within the said term of ten years, under any of the disabilities aforesaid, the heir or heirs of such person or persons shall have the same benefit that such person or persons could or might have had by living until the disabilities should have ceased or been removed." In Henry v. Carson, 59 Pa. St. 302, the court construes the provision as follows: "What is the meaning of this clause? If it were not for the phrase 'within the said term of ten years,' there would be no difficulty in its interpretation, or any doubt as to its meaning. The corresponding clause in the Delaware act of June 16, 1793, which was evidently borrowed from ours, omits the phrase and avoids the difficulty. But as the clause stands in our act, giving to the language its ordinary signification, it appears to be contradictory and insensible. If we are at liberty to reject the phrase as repugnant to the general and evident purpose and intent of the whole clause, its meaning is obvious. It gives to the heirs of a person dying under disability the same time in which to bring their action or make their entry as their ancestors would have had, if they had lived until the disability had ceased or been removed. But we are not at liberty to reject the phrase if we can possibly give it such a construction as will make it consistent with the residue of the clause and with its manifest purpose and intent. We cannot give it such a construction unless we interpret the preposition 'within' as referring and applying not to the time included in 'the said term of ten years,' but to the time intervening between the disseisin and the removal of the disability, when 'the said term' commences. Thus interpreting it, the clause will read: 'and in case such person or persons shall die within, that is to say, inside of, not overstepping, before the commencement of, the said term of ten years, under any of the disabilities aforesaid, the heir or heirs of such person or persons shall have the same benefit,' etc. If this is not the ordinary and proper meaning of the preposition 'within,' it is the meaning which the context requires, and the only one of which it is susceptible if the phrase is retained. If we interpret it according to its ordinary meaning and usage, the clause is contradictory and insensible. If it is to be understood as meaning literally within the said term, that is, during its continuance, then the clause is not only absurd, but it involves an impossibility. How can a person die 'within the said term of ten years under any of the disabilities aforesaid,' when the term does not commence until after the disabilities have ceased or been removed? And what sense is there in providing that 'the heirs shall have the same benefit' that their ancestor 'might have had by living until the disabilities should have ceased or been removed,' if they have ceased or been removed when the ancestor dies? The contradiction and the absurdity involved, if the phrase is to be literally interpreted, are too manifest to admit or require further argument. To give the clause then a sensible meaning, we must interpret the phrase as suggested or we must reject it altogether, and in either alternative we are brought to the same conclusion as to its meaning, viz.: that it was intended to give the heirs of a person dying under disability the same benefit that the ancestor would have had if he had lived until its removal. In support of this construction, we have the authority of Tilghman, C. J., in Thompson v. Smith, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 209; 10 Am. Dec. 453, where he says: 'Our act of assembly is indeed not clearly or accurately expressed, when it speaks of persons dying under a disability within ten years. But the meaning is that if the title first descends or accrues to a person under disability, and that person dies before the disability cease or be removed, his heir, whatever may be his condition as to ability or disability, shall have the same benefit that he himself might have had by living until the disability had ceased, that is to say, he shall have ten years from the death of his ancestor; but if the person to whom the title first descends or accrues, being then under disability, shall live till the disability cease, then ten years and no more shall be allowed to him and his heirs, in case he shall die within the ten years.' In saying that the heir 'shall have ten years from the death of his ancestor,' he evidently refers to a case where the heir has an immediate right of entry, and not to a case where the right of entry or action is suspended by the intervention of a particular estate.

"Substantially the same construction has been given to the British statute, 21 James 1, already referred to, and to similar statutes in some of the states of our Union, as the following cases will show: Doe v. Jesson, 6 East 81; Dem- arrest v. Wynkoop, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 136; 8 Am. Dec. 467; Jackson v. Johnson, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 74; 15 Am. Dec. 433; Moore v. Jackson, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 58; Carpenter v. Schermerhorn, 2 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 314; Lewis v. Marshall, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 470; Sicard v. Davis, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 124; Thorp v. Raymond, 16 How. (U. S.) 247; Tillinghast's Adams Eject. 58."

"Within" in the sense of "in" or at "the end of."—In Adams v. Cumiskey, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 420, it was held that the words "within sixty days," in the direction to return an execution issued by a justice of the peace, mean the same as "in sixty days" or at the "end of sixty days," and that the execution could not be returned before the end of the period.

Within a Certain Time Includes Last Day—(See also TIME, COMPUTATION OF, vol. 26, p. 4; AFTER, vol. 1, p. 323).—Where letters of administration were granted January 12, 1852, a demand exhibited January 12, 1853, was held "within one year after the granting of the letters." The court said: "In Massachusetts it was held, in Bigelow v. Willson, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 487, under a statute which allowed the redemption of an equitable estate sold on execution 'within one year next after the time of executing, by the officer to the purchaser, the deed thereof,' that in computing the year allowed for the redemption, the day on which the deed was executed should be excluded. In Sims v. Hampton, 1 S. & R. (Pa.) 411, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held that, in computing the twenty days allowed for entering an appeal with the prothonotary after the entry of the award of arbitrators upon his docket, the day upon which the entry of the award was made should be excluded. The words of the statute are, 'shall enter such appeal with the prothonotary of the proper county within twenty days after the entry of the award of arbitrators on his docket.' In Windsor v. China, 4 Me. 312, the supreme court of Maine decided that an answer which the statute required to be given to a notice 'within two months after such notice,' was in time when given on the 20th of December, the notice having been given on the 20th of October. The day on which the notice was given was excluded. These decisions from other states assert the same rule which was adopted by this court in The Steamboat Mary Blane v. Beehler, 12 Mo. 477." Kimm v. Os- good, 19 Mo. 60. To the same effect, McDonald v. Vinette, 58 Wis. 619; Shelton v. Gillett, 79 Mich. 173; Frantz v. Kaser, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 395; Williams v. Burgess, 12 Ad. & El. 635; 40 E. C. L. 142; Chaffee v. Harrington, 60 Vt. 718.

An oral contract of insurance for one year, including its date, is a contract to be performed within a year, and therefore not within the Statute of Frauds. The court said: "We are of opinion that the contract was to be performed within a year, and is therefore not included in the provisions of the fifth clause of the Rev. Stats., ch. 74, § 1. When time is spoken of, any act is within the time named that does not extend beyond it." Fay v. Alliance Ins. Co., 16 Gray (Mass.) 455.

A delivering up of a poor debtor on the thirtieth day from his arrest, although not leaving time to give the statutory notice, is no breach of a recognizance to deliver up "within thirty days." City Nat. Bank v. Williams, 122 Mass. 534.

Note Payable "Within" a Certain Time.

—"The note has not been put into the case, and its precise terms are not stated. Nor is it important. No case has been cited in the argument, and we have found none, giving a construction to a note where the promise is to pay a sum of money 'within' a certain time. We are inclined to believe that the maker of such a note may tender the money to the holder at any reasonable time within the period specified, although the holder cannot enforce the payment until the expiration of the time. The time of payment depends entirely upon the agreement of the parties. If the promise was to deliver specific articles, or to perform any other act than the payment of money, 'within' a certain period, we think the party would have the right to tender the performance at any reasonable period, although the other party could not demand it till the last day; and no very sound reason occurs to us why the same rule should not apply to a contract to pay money, giving the maker an option to pay if he finds the holder at the place, in case place be specified. It is true that there is but a slight difference in phraseology between such a note and one payable 'in' a certain time; and perhaps commercial usage may have construed the latter as an engagement to pay at the expiration of the period, so that the party is not at liberty to tender payment before that time." Buffum v. Buffum, 11 N. H. 457.

Sale of Land Within a Year.—A party purchased a tract of land stipulating that it should sell within one year at the purchase price or over, or the vend- or should make up the deficiency. It was held that the vendee was at liberty to sell the lot at any time within the year, although it was contended that he was bound to keep it until the end of the year. Hakes v. Peck, 1 Keyes (N. Y.) 505.

Within the Jurisdiction.—See JURISDICTION, vol. 12, p. 316.

1. Without Her Consent—Rape.—(See also AGAINST, vol. 1, p. 325; RAPE, vol. 19, p. 951).—In Com. v. Burke, 105 Mass. 376; 7 Am. Rep. 531, it was held that a man who has carnal intercourse with a woman without her consent, while he knows she is insensible, is guilty of rape. "Without her consent" and "against her will" being equivalent.

Without Assistance—Husband and Wife.—The Louisiana Code provides that "the wife has the right to administer personally her paraphernal property without the assistance of her husband." In Miller v. Handy, 33 La. Ann. 163, the court says: "The terms, 'without assistance,' as used in this article, mean, unquestionably, without his control, without the necessity of being thereunto authorized by him, as is the case with many of her acts. It is not incompatible with her personal administration that she should avail herself of the assistance of her husband, if he is willing to render it, provided he act under her authority and merely as her proclaimed agent. Such acts, though performed by him, are still the acts of the wife, under the maxim 'qui facit per alium, facit per se.' With regard to the administration of her paraphernal property, when she chooses to retain it, a married woman has all the powers of a feme sole, including the power to employ agents to aid and represent her in reference thereto. See Reynolds v. Rowley, 2 La. Ann. 893; Dodd v. Orillion, 14 La. Ann. 68; Jordan v. Anderson, 29 La. Ann. 749."

As a Word of Positive Negation.—In Com. v. Thompson, 2 Allen (Mass.) 508, it was held that an averment that defendant did keep a certain dog "without said dog being then and there licensed according to law," was a sufficient allegation that the dog was not licensed. The court said: "And we think the allegation that the defendant kept 'a dog without said dog being licensed,' is of the same legal import and effect as would be an allegation that he kept 'a dog not licensed,' or 'a dog not being licensed;' that the word 'without' is a word of sufficiently positive negation. And so has it always been regarded. In indictments and informations, under the English statutes, for keeping alehouses without license, and for selling ale and other liquors without license, the precedents contain the averment that A, 'without any license,' or 'without being duly licensed,' did keep a common alehouse, or did sell ale, etc., contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. Faulkner's Case, 1 Saund. 249; Nelson's Justice (8th ed.) 16, 22; Archb. on Commitments and Convictions 116. So, under our Stats. 1852, ch. 322, and 1855, ch. 215, in complaints and indictments against persons for being common sellers, or for making single sales, of spirituous or intoxicating liquor, the form of allegation as frequently is that A was a common seller, or did make sale, of such liquor 'without having any license, appointment or authority,' or 'without being duly authorized,' etc., as is the other form, viz., that A, 'not having any authority,' etc., was a common seller, or did make as ale, of such liquor. And, in numerous instances, motions in arrest of judgment have been overruled, when the former of those allegations was found in the complaints or indictments. See, among other cases, Com. v. Wilson, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 412; Com. v. Clapp, 5 Gray (Mass.) 98; Com. v. Kingman, 14 Gray (Mass.) 85. And under our earlier statutes concerning the sale of spirituous liquors, it was held that an indictment was sufficient which charged a party with being a common seller 'without being first duly licensed therefor.' Com. v. Tower, 8 Met. (Mass.) 527. See also Com. v. Odlin, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 276, and State v. Keen, 34 Me. 505. So a motion in arrest of judgment was overruled in Com. v. Twitchell, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 74, where the indictment alleged that the defendant did set up and promote a public exhibition 'without being first duly licensed therefor according to law.' It is true that the precise objection now taken to this complaint does not appear to have been ever before presented to the court for adjudication; but we deem the objection groundless, as well on the rules of pleading as upon the precedents. See 2 Burn's Justice (20th ed.) 469, 470; Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 493."

Without Contradiction.—To say that testimony is without contradiction, is not equivalent to saying that it is true. Birch v. Hutchings, 144 Mass. 563.

Without Deduction.—(See also SUCCESSION TAXES, vol. 24, p. 431).—A testator having directed legacies to be paid at the expiration of six months after his decease, without deduction, the legatees are entitled to the full amount, and the legacy duty must be paid by the executors. Barksdale v. Gilliat, 1 Swanst. 562.

Without Deduction for Benefits—Eminent Domain.—There are various statutory and constitutional provisions enacting that the landowner shall receive compensation for land taken under eminent domain "without deduction for benefits," "irrespective of benefits," etc. These provisions have received statutory construction. See EMINENT DOMAIN, vol. 6, p. 583. In Giesy v. Cincinnati, etc., R. Co., 4 Ohio St. 308, it was held that the expression "irrespective of benefits," and the words "without deduction for benefits," both of which were used in the constitution of Ohio, were equivalent in meaning. And in speaking of the compensation to be paid for land condemned for railroad purposes, the court, by Ranney, J., said: "The word 'irrespective' relates to this full compensation and binds the jury to assess the amount, without looking at or regarding any benefits contemplated by the construction of the improvement. Where this is done and this consideration wholly excluded, the jury have nothing to do but ascertain the fair market value of the property taken; which is but saying that nothing shall be deducted from that value on account of such benefits. The opposite construction, so far from requiring the assessment to be made irrespective of these benefits, in effect compels the jury to ascertain their value to the property, and to deduct so much as they have increased it; thus using a word introduced for the sole benefit of the property holder in such manner as to deprive him of a portion of the acknowledged present value of his property, or to allow him to be paid for a part of its value in benefits; and, at the same time, fastens upon the constitution the gross inconsistency of allowing a corporation to procure the right of way upon easier terms than could be done by the public."

Equivalent to "in Good Faith."—"Without notice" and "in good faith" are equivalent terms when used in reference to a bona fide purchaser. Lee v. Bowman, 55 Mo. 400; Coover v. Johnson, 86 Mo. 533.

Without the Jurisdiction.—Without the State—(See also "BEYOND THE SEAS, vol. 2, p. 189; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, vol. 13, p. 742).—In the Statute of Limitations, "beyond the seas" is synonymous with "without the jurisdiction." Alexandria Bank v. Dyer, 5 Cranch (C. C.) 403; Denham v. Holeman, 26 Ga. 183.

Without Fault.—(See also CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE, vol. 4, p. 15).—A statute provides for the recovery by an employee from a railroad company, where he has sustained injuries by reason of the negligence of other employees, when he is "without fault" or negligence. In Central R., etc., Co. v. Lanier, 83 Ga. 591, the court said: "'Without fault' means that the party suing must not have done anything to contribute to his injury, or must have done everything to prevent the consequences of the company's negligence. In other words, he must show that he did nothing he ought not to have done, and neglected to do nothing he ought to have done. Under this clause of the code, we think this is the clear meaning of 'without fault or negligence.'"

In an action for damages for injuries caused by defendant's negligence, a complaint alleging that the injury was caused "without the fault of plaintiff" sufficiently alleges that it occurred without her fault or negligence. Mississinewa Min. Co. v. Patton, 129 Ind. 472.

A statute provided for the separate maintenance of a wife living apart from her husband "without fault." It was held that this meant, without voluntarily assenting to the separation, or without such failure of duty or misconduct on her part as materially contributed to the separation. Johnson v. Johnson, 125 Ill. 510.

Without Impeachment for Waste.—See WASTE, vol. 28, p. 861.

WITHOUT PREJUDICE—(As to motions, see MOTIONS, vol. 15, p. 920; as to letters, see LETTERS, vol. 13, p. 257).—This term requires the consideration of the courts most frequently when used in letters passing between parties to a controversy, with the object of obtaining a settlement of their difficulty out of court. The subject has already received treatment, but in the note will be found additional authorities, as well as constructions of the phrase as used in other connections.¹

Sale Without Reserve.—See AUCTIONS AND AUCTIONEERS, vol. 1, p. 989.

1. As an Admission of Right.—A letter without prejudice cannot be treated as an admission of right, and though in Williams v. Thomas, 31 L. J. Ch. 674, Kindsley, V. C., said: "The party writing it can use it against the other on the question of costs" (see also Jones v. Foxall, 21 L. J. Ch. 725; 15 Beav. 388), yet it has been held recently in the English court of appeals, questioning Williams v. Thomas, 31 L. J. Ch. 676, that a letter written without prejudice cannot be looked at as furnishing good cause for depriving the successful litigant of costs. Walker v. Wilsher, 23 Q. B. Div. 335. This, in fact, seems to establish the principle that a letter without prejudice cannot be read without the consent of both parties. Healey v. Thatcher, 8 C. & P. 388; 34 E. C. L. 442.

Negotiation Closed by an Agreement.—But even as regards the rights between the parties, a letter without prejudice is only inadmissible so long as it relates to a negotiation; when the negotiation is closed by an agreement the privilege ceases. Holdsworth v. Demsdale, 19 W. R. 798. See also Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 278; Paddock v. Forrester, 3 M. & G. 903; 42 E. C. L. 470.

Whole Negotiation Covered.—The whole negotiation is covered if its commencement is without prejudice. Ex p. Harris, 44 L. J. Bank. 33; Healey v. Thatcher, 8 C. & P. 388; 34 E. C. L. 442.

Withdrawal of Suit by Plaintiff.—Without prejudice means that the position of the plaintiff is not to be unfavorably affected by the act of withdrawal. All his rights were to remain as they then stood. Creighton v. Kerr, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 12.

Dismissal of Appeal.—Where it appeared upon appeal that the statement sent up had not been settled by the judge below; and, on appellant's motion for leave to withdraw it for correction, the appeal was dismissed "without prejudice," and after correction the case was again taken up, it was held that the dismissal of the first appeal did not operate as an affirmance of the judgment or prevent the second appeal. Cooper v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co., 7 Nev. 116; 8 Am. Rep. 705.

Dismissing Libel.—A decree dismissing a libel for divorce, "without prejudice," even after the evidence has been heard, is not a bar to a new libel for the same cause. Burton v. Burton, 58 Vt. 414.

Judgment Without Prejudice.—In Fisher v. Williams, 56 Vt. 586, it was held that a judgment was conclusive and could not be collaterally attacked, although rendered without prejudice to plaintiff's rights. The court said: "It is contended that the judgment was rendered 'without prejudice' to the plaintiff's right to hold the sum due from the school district in this suit. We know of no practice, nor authority, by which a court can thus qualify a judgment. There was a judgment between the parties to the suit—the claimant and the school district. The plaintiff was not a party to that suit. How any rights could be reserved in the judgment in favor of a person who was neither a party, nor a proper person to be made party, to the suit, is beyond the comprehension of this court. If the suit had been in favor of the defendant against the district, the statute provides that the plaintiff in the trustee suit may have it stayed—beyond ascertaining therein what may be due from the trustee—until his trustee suit is ended. But, beyond this, the statute makes no provision in favor of a plaintiff in a trustee suit in regard to a suit by the defendant against the supposed trustee. There is no such provision in regard to a suit by the claimant against the supposed trustee. When, therefore, the court rendered a judgment, that the fund sought to be attached in this suit belonged to the claimant, it concluded not only the claimant and trustee, but established judicially that the fund was the property of the claimant, and for that reason not attachable by the trustee process as the property of the defendant."

WITHOUT RECOURSE—(See also BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES, vol. 2, p. 313).—A special indorsement in the words usually employed, "without recourse," is an express declaration of the absence of responsibility.¹

But an indorser of a promissory note "without recourse," for value, contracts and engages that the signatures borne by said note as makers, or prior indorsers, are the genuine signatures of the persons thereby represented, and that such note is their valid obligation.²

Publication of Testimony.—"The testimony was, by consent, published without prejudice, which by the common understanding of solicitors and chancellors is a consent reservation of the right to take additional testimony." Dixon v. Higgins, 82 Ala. 284.

1. Bankhead v. Owen, 60 Ala. 461. See also Wilson v. Codman, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 193; Overton v. Tracey, 14 S. & R. (Pa.) 325.

In Ober v. Goodridge, 27 Gratt. (Va.) 878, where a note was transferred "without recourse," it was held, under the circumstances of the case, that the transferrer was not liable, although the indorser had been discharged by insufficient notice of dishonor.

2. Palmer v. Courtney, 32 Neb. 773; Seeley v. Reed, 28 Fed. Rep. 164, citing Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 670; Challiss v. McCrum, 22 Kan. 157; 31 Am. Rep. 181. See also Ticonic Bank v. Smiley, 27 Me. 225; 46 Am. Dec. 593.

When a note is transferred without recourse, as when transferred by delivery only, the transferrer is exempt from all the ordinary responsibilities which attach to such transfer; but he is not discharged, unless it is otherwise agreed and expressed, from liability upon implied warranty, that the paper so transferred is genuine, and not forged or fictitious; that it is of the kind or description which it purports to be; that the assignor has done nothing, and will do nothing, to prevent the assignee from collecting the claim assigned; that the parties to the instrument are sui juris, and capable of contracting; that it has not been paid; and he is liable for any fraud practiced upon the assignee in the transaction of the transfer. Watson v. Cheshire, 18 Iowa 202; 87 Am. Dec. 382.

Illegal Consideration.—In Hannum v. Richardson, 48 Vt. 508; 21 Am.

Rep. 152, a note was given for liquor sold in violation of the law and was by statute void. Defendant knew its invalidity, transferred it by an indorsement "without recourse," and he was held liable to the vendee. But see Rayne v. Ditto, 27 La. Ann. 622, where the consideration was confederate money and the indorsee held not liable.

Valuable Consideration.—As to whether there is a warranty of valuable consideration, see Blethen v. Lovering, 58 Me. 437.

Usury.—An indorser of a note, although "without recourse," will be liable to the indorsee or holder, on the implied warranty that the note is a valid obligation for the amount expressed upon its face. If the note is usurious, and the maker successfully interposes the defense of usury, and defeats the collection of the interest reserved in the note, the indorser will be liable over to the indorsee or holder for the deficiency thereby occasioned. Drennan v. Bunn, 124 Ill. 175. See also Freeman v. Brittin, 17 N. J. L. 227; Challis v. McCrane, 22 Kan. 157; 31 Am. Rep. 181; Delaware Bank v. Jarvis, 20 N. Y. 226.

Stolen Note.—An indorser, "without recourse," of a treasury note which had been paid, and afterwards stolen and put in circulation, the marks of payment having been fraudulently obliterated, is liable to his indorsee; for these words merely limit his responsibility by the law merchant in the event of the instrument being dishonored. Frazer v. D'Invilliers, 2 Pa. St. 200; 4 Am. Dec. 190. Compare Scofield v. Moore, 31 Iowa 241.

Signatures.—The vendor of a promissory note who transfers it by indorsement impliedly warrants that the signature of the prior parties whose names appear thereon are genuine, notwithstanding the indorsement is expressed to be without recourse on him. Dumont v. Williamson, 18 Ohio St. 516; 98 Am. Dec. 186.

Paid Note.—Where a party agreed to have a bond assigned "without recourse" to another, those words were held not to exempt the contractor from liability when it afterward appeared that it had been previously paid. The court said: "The very possession of the bond, the claiming it as property, as something binding the obligors, precluded the idea that it was at that moment discharged or satisfied; for then it was no bond; it bound nobody; it was not the representative of money. The bond too was payable at a future date. Who could have dreamed that it was already mere wax and paper, not a cent due on it?" Mays v. Callison, 6 Leigh (Va.) 230. See also Ticonic Bank v. Smiley, 27 Me. 225; 46 Am. Dec. 593; Frazer v. D'Invilliers, 2 Pa. St. 200; 4 Am. Dec. 190. But Compare Scofield v. Moore, 31 Iowa. 241.

After Maturity.—The payee of a promissory note, who reacquires it after indorsing it over without recourse, then stands in the position of an ordinary transferee. And where the note is reacquired after maturity, he takes it like any other assignee of non-negotiable paper, subject to all antecedent equities. And his rights are not enlarged by the fact that he claims as payee, and not as transferee or indorsee. Thus, where the makers and indorsers of a note were firms having a common member, the assignee after maturity, of the indorser, could not, at law, sue the makers, even though he had previously been payee of the note, and claimed as such. Calhoun v. Albin, 48 Mo. 304.

Assignment of a Judgment.—Partly Paid.—Judgment, a part of which had been paid and no record of such payment made, is assigned in the following form: "For value received, we hereby sell and assign all our right, title and interest in this judgment to M. without recourse on us." It was held, no fraud being shown, that the assignors were not liable to the assignee for the amount which had been paid on the judgment. The court said: "The assignors transferred their right, title and interest in the judgment without recourse." The words used clearly indicate, in the absence of any intention to warrant the validity or value of the judgment, that it was collectible. Scofield v. Moore, 31 Iowa 241. Compare Frazer v. D'Invilliers, 2 Pa. St. 200; 44 Am. Dec. 190.

was held inadmissible to show that an indorser of a note "without recourse" guaranteed the payment. The court said: "The defendant transferred the promissory note of a third party to plaintiff by indorsement 'without recourse,' and the only question necessary to be considered is whether evidence of a contemporaneous oral guaranty of payment was admissible. We are clearly of the opinion that the case falls within the familiar elementary rule that parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written contract. The parties have put their engagement into writing (as evidenced by the qualified indorsement) in terms that are certain as to the object and extent of such engagement. It is therefore conclusively presumed (in the absence of any showing of fraud or mistake) that their whole engagement on the subject covered by the indorsement was reduced to writing. While by the very act of transferring paper, whether by indorsement or mere delivery, a party engages that it is what it purports to be—the valid obligation of those whose names are upon it—and that he has good title to it, yet, when the indorsement is 'without recourse,' the indorser specially declines to assume any responsibility for its payment. According to the meaning of the term in the law merchant, this is the express condition of the contract, as much as if stated in detail in so many words. That evidence of a contemporaneous oral agreement that the indorser should be liable, as guarantor, for the payment of the note, would vary and contradict the terms of such a written contract, would seem self-evident. This court has steadily held, from the early cases of Levering v. Washington, 3 Minn. 323, and Kern v. Von Phul, 7 Minn. 426; 82 Am. Dec. 105, down to Farwell v. St. Paul Trust Co., 45 Minn. 495, that the implications and intendments which the law merchant has attached to blank indorsements of negotiable paper render them express and complete contracts, which cannot be varied or contradicted by parol."

So parol evidence is inadmissible to change a simple indorsement of a promissory note into an indorsement "without recourse." Doolittle v. Ferry, 20 Kan. 230; 27 Am. Rep. 166; Charles v. Denis, 42 Wis. 56; 24 Am. Rep. 383; Dale v. Gear, 38 Conn. 15; 9 Am. Rep. 353; Harrison v. McKim, 18 Iowa 485.

I. DEFINITION.—A witness is one who appears before a court, judge, or other officer, and is examined under oath or affirmation as to his knowledge of matters undergoing judicial investigation.¹

II. SECURING ATTENDANCE—1. Subpœna.—The usual process for bringing witnesses before a court or other tribunal or officer, to give oral testimony, is the writ of subpœna ad testificandum.² In case the witness is required to produce documents or writings in his possession or under his control, to be used as evidence, the subpœna duces tecum is the proper writ.³

2. Habeas Corpus ad Testificandum.—If the person desired as a witness is in custody, or is in the military or naval service, the proper process to secure his attendance is the writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum.⁴

3. Recognizance.—In criminal cases, the court sometimes requires material witnesses examined at the preliminary hearing to enter into recognizances to attend upon the trial;⁵ and, in case of

1. "A person who, being present before a court, magistrate, or examining officer, orally declares what he has seen or heard or done relative to a matter in question." 2 Abb. Law Dict., tit., "Witness."

"A witness is a means or instrument of evidence; that is, of unwritten or oral evidence. His function is to inform the tribunal or officer before whom he testifies as to matters of fact." Stewart Rapalje in 19 Am. L. Rev. 583.

The term "witness," in its strict legal sense, means one who gives evidence in a cause before the court. Barker v. Coit, 1 Root (Conn.) 225.

When the books speak of a witness, they always mean one who gives oral testimony. U. S. v. Wood, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 445.

"The word 'witness' is a most general term, including all persons from whose lips testimony is extracted to be used in any judicial proceeding. It embraces deponents as the term is used with us, and affiants equally with persons delivering oral testimony before a jury. The affiant or deponent is always a witness, but a witness is not necessarily an affiant or deponent." Appleton, J., in Bliss v. Shuman, 47 Me. 252. It was accordingly held in that case that the statute removing the common law disqualifications of a witness interested in the event of the cause, either as a party, or otherwise, applied equally to a deponent. To the same effect is Abshire v. Mather, 27 Ind. 381.

"Witnesses," in a technical sense, are persons sworn to testify or offered to testify in a cause. M'Chesney v. Lansing, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 388. But in that case it was held that in a statute requiring a justice of the peace, upon appeal, to certify to the court above the proceedings before him, and among other things the names of the witnesses sworn and examined and the names of those offered and rejected, "witnesses" is used in a more comprehensive sense, as synonymous with "evidence."

A witness is a person whose declaration under oath is received as evidence for any purpose, whether such declaration be made on oral examination or by deposition or affidavit. California Code Civ. Proc., § 1878.

2. See SUBPENA, vol. 24, p. 158.

For payment of fees and expenses as a condition precedent to compelling attendance, see SUBPENA, vol. 24, p. 166; for the punishment of disobedience to the writ, see SUBPENA, vol. 24, p. 170.

3. See SUBPENA, vol. 24, p. 173.

4. See SUBPENA, vol. 24, p. 172.

manifest unwillingness to attend, may require them to find bail, and in default thereof may commit them until the time appointed for the trial of the cause.¹ In such cases it seems that they are deemed in attendance upon the court during the whole period of their detention, and are, therefore, entitled to their per diem witness fees for such period.²

III. COMPETENCY — 1. Persons Interested — a. PARTIES — (1) In General.—It was a general rule of the common law that a party of record who was interested in the event of the suit was not a competent witness for himself or a co-suitor.³ Any pecuniary

But the power to exact an undertaking is confined to witnesses who are examined before the committing magistrate. Ex p. Shaw, 61 Cal. 58.

And one who has not appeared before the magistrate as a witness may not be arrested and required to give bail for his appearance at the trial. Evans v. Rees, 12 Ad. & El. 55; 40 E. C. L. 23.

A witness who is willing to enter into his own recognizance cannot be committed unless it appears that he intends to evade his obligation to appear and testify. State v. Grace, 18 Minn. 398. And in Bickley v. Com., 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 572, it was held that the witness could not be compelled to give surety for his appearance at all.

In Hutchins v. State, 8 Mo. 290, it is said to have been so decided in the courts of Louisiana, but no citation is given. But in Markwell v. Warren County, 53 Iowa 422, the contrary was held.

In actions not founded on contract, persons named in the process and pleadings as parties, but not served with the summons, were competent witnesses. Robinson v. Frost, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 536; Stockham v. Jones, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 21; Conwell v. Smith, 4 Ind. 359; Wakeley v. Hart, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 316; Entriken v. Brown, 32 Pa. St. 364.

But where it appeared that parties not served were actually co-trespassers with those served and had evaded the service of the writ, it was held that they were not competent witnesses for the defense. Lloyd v. Williams, Cas. temp. Hardw. 123; Cotton v. Luttrell, 1 Atk. 452.

interest, however small, even a primary liability for costs, was sufficient to bring a party within the operation of the rule.¹ There are many well considered cases in which it was held that interest in the event of the suit was the only reason for the rule against the competency of parties to the record,² and, accordingly, a party who was a mere trustee, without interest in the

And the same was true in actions ex contractu, unless the witness was sufficiently interested in the event of the action to disqualify him had he not been named as a party. Purviance v. Dryden, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 402; Leroy v. Johnson, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 186; Gibbs v. Bryant, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 118; Taylor v. Hancock, 14 La. Ann. 704; Steigers v. Gross, 7 Mo. 261. The contrary was held in Parke v. Bird, 3 Pa. St. 360.

In such case he was competent as a witness for the plaintiff, although jointly liable upon the contract sued on. Baugh v. Culler, 12 Md. 6. See also Blackett v. Weir, 5 B. & C. 385; 11 E. C. L. 257.

But where he was interested, he was not competent for the defense, although no process had been served on him. Van Norden v. Striker, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 286.

A misnomer of one of the defendants will not operate to take him out of the rule excluding parties of record. Van Norden v. Striker, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 286; Robinson v. Neal, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 214.

A party who was a mere trustee, without interest in the question in dispute, was, when liable for costs, incompetent as a witness. Phillips v. Bucks, 1 Vern. 230; Dowdeswell v. Nott, 2

Vern. 317; Davis v. Morgan, 1 Tyr. 457; 1 C. & J. 587; Baerman v. Radenius, 7 T. R. 659; Hawkins v. Hawkins, 2 Law Repos. (N. Car.) 627; Rex v. Governor, etc., of Poor, 3 East 7.

A guardian or prochein ami representing an infant was incompetent when liable for costs. Clutterbuck v. Huntingtower, 1 Stra. 506; James v. Hatfeild, 1 Stra. 548; Hopkins v. Sinclair, 13 M. & W. 640.

An objection on account of interest in the costs must be made at the trial and cannot be first urged on the hearing of a case saved. Essex Bank v. Rix, 10 N. H. 201.

A garnishee in a foreign attachment was not a competent witness against the plaintiff, even though he paid the debt due from him into court, where he was liable for costs if he resisted the plaintiff's claim. Wood v. Ludwig, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 446.

Willings v. Consequa, Pet. (C. C.) 301, supports the rule of the cases above cited, but the Supreme Court of the United States has disapproved the doctrine of this case. See Scott v. Lloyd, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 145; Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 219.

In Steele v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 3 Binn. (Pa.) 311, Tilghman, C. J., said: "The fact is that in almost every instance the plaintiff is interested either in the subject of the suit or in the costs, and, therefore, the conclusion may have been drawn without sufficient reflection that in no case can he be a witness. The reason of the law is the life of the law. Now, what good reason is there why a man's testimony should be excluded merely because his name is placed on the record as a party to a suit in which he has no manner of interest?" Notwithstanding this strong language, which is certainly in accord with the English rule, the court gradually drifted to the conclusion that a party of record, though free of interest, was not a competent witness except by consent of all the parties. Swanzy v. Parker, 50 Pa. St. 441; 88 Am. Dec. 549.

In Worrall v. Jones, 7 Bing. 395; 20 E. C. L. 177, it appeared that one of the defendants had suffered judgment by default and was called as a witness for the plaintiff. He had no further interest in the event of the suit, but the other defendant objected to his testifying on the ground that he was a party. It was held that he was a competent witness. Tindal, C. J., said: "No case has been cited, nor can any be found, in which a witness has been refused upon the objection in the abstract that he was a party to the suit. On the contrary, many have been brought forward in which parties to the suit who have suffered judgment by default, have been admitted as witnesses against their own interest; and the only inquiry seems to have been, in a majority of the cases, whether the party called was interested in the event or not, and the admission or rejection of the witness has depended upon the result of this inquiry."

In Sargeant v. Sargeant, 18 Vt. 378, Redfield, J., said: "It is well settled that the person who is party of record may, if he consent, be sworn as a witness and give evidence in the cause, either when he has no interest in the event of the suit, or when he is called to give evidence for the party whose interest is contrary to his own." Citing Worrall v. Jones, 7 Bing. 395; 20

In Paine v. Tilden, 20 Vt. 563, the same learned judge said: "The mere objection that the witness is a party to the record when he has no interest in the event of the suit, or is called to testify against his interest, has been too often decided by this court to be of no force to be again brought in question."

In Brown v. Brown, 4 Taunt. 752, and Mant v. Mainwaring, 8 Taunt. 139, the witnesses were not free from interest in the issue and the cases were doubtless correctly decided. But if they were ever authority on the point that the naked fact of one's being a party of record was sufficient to disqualify him as a witness, they were deliberately overruled in Worrall v. Jones, 7 Bing. 395; 20 E. C. L. 177. See opinion of Lord Denman, C. J., in Pipe v. Steele, 2 Ad. & El. N. S. 733; 42 E. C. L. 888.

The true rule was not that a witness should be excluded merely because he was a party to the suit, but that a party to the issue tried should not be examined as a witness. Safford v. Lawrence, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 566; Chenoweth v. Fielding, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 517.

A nominal defendant to a bill in equity, against whom no decree is prayed, is a competent witness for the complainant. Ragan v. Echols, 5 Ga. 71; Clendaniel v. Hastings, 5 Harr. (Del.) 408.

The payee of a note, who was the nominal plaintiff in a suit against the maker for the benefit of the holder, was a competent witness for the defendant in the suit if he were willing to testify. Coopwood v. Foster, 12 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 718; Johnson v. Blackman, 11 Conn. 342.

A plaintiff was competent to prove special damages to the property of a co-plaintiff, he himself having no interest in the matter. Draper v. Vanhorn, 12 Ind. 353.

An administrator who was one of the plaintiffs in a suit might be examined as a witness for the plaintiffs, after releasing to the heirs his claim to commissions and paying into court a sum sufficient to meet all costs accrued and to accrue in any event, unless it appeared that he was in danger of being involved in a devastavit. Heckert v. Haine, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 16; Patton v. Ash, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 116; Ash v. Patton, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 300.

event of the proceedings, or liability for costs, was held to be a competent witness.¹ But, on the other hand, cases are not wanting in which it was held to be the policy of the law to exclude parties of record from the witness box, independently of pecuniary interest in the event, in order to avoid temptations to fraud and perjury.²

But a mere promise to pay the costs was not sufficient. A deposit of the money must be made. Hoak v. Hoak, 5 Watts (Pa.) 80.

Where one of two co-defendants appealed and the other did not, it was held that the one who did not appeal, having no further interest in the event of the suit, was competent as a witness as to matters which remained to be determined. Wellborn v. Rogers, 24 Ga. 558; Hodges v. Mullikin, 1 Bland (Md.) 503.

In a suit on an administration bond, the ordinary, being a nominal plaintiff in his official capacity, without interest in the event of the suit or liability for costs, was a competent witness to prove the bond. Price v. Gregory, 4 McCord (S. Car.) 261.

"It is an inflexible rule of evidence that parties of record, whether in civil actions or criminal prosecutions, are not admissible as witnesses." Com. v. Marsh, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 57; Page v. Page, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 373.

"The common-law rule is that a party to the record cannot be a witness, unless in actions of tort. In no other case can a party to the record give evidence to go to the jury on the merits of a cause." Hackett v. Martin, 8 Me. 77; Austin v. Fuller, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 360.

In New York, the courts of chancery did not follow the doctrine laid down by the courts of law in that state, but admitted a party as a witness where he was free of interest. Norton v. Woods, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 249; Miller v. McCan, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 451.

The inconvenience and hardship which resulted from the rejection of witnesses, on the mere technical ground that they were parties of record, occasionally brought the court of chancery to the rescue of parties whose only witnesses were so disqualified. Thus, in Norton v. Woods, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 249, where the only witness for the defense was a nominal plaintiff and could not testify in a court of law, although free of interest, the court enjoined the real plaintiff from proceeding at law, in order that the controversy might be settled in a court of equity where the nominal plaintiff was competent to testify.

So, also, in Miller v. McCan, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 451, it appeared that the payee of a promissory note brought an action at law against the principal debtor and his surety. The principal debtor and the payee had made an agreement for an extension of the time of payment, which operated as a complete discharge of the surety, but he was unable to prove this defense at law, as the principal debtor, his only witness, was a party, and, therefore, disqualified as a witness, although his interest was exactly balanced between the parties, as he was liable to one or the other of them in any event. The court awarded the surety a perpetual injunction against the collection of the note from him personally.

(2) Corporators.—In actions by and against public corporations or quasi corporations a distinction was formerly made, in England and some of the states of the Union, between rated and ratable inhabitants; the former being held incompetent as witnesses by reason of being parties interested in the event, and the latter being held competent.¹ But the remoteness of the private interest, and the difficulty of securing justice when the rule was strictly enforced, led to its early abolition by statute.² When, however, the witness was personally interested in the event of the proceedings, as where he was called to prove a custom or right common to all the inhabitants of the place, he was not competent because, if the claim were sustained, the record of the proceedings might be used as evidence in support of a similar claim on his part.³ But where a public corporation was a party to an

An inhabitant of a state which sued in the courts of another state, was a competent witness in the case. Connecticut v. Bradish, 14 Mass. 296.

That a witness was liable to be rated and compelled to pay taxes was too remote and contingent an interest to render him incompetent as a witness. Falls v. Belknap, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 486; Bloodgood v. Overseers of Poor, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 285; State v. Davidson, 1 Bailey (S. Car.) 35; Rex v. Kirdford, 2 East 559; Marsden v. Stansfield, 7 B. & C. 815; 14 E. C. L. 137.

In ejectment by a person, to recover a cottage taken from him by the parish officers as being a parish house, an inhabitant who had ratable property in the parish but was not rated was a competent witness for the defendant under the Stat. 54 Geo. III., ch. 170, § 9. Doe v. Murrell, 8 C. & P. 134; 34 E. C. L. 327.

2. In England, the disability of rated inhabitants was partially removed by 54 Geo. III., ch. 170, § 9, and was entirely removed by 3 & 4 Vict., ch. 26. But, notwithstanding these statutes, such an inhabitant may not be compelled to testify against the corporation, and his declarations may be proved as admissions against interest. Reg. v. Adderbury, 5 Q. B. 187; 48 E. C. L. 187. See also Rex v. Woburn, 10 East 395; Rex v. Hardwick, 11 East 578.

In Pennsylvania, the disqualification of rated inhabitants was removed by the act of April 16, 1840. Barnet v. School Directors, 6 W. & S. (Pa.) 46. See also Thornbury v. Directors of Poor, 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 110; McFarland v. Moyamensing Tp., 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 297, where it appears that some modifications of the common-law rule were made by two earlier statutes.

In Vermont, such inhabitants were also rendered competent by statute. Peacham v. Carter, 21 Vt. 515.

Thus, an inhabitant of a town was not a competent witness to prove a custom for the inhabitants to dig clams in a certain spot, Lufkin v. Haskell, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 355; or to prove a right of way by prescription common to all the inhabitants, Odiorne v. Wade, 8 action which involved only the rights of the corporation as such, the inhabitants of the same were competent witnesses, and such interest as they had in the event of the action, being remote and common to all, was held to go only to their credibility.¹ Thus inhabitants of a public corporation to which property was devised or bequeathed for charitable purposes, were competent witnesses to attest the will.² So, also, a member of a private eleemosynary corporation, who had no pecuniary interest in the matter in controversy and had no private or personal interest in the property held by it, was a competent witness in a suit in which the corporation was a party.³

Pick. (Mass.) 518; or to prove a right of fishery common to the inhabitants, Jacobson v. Fountain, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 170; but he was competent to prove a public right of fishing in all the citizens of the state. Gould v. James, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 369.

And upon an issue as to whether the owners of property in a certain district were, by immemorial usage, liable to a common burden, an owner of property in such district was not competent to disprove the liability, because, by removing the liability, he added to the value of his estate. *Rhodes v. If the witness had no more private or personal interest in the subject-matter of the suit than any other inhabitant or citizen of the county, he was competent; in such case his interest was too remote, contingent, and minute to disqualify him. Ezell v. Giles County, 3 Head (Tenn.) 583.

One who was a party by reason of being an officer of a public corporation was not on that account disqualified. Van Wormer v. Albany, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 262; Bennington v. M'Gennes, N. Chip. (Vt.) 45.

In a prosecution by the state, the inhabitants of a town to which the law appropriated the penalty, if recovered in the prosecution, were competent witnesses. State v. Woodward, 34 Me. 293. And the same was true in actions qui tam, where the town was entitled to part of the penalty to be recovered. Pond v. Sage, 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 250.

The members of a school committee who were inhabitants of the school district, were competent witnesses in a suit to which the district was a party. Hill v. School Dist. No. 2, 17 Me. 316; Allen v. School Dist. No. 2, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 35; Holbrook v. School Trustees, 22 Ill. 539.

The trustees of an institution of learning, which was a party to an action, were competent witnesses. Hershey v. Clarksville Inst., 15 Ark. 128. The foregoing rules are applicable only to corporations not created for the private emolument of their members. Although corporations sue and are sued in their corporate names, and their members are not technically parties of record, it is nevertheless true that the members constitute the corporation; and where a private business corporation, organized for the pecuniary gain of its members, was a party to an action, the common-law rule excluding parties of record from the witness box was held to be applicable to its stockholders when they were proposed as witnesses on its behalf.¹ A stockholder's competency might,

Members of a corporation created for pious and charitable purposes, which was made the residuary legatee in a will, were held to be competent witnesses on the question of the sanity of the testator. Nason v. Thatcher, 7 Mass. 398.

In Burdine v. Grand Lodge, 37 Ala. 478, it was held that a member of the society of Free Masons was a competent witness for the society, as he had no pecuniary interest in a suit to which the society was a party. And it was further held that the court would take judicial notice that the grand and subordinate lodges of Free Masons within the state constituted a charitable or eleemosynary corporation. To the same effect is Trapnall v. Burton, 24 Ark. 371.

Members of the society of Shakers were competent witnesses for each other, although they held their property in common. Wells v. Lane, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 462. They were likewise competent in suits in which the deacons were parties, and no releases were necessary unless the matter in litigation directly concerned the common property. Richardson v. Freeman, 6 Me. 57; Anderson v. Brock, 3 Me. 243.

But in Stone v. Congregational Soc., 14 Vt. 86, wherein the defendant corporation was sued in assumption, it was held that members of the society were not competent witnesses for the defense, on the ground that they were interested in the event of the action. See

The executor of a stockholder, being one of the residuary legatees, was not a competent witness for the company. North America Bank v. Wycoff, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 151.

The fact that a witness was a stockholder in a corporation to which the plaintiff was indebted, did not render him incompetent as a witness for the plaintiff. Simons v. Vulcan Oil, etc., Co., 61 Pa. St. 220.

Where the corporation was a garnishee, a member of it was a competent witness. Jackson v. U. S. Bank, 10 Pa. St. 61.

An officer of the corporation who was not a stockholder, a party of record, or interested in the event of the action, might testify on behalf of the company. *Philadelphia Ins. Co. v. Washington Ins. A release to the corporation was not sufficient. It was necessary for him to transfer his stock in order to become a witness for the corporation. Thrasher v. Pike County R. Co., 25 Ill. 393.

But it was not necessary, for the purpose of restoring the competency of the witness, that the transfer should be registered on the books of the company in accordance with the by-laws. *Utica Bank v. In such cases the competency of the witness depended on whether he was personally liable at the time of the trial. If he was, he was an interested party and was incompetent to testify. Mill Dam Foundry v. Hovey, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 453.

One who held stock in trust in order that he might be eligible to the office of secretary of the company, to which stockholders only were eligible, was not a competent witness for the company when he was liable for the debts of the company by reason of appearing on the books thereof as a stockholder. Wolf v. St. Louis Independent Water Co., 15 Cal. 319.

In an action brought against a stockholder on his individual liability, for a debt incurred by the company, the plaintiff could not prove the defendant's liability by another stockholder of the same corporation, as the latter was incompetent, on the ground of interest. Pierce v. Kearney, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 82.

And where a director was sued for a debt of his company, under a statute making him personally liable for such debt, when he assented to the declaring of an unlawful dividend, a stockholder of such company was not a competent witness for the plaintiff, the director having no recourse to the company, because he was directly interested in fastening the burden of the debts upon the defendant, to the relief of the company. Hill v. Frazier, 22 Pa. St. 320.

In New Hampshire, it was held that where a stockholder had assigned his stock before the trial, he was competent as a witness, unless it were shown that all the facts existed which were required by statute to render his liability fixed and certain. Manchester Bank v. White, 30 N. H. 456. That the corporation, if successful in the case at bar, would have a larger fund out of which to pay other debts for which the witness might be liable, was held not to be a sufficient objection to his competency. White Mountains R. Co. v. Eastman, 34 N. H. 134.

(3) Effect of a Default.—A defendant who had been defaulted in an action ex contractu, if he had no further interest in the costs or the event of the action, was, in those jurisdictions where parties were excluded on the sole ground of interest, a competent witness for his co-defendants.² But in actions ex delicto, a

A stockholder was competent to produce and identify the books and other papers of the company in his custody. Peake v. Wabash R. Co., 18 Ill. 88; Ryder v. Alton, etc., R. Co., 13 Ill. 516. But the rule was confined to keepers and depositaries of corporate documents. Blen v. Bear River, etc., Water, etc., Co., 20 Cal. 602; 81 Am. Dec. 132; Union Bank v. Ridgely, 1 Har. & G. (Md.) 324; Wiggin v. First Free-will Baptist Church, 8 Met. (Mass.) 301.

A stockholder might testify to his official acts in the corporation, York, etc., R. Co. v. Pratt, 40 Me. 447; and was competent to prove the service of a notice on behalf of the company. Huntress v. Patten, 20 Me. 28; Union Canal Co. v. Loyd, 4 W. & S. (Pa.) 393.

So, also, he was competent to prove the acceptance of a supplement or amendment of its charter on the part of his company. Fell v. McHenry, 42 Pa. St. 41.

2. Effect of Default in Actions ex contractu.—Essex Bank v. Rix, 10 N. H. 201; Manchester Bank v. Moore, 19 N. H. 564; Pipe v. Steele, 2 Ad. & El. N. S. 733; 42 E. C. L. 888; Worrall v. Jones, 7 Bing. 395; 20 E. C. L. 177; 5 M. & P. 244; Kincaid v. Purcell, 1 Ind. 324; Brooks v. McKinney, 5 Ill. 309.

And the same was true in equity as to a defendant against whom the bill was taken pro confesso. Pingree v. Coffin, 12 Gray (Mass.) 288. But so long as the defendant was interested in the question of costs he was not competent. Louisiana Bank v. Hudson, 13 La. Ann. 600.

Partners.—A defendant who had suffered judgment by default was not a competent witness on behalf of the plaintiff, to prove a partnership between himself and other defendants, because he was interested in making the other defendants liable for a share of the debt. Brown v. Brown, 4 Taunt. 752; Mant v. Mainwaring, 8 Taunt. 139; Green v. Sutton, 2 M. & Rob. 270;

Miller v. M'Clenachan, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 144; Cody v. Cody, 31 Ga. 619; Rich v. Husson, 4 Sandf. (N. Y.) 115; Alexander v. Crosthwaite, 44 Ill. 359; Fairchild v. Amsbaugh, 22 Cal. 572; Glasscock v. McRae, 6 La. Ann. 284. But he was competent to prove that his co-defendants were not his partners, as such testimony would be against his interest. Culbertson v. Holden, 8 Bush (Ky.) 161; Scott v. Jones, 5 Ala. 694; Gooden v. Morrow, 8 Ala. 486; Aicardi v. Strang, 38 Ala. 326; Smith v. Knight, 71 Ill. 148; 22 Am. Rep. 94; Thomas v. Mohler, 25 Md. 36.

But in Williams v. Soutter, 7 Iowa 435, it was held that a defaulted defendant, against whom no final judgment had been rendered, was not competent to prove that another defendant was not his partner.

In actions upon joint contracts, it was held that a defaulted defendant was not a competent witness for his co-defendants where the defense set up by the defendants who had pleaded was not personal in its nature, but went to the whole cause of action and would, if sustained, deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of the default, because in such cases the party offered as a witness, although in default, was by no means free of interest. Brown v. Brown, 4 Taunt. 752; Walton v. Tomlin, 1 Ired. (N. Car.) 593; King v. Lowry, 20 Barb. (N. Y.) 532; Bull v. Strong, 8 Met. (Mass.) 11; Vinal v. Burrill, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 29; Thornton v. Blaisdell, 37 Me. 190.

In 1 Phillips Ev. (5th Am. ed.), p. 38, *45, it is said that it was ruled by Lord Kenyon, C. J., in an action against two defendants on a joint contract, that one of them, who had suffered judgment by default, was incompetent as a witness for the other for the purpose of negating the contract. For if negated as to one, the contract failed as to the other, and the plaintiff could make no use of his judgment by default against the witness, who was consequently interested in obtaining a verdict for the defendants. Citing Brown v. Fox, defaulted defendant was not a competent witness for his co-defendants, because in such actions the jury assess the damages as well as try the issues of fact, and a default does not free a defendant from interest in the question of damages.¹

MS. Ex. Assizes, 1789, cited by Dallas, J., in Mant v. Mainwaring, 8 Taunt. 141. See also Lake v. Munford, 4 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 318.

In Gilmore v. Bowden, 12 Me. 412, the court rested the rejection of the witness on the sole ground that he was a party of record. And in Walton v. Tomlin, 1 Ired. (N. Car.) 593, the same reasoning was adopted, although the court observed that the witness was not free of interest in that case.

In Bradlee v. Neal, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 501, and Chaffee v. Jones, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 260, defaulted defendants were admitted on behalf of their co-defendants, under the Massachusetts Stat. of 1834, ch. 189.

Neither was a defaulted defendant, sued on a joint contract, competent for the plaintiff if his co-defendant objected, because his ultimate interest lay on the side of the plaintiff. It is true that if he testified in favor of his co-defendant he might completely defeat the plaintiff in that particular action and escape costs himself, but it thereby laid the foundation for a separate action against himself, and it was clearly to his interest to fasten a joint liability upon the defendants. Shaw, C. J., in Columbian Mfg. Co. v. Dutch, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 125.

1. In Actions ex Delicto.—In Ward v. Haydon, 2 Esp. 552, Lord Kenyon, at nisi prius, said that a defendant in an action of trover, who had suffered judgment by default, was a competent witness for his co-defendants. But this case has been overruled.

In Mash v. Smith, 1 C. & P. 577; 11 E. C. L. 478, which was a similar case, Best, C. J., said: "If this man's evidence is to be admitted to give a complexion to the case it may go to reduce the damages against him, and, therefore, I am of opinion he is clearly interested and ought not to be received."

And in Thorpe v. Barber, 5 C. B. 675; 57 E. C. L. 675, the court followed the reasoning of Best, C. J., in Mash v. Smith, 1 C. & P. 577; 11 E. C. L. 478, and disapproved the doctrine laid down by Lord Kenyon in Ward v. Haydon, 2 Esp. 552.

To the same effect are Bohun v.

Taylor, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 313; Chase v. Lovering, 27 N. H. 295; Gerrish v. Cummings, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 391; Wood v. Kelley, 30 Me. 47.

In Gerrish v. Cummings, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 391, Shaw, C. J., said: "In an action of trover, after one defendant was defaulted the other pleaded, and, on a trial of the issue, Bonney, who pleaded, called Cummings, who was defaulted as a witness, first generally, next as a witness upon the question of joint hiring and not on the question of damages, but he was rejected. The court are of opinion that he was not a competent witness, on the ground of interest, and was rightly rejected. In an action of trover there can be but one assessment of damages. Though one defendant is defaulted and the other found guilty, yet there must be a joint judgment. The verdict, which is to fix the amount of damages, fixes it as well for the party defaulted as for the party who pleaded. The defaulted defendant, therefore, has a direct interest in favor of his co-defendant, the party who called him, to reduce the damages." Citing Thorpe v. Barber, 5 C. B. 675; 57 E. C. L. 675.

But it seems that he was competent for the plaintiff, Wren v. Heslop, 12 Jur. 600; 7 L. J. Q. B. 313; although it was ruled otherwise in the earlier case of Chapman v. Graves, 2 Campb. 333, note. See also Ballard v. Noaks, 2 Ark. 45; Kennedy v. Philip, 13 Pa. St. 408.

A defendant in ejectment, who had suffered judgment by default, was competent on behalf of the plaintiff to prove another defendant in possession. Doe v. Green, 4 Esp. 198.

And it has been held, also, that he might, under such circumstances, be a witness for another defendant who had pleaded. Buller's N. P. 286, citing Dormer v. Fortescue, Willes 343, note.

In trespass against several defendants, where some of them did not plead and no judgment by default was taken against them, it was held that they might be witnesses for their co-defendants, as no evidence was offered against them and their interest was in the question at issue and not in the verdict. Wakely v. Hart, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 316.

(4) Effect of a Nolle Prosequi, or Separate Verdict.—If a nolle prosequi were entered as to a defendant, it put an end to the proceedings so far as he was concerned, and his competency as a witness was restored.¹ So, also, in actions ex delicto against several defendants, if, at the conclusion of the proof, there was a defendant against whom there was no evidence whatever, the court might, upon motion, dismiss the action as to him,² or direct a separate verdict in his favor, in order to restore his competency as a witness for his co-defendants.³ But if there was any evidence against him which should be passed upon by the jury, the court would not thus interfere, but would let the trial take its

In Emmett v. Butler, 7 Taunt. 607, Park, J., said: "In a case tried before Le Blanc, J., at Lancaster, the case of a joint contract, one defendant was allowed to be examined in an action on a joint contract where a nolle prosequi had been actually entered after a plea of bankruptcy."

In assumpsit against several partners, one of them pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy, and thereupon a nolle prosequi was entered as to him. It was held that he was a competent witness for his co-partners, provided he released all his interest in the surplus of his effects. Butcher v. Forman, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 583.

But in Irwin v. Shumaker, 4 Pa. St. 199, wherein a nolle prosequi was entered as to a defendant, after a plea of discharge in bankruptcy, the court held that he was not thereby rendered competent as a witness for his co-defendants.

In trespass against two who severally pleaded the general issue, it was held to be a matter of discretion with the court to permit one to be tried before the other, in order that, if he were acquitted, he might be competent as a witness; but if they were tried together and one was acquitted and the other convicted, the one convicted should not be granted a new trial in order that he might have the benefit of the other's testimony. Sawyer v. Merrill, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 16. See also Dougherty v. Dorsey, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 207; Gilmore v. Bowden, 12 Me. 412; Ranny v. Church, 2 Root (Conn.) 420.

But where several defendants joined in a justification of the trespass, it was held that the court could not sever the justification and say in advance that one should be acquitted and another not, when they all put themselves on the same terms. Bates v. Conkling, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 392; Higby v. Williams, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 217.

One of several defendants in an action ex delicto, being acquitted in a justice's court, was not a competent witness on the trial of an appeal when the opposite party appealed. Bates v. Conkling, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 389.

But where one of two defendants appealed from a judgment against both of them, the other was a competent witness on the trial of the appeal, as his failure to appeal left him without further interest in the proceedings. Goodhue v. Palmer, 13 Ind. 457.

Where one of the defendants pleaded infancy, that issue might be tried first, and it being found in his favor he regular course.¹ As to whether or not a separate verdict might be directed for this purpose in actions ex contractu, the decisions are not in harmony.²

(5) Exceptions to the Rule—(a) At Common Law.—There were some recognized exceptions to the rule excluding the testimony might be sworn and examined as a witness. Rohrer v. Morningstar, 18 Ohio 579.

In an action of tort against two co-defendants, if one of them has been separately tried and acquitted, the other may, upon his trial, examine the acquitted defendant as a witness. Carpenter v. Crane, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 119.

Time to Direct Verdict.—The decisions are not harmonious as to what is the proper time to direct a separate verdict for this purpose. In some cases it was held that it should not be done until all the evidence on both sides was in. Wright v. Paulin, R. & M. 128; Huxley v. Berg, 1 Stark. 98; 2 E. C. L. 46; Wynne v. Anderson, 3 C. & P. 596; 14 E. C. L. 471.

But in Child v. Chamberlain, 6 C. & P. 213; 25 E. C. L. 362, Parke, J., said it was settled by the unanimous opinion of the judges that the separate verdict should be directed at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case. To the same effect are Russell v. Rider, 6 C. & P. 416; 25 E. C. L. 463; Bates v. Conkling, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 390; Cochran v. Ammon, 16 Ill. 316; Hood v. Mathis, 21 Mo. 308.

Again it was held to be a matter within the discretion of the court. Sowell v. Champion, 6 Ad. & El. 407; 33 E. C. L. 92; White v. Hill, 6 Q. B. 487; 51 E. C. L. 487. See also Over v. Blackstone, 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 71; Brown v. Burrus, 8 Mo. 26; Prettyman v. Dean, 2 Harr. (Del.) 494.

In the exercise of this discretion, Wilde, C. J., after animadverting on the practice of joining parties for the purpose of excluding their testimony, directed a verdict for a defendant so joined at once upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's case. Neilau v. Hanny, 2 C. & K. 710; 61 E. C. L. 710.

1. Brown v. Howard, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 119; Van Deusen v. Van Slyck, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 223; Bates v. Conkling, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 390; Campbell v. Hood, 6 Mo. 211; Steamboat Prairie Rose v. Cross, 34 Mo. 109; Dallas, J., in Emmett v. Butler, 7 Taunt. 607; Brotherton v. Livingston, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 334.

2. In Actions ex Contractu.—In an action ex contractu, it was held that where a party was improperly joined as a defendant, the court or jury, upon application, should first pass upon his case, and after his discharge he might be examined as a witness for the other defendants. Domingo v. Getman, 9 Cal. 97; Brown v. Lewis, 25 Mo. 335. See also Harrison v. Johnson, 18 N. J. Eq. 420. But it is doubtful whether the court has authority to sever the issues in such cases.

In Schermerhorn v. Schermerhorn, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 119, which was an action of assumpsit on a promissory note against five defendants, two of the defendants pleaded their discharge in insolvency; the trial court instructed the jury to pass on the liability of one of them first, and, after a verdict in his favor, he was admitted as a witness for his co-defendants. The result was a verdict for the defendants, which, upon appeal, was set aside and a new trial ordered. See also comments upon this case, by Harris, J., in Safford v. Lawrence, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 569, and Berry v. Stevens, 71 Me. 503, where, in an action of assumpsit, it was held that the court should not allow a separate verdict for one of the defendants, in order to qualify him as a witness for his co-defendants.

Bankruptcy of Party.—The mere pleading of a bankrupt or insolvent discharge was not alone sufficient to render a party a competent witness. Raven v. Dunning, 3 Esp. 25; Currie v. Child, 3 Campb. 283; Given v. Albert, 5 W. & S. (Pa.) 338. See also Safford v. Lawrence, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 570.

In Currie v. Child, 3 Campb. 283, Lord Ellenborough refused to order a separate verdict in favor of a defendant who had established the issue of bankruptcy in order that he might be qualified as a witness in the case. And a similar ruling was made in Emmett v. Butler, 7 Taunt. 599. But in the later case of Bate v. Russell, M. & M. 332; 22 E. C. L. 327, the court permitted a separate verdict in favor of a bankrupt defendant, who was then admitted as a competent witness. See also Aflalo of parties to the record; for example, where the defendant had, by other evidence, been proved guilty of gross fraud, willful interference with the plaintiff's property, or spoliation thereof, the plaintiff himself was competent to prove the amount of his damages where other evidence on the question was not obtainable.¹ In many cases, the necessity for such evidence, in order to prevent a failure of justice, was regarded as the true reason for the exception;² and this reasoning being followed to its logical conclusion, it was held that in actions against carriers and innkeepers for the loss of baggage, where the liability of the bailee was

v. Fourdrinier, 6 Bing. 306; 19 E. C. L. 89; Hawkesworth v. Showler, 12 M. & W. 45.

In Steele v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 3 Binn. (Pa.) 306, it was held that a plaintiff, who, after the commencement of a suit, made an assignment and received his discharge, was a competent witness, provided all the costs were paid before he was sworn. But the doctrine of this case was completely exploded in McClelland v. Mahon, 1 Pa. St. 364. And in two later cases, Wolf v. Fink, 1 Pa. St. 435; 44 Am. Dec. 141, and Bittinger v. Keys, 2 Pa. St. 459, it was held that a party who was a certified bankrupt at the time of the bringing of the action, was not a competent witness, although free of interest. To the same effect is Mills v. Lee, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 549.

1. In Herman v. Drinkwater, 1 Me. 27, it appeared that the defendant, the master of a ship, broke open the plaintiff's trunk and rifled it of its contents. The delivery of the trunk to the defendant and his tortious acts having been proved aliunde, it was held that the plaintiff was competent to testify to the particular contents of the trunk, on the ground of necessity. See also Garvey v. Camden, etc., R. Co., 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 280.

So where bailiffs, in serving an execution, embezzled money which they discovered secretly hidden in a wall, and otherwise despoiled the debtor's goods, it was held that the debtor, who sued them for the recovery of the money and other damages, was a competent witness to prove his damages. Childrens v. Saxby, 1 Vern. 207; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 229. See also Anonymous, cited in East India Co. v. Evans, 1 Vern. 308, where it appeared that a man ran away with a casket of jewels.

So, also, in an action against the Hundred, under the statute of Winton, to recover damages for the robbery of the plaintiff, he was competent ex necessitate to prove the robbery and the amount of his damages. Bennet v. Hundred of Hertford, Sty. 233, 2 Rolle 685; Norris' Peake 223, note. And in an action against a county for the destruction of property by a mob, the plaintiff might testify to the ownership and value of wearing apparel destroyed; but was not competent to prove the destruction of household furniture, etc. County v. Leidy, 10 Pa. St. 45.

In Queener v. Morrow, 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 123, it appeared that a trunk containing about $2,500 in bank notes had been feloniously taken from the plaintiff's dwelling house. He brought an action, as for money had and received, against the defendant for the amount alleged to have been in the trunk. The felonious taking of the trunk was proved, and there was evidence tending to fix the liability on the defendant; and it was held that the plaintiff himself was competent to testify to the amount of money in the trunk, he being unable to establish the fact by any other evidence.

2. It was laid down in Buller's N. P. 289, that a party who has an interest will be admitted where no other evidence is reasonably to be expected.

And in Lancum v. Lovell, 9 Bing. 465; 23 E. C. L. 335, this doctrine was approved by all the judges in England. To the same effect is Lampley v. Scott, 24 Miss. 528.

In U. S. v. Clark, 96 U. S. 41, Miller, J., said: "We are of opinion that by the rules of evidence derived from the common law, as it is understood in the United States, whenever it becomes important to ascertain the contents of a box, trunk, or package, which has been lost or destroyed under circumstances that make someone liable in a court of established by other evidence, the plaintiff was competent to prove the list of articles lost and their value, if other proof could not be obtained.¹ But in other jurisdictions, it was held that the plaintiff's testimony was admitted only in odium spoliatoris, and, consequently, should be excluded where nothing more culpable than negligence was chargeable to the bailee.²

justice for the loss, and the loss and liability are established by other testimony, the owner or party interested in the loss, though he may be a party to the suit, is a competent witness to prove the contents so lost or destroyed. This is one of those exceptions to the rigorous rule of the common law excluding parties and persons having an interest in the result of the suit from becoming witnesses in their own behalf, which has been ingrafted upon that system. It is founded in the necessity of permitting the only party who knows the matter to be proved to testify, in order to prevent an absolute failure of justice, where his right to relief has been established by other evidence. We are aware that there is a conflict of authority on this point, but we believe the preponderance is in favor of the proposition we have stated, and looking at it as a matter of principle, in the light of the progress of legislation and judicial decision in the direction of more liberal rules of evidence, we have no hesitation in adopting it in the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject."

But a party might not testify in his own behalf, if it appeared that another person knew the same facts, although such person resided in another state. Evans v. Hardgrove, 11 Tex. 210.

1. In 12 Viner's Abr. 24, pl. 34, it is said: "On a trial at Bodmyr, coram Montague, B., against a common carrier, a question arose about the things in a box, and he declared that this was one of those cases where the party himself might be a witness propter necessitatem rei. For everyone did not show what he put into his box." This language is quoted and followed in Douglass v. Montgomery, etc., R. Co., 37 Ala. 641; 79 Am. Dec. 76; Pettigrew v. Barnum, 11 Md. 445; 69 Am. Dec. 212; Clark v. Spence, 10 Watts (Pa.) 336.

To the same effect are Dibble v. Brown, 12 Ga. 217; 56 Am. Dec. 460; Kitchen v. Robbins, 29 Ga. 713; Indiana Cent. R. Co. v. Gulick, 19 Ind. 83; Parmelee v. McNulty, 19 Ill. 556; No-

In Illinois, it was held that under such circumstances the plaintiff was competent to prove the contents of the lost trunk from the necessity of the case, but not to prove the value of the trunk or of its contents, unless it was shown that other evidence could not be had. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Taylor, 24 Ill. 323; Davis v. Michigan Southern, etc., R. Co., 22 Ill. 278; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Copeland, 24 Ill. 332; 76 Am. Dec. 749.

In Pennsylvania, the rule was confined to such articles as were necessary for the convenience and use of the traveler, Clark v. Spence, 10 Watts (Pa.) 335; and the plaintiff was incompetent to prove that the trunk contained money, or the amount thereof. David v. Moore, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 230. But there seems to be no reason for this restriction of the rule, where the amount of money is not in excess of the passenger's necessary expenses on his journey, and it was so held in Johnson v. Stone, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 419.

The exception was confined to baggage and did not extend to contracts of affreightment. Wright v. Caldwell, 3 Mich. 51; Adams Express Co. v. Haynes, 42 Ill. 90.

A party was not competent to prove the delivery of his baggage to the bailee. Pope v. Hall, 14 La. Ann. 324.

2. In Snow v. Eastern R. Co., 12 Met. (Mass.) 44, which was an action against a railroad company to recover damages for the loss of a trunk by their negligence, it was held that the plaintiff was not a competent witness, although he had no other evidence. After commenting upon the authorities, the court said: "These cases proceed upon the criminal character of the act and are limited in their nature. The present case does not fall within the principle. Here was no robbery, no

If a written instrument which was material evidence in the case could not be produced upon the trial, and it was established by proof aliunde that it once existed, a party was competent to testify to collateral matters necessary to lay a foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence of its contents.¹ And generally, in preliminary matters which were auxiliary to the trial, and tortious taking away by the defendants, no fraud committed. It is simply a case of negligence on the part of carriers. The case is not brought within any exception to the common rule, and is a case of defective proof on the part of the plaintiff, not arising from necessity but from want of caution. To admit the plaintiff's oath in cases of this nature would lead, we think, to much greater mischiefs in the temptation to frauds and perjuries than can arise from excluding it. If the party about to travel, places valuable articles in his trunk, he should put them under the special charge of the carrier, with a statement of what they are and of their value, or provide other evidence beforehand of the articles taken by him." To the same effect are Smith v. North Carolina R. Co., 1 Winst. (N. Car.) 203; Packard v. Northcraft, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 439; Garvey v. Camden, etc., R. Co., 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 280. Block v. The Trent, 18 La. Ann. 664, was decided upon the statutes of the State of Louisiana rather than upon the principles of the common law.

In Christian v. U. S., 7 Ct. of Cl. 431, it was held that the exception should be confined to cases where the defendant was a wrongdoer.

1. Although a party was not competent to prove the execution or contents of such instrument, he was competent, after proof of its execution, to prove the loss or destruction of the same, in order to the proof of its contents by other witnesses. *Riggs v. Where evidence had been given from which the jury might infer that the plaintiff had been in possession of a lottery ticket, it was held that he was a competent witness to prove its loss. Snyder v. Wolfey, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 328.

In North Carolina, it was held in the two early cases of Blanton v. Miller, 1 Hayw. (N. Car.) 4; Seekright v. Bogan, 1 Hayw. (N. Car.) 176, that a plaintiff was competent to prove the loss of his deed. But in the later case of Cotton v. Beasley, 2 Murph. (N. Car.) 259, it was held that a plaintiff was not competent to prove the loss of a bond on which he sued in a court of law, but that he might do so in a court of equity, where he would be required to enter into a bond to indemnify the defendant against any demand that might subsequently be made upon the bond on which he sued. To the same effect are Davis v. Benbow, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 427, and Penfield v. Cook, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 96.

Where the claim was founded on a book account and the books were lost, a party might be examined on oath to prove the loss of the books, though their contents must be proved by other witnesses. Smiley v. Dewey, 17 Ohio 156.

A party was competent to prove that a subscribing witness to a deed was dead, in order to let in secondary proof of its execution. Douglass v. Sanderson, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 15; 2 Dall. (Pa.) 116; Jackson v. Davis, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 123; 15 Am. Dec. 451.

did not involve the main question in issue, and were addressed to the court for its decision, the oath of a party might be received for the enlightenment of the court.¹

(b) In Equity.—The sworn answer of a defendant in a suit in equity is evidence for him, as well as against him, in so far as it is responsive to the bill. The complainant, by calling upon him to answer the allegations of the bill, thereby admits his credibility as a witness; and the positive denials of the answer are conclusive, unless they are overcome by the testimony of two witnesses or of one witness supported by corroborating circumstances.² When,

So, also, a party was competent to prove notice to the adverse party to produce a paper in question. Jordan v. Cooper, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 564; Siltzell v. Michael, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 329.

however, the answer contains new matter, not responsive to the allegations of the bill or to the interrogatories included in or appended to the same, which is put in issue by replication, the defendant's sworn answer is not proof of such matter. He must establish allegations so made by independent proof, in like manner as the complainant must establish the allegations of the bill when they are put in issue by the answer.¹ But if no replication is filed, and the case is heard on bill, answer and exhibits, without proof, the allegations in a sworn answer, whether responsive to the bill or not, must be considered as true.²

(U. S.) 154, Marshall, C. J., said: "The general rule that either two witnesses or one witness with probable circumstances will be required to outweigh an answer asserting a fact responsively to a bill, is admitted. The reason upon which the rule stands is this: The plaintiff calls upon the defendant to answer an allegation he makes, and thereby admits the answer to be evidence. If it is testimony, it is equal to the testimony of any other witness; and as the plaintiff cannot prevail if the balance of proof be not in his favor, he must have circumstances in addition to his single witness, in order to turn the balance."

The answer may itself bring to light circumstances which will impair the evidential value of the denial. East India Co. v. Donald, 9 Ves. Jr. 275.

The right of a defendant to have his answer taken as evidence is co-extensive with his obligation to answer. Pierson v. Clayes, 15 Vt. 53; Blaisdell v. Bowers, 40 Vt. 126; Dunham v. Gates, Hoffm. Ch. (N. Y.) 185.

Where the answer is upon information and belief and contains no positive denial, the complainant is not required to increase the weight of his evidence to overcome the answer. Benson v. Woolverton, 15 N. J. Eq. 158. See also ANSWER, vol. 1, p. 609.

This rule applies only to matters not stated or inquired of in the bill. There is no foundation for a distinction, in this regard, between matter of denial and matter of affirmance, if both are responsive to the bill. Bellows v. Stone, 18 N. H. 465.

2. Cherry v. Belcher, 5 Stew. & P.

The rule excluding the testimony of parties of record was never enforced with the same severity in chancery as at common law. One who was a party in his own right was not permitted to be a witness for himself.¹ A plaintiff might, however, before filing his replication, obtain an order for the examination of a defendant, upon a suggestion that he was not interested in the event and subject to all just exceptions to the admissibility of the evidence to be taken and considered at the hearing,² but he could have no decree against such defendant for any relief involving the matters upon which he was examined.³

If the replication had been filed, it might, on motion, be amended by striking out the name of the defendant sought to be examined. Hardcastle v. Shafto, 2 Fowl. Exch. Pr. 100.

But a decree might be had against him upon other matters concerning which he was not examined. Nightingale v. Dodd, Ambl. 583; Mos. 229; Palmer v. Van Doren, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 192.

The plaintiff's examination of a defendant, who was such in a representative capacity only, and had no personal interest in the matter in controversy, was not sufficient ground for dismissing the bill as to him. Tamlyn v. Reynolds, 7 Jur. 166; Bradley v. Root, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 632.

The plaintiff, by examining as a witness a defendant who was primarily liable to him, thereby precluded himself from having a decree against either him or a defendant secondarily liable. Thompson v. Harrison, 1 Cox 344; Goold v. O'Keeffe, Beat. 356;

So, also, a defendant might obtain an order for the examination of a co-defendant, upon a suggestion that the latter was not interested in the matters upon which it was proposed to examine him, leaving the question of interest to be determined at the hearing upon the evidence.¹ If, at that time, it appeared that the witness was interested, though only to the extent of liability for costs, his deposition was excluded.² But a plaintiff was not permitted to examine a co-plaintiff as a witness without the consent of the defendant.³ The proper course to pursue, in such cases, was to move to amend the bill by striking out the name of the desired witness as a complainant and joining him as a defendant, if he were a necessary party.⁴ Neither might the defendant examine a plaintiff, except by consent, unless he was merely a nominal plaintiff without beneficial interest in the matter in controversy.⁵

(6) In Criminal Proceedings—(a) Defendants.—At common law a prisoner on trial for a capital crime was not entitled to counsel, Bradley v. Root, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 632; Ragan v. Echols, 5 Ga. 71.

But the examination of one defendant was not a valid objection to a decree against others not examined, if, in order to obtain the relief prayed against them, a decree against the party examined was not necessary. Rowland v. Witherden, 3 Macn. & G. 568; 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 480; Smith v. Smith, 6 Hare 524; Palmer v. Van Doren, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 192.

Eq. 420; Mixell v. Lutz, 34 Ill. 388.

An order for the examination of one defendant by another did not issue as of course after decree. Dungannon v. Skinner, 1 Hog. 281; Franklin v. Colquhoun, 16 Ves. Jr. 218.

The ground of permitting a defendant to be examined for a co-defendant was that the plaintiff might unite distinct claims with a view of depriving the defendants of each other's evidence. Murray v. Shadwell, 2 Ves. & B. 401; Hubbard v. Hewlett, 2 Madd. 468; Piddock v. Brown, 3 P. Wms. 288.

A defendant against whom relief was prayed might be examined as a witness by a co-defendant against whom different relief was prayed. Ashton v. Parker, 14 Sim. 632; 9 Jur. 574; Daniell v. Daniell, 3 De G. & S. 357; 13 Jur. 164.

But two defendants who had exactly the same defense were not competent witnesses for each other. Monday v. Guyer, 1 De G. & S. 182; 11 Jur. 861; Carrington v. Pell, 3 De G. & S. 512.

To exclude the deposition of a defendant, it was necessary to show his interest in the matters upon which his testimony bore. It was not sufficient to show an interest in the subject-matter of the suit generally. Ellis v. Deane, 3 Moll. 58.

A defendant might examine a plaintiff by the consent of all parties. Wheat-unless some question of law arose in the progress of the trial requiring the argument of counsel for its elucidation.¹ In such cases, and in others where the prisoner had no counsel, the defendant was entitled to make an unsworn statement to the jury setting forth the material facts of the case from his point of view, and he was not subject to cross-examination on such statement.² In some jurisdictions, where the prisoner's incompetency to testify in his own behalf has not been removed by statute, great progress has been made in that direction by the enactment of statutes permitting all defendants in criminal proceedings to take the stand if they so desire and make statements to the jury concerning the facts and circumstances of the case.³ These statements, while not technically a part of the evidence, are, nevertheless, in the nature of evidence and are to be considered by ley v. Smith, Dick. 650; Walker v. Wingfield, 15 Ves. Jr. 178.

If a plaintiff, who was without interest in the event of the suit, was a necessary witness for the defense, an order might be obtained for his examination. Hougham v. Sandys, 2 Sim. & Stu. 221. See also M'Niece v. Agnew, 2 Ir. Eq. 445.

1. 4 Bl. Com. 355; 2 Hawk P. C. 400.

2. It was generally held that if a prisoner were defended by counsel he should not himself be permitted to make a statement to the jury in addition to the defense of his counsel. Reg. v. Boucher, 8 C. & P. 141; 34 E. C. L. 328; Reg. v. Burrows, 2 M. & Rob. 124; Reg. v. Rider, 8 C. & P. 539; 34 E. C. L. 521; Reg. v. Manzano, 8 Cox C. C. 321; Reg. v. Teste, 4 Jur. N. S. 244; Reg. v. Taylor, 1 F. & F. 535. But in some cases the court permitted the prisoner to make a statement in addition to his counsel's address to the jury. Reg. v. Stephens, 11 Cox C. C. 669; Reg. v. Shimmin, 15 Cox C. C. 122; Reg. v. Malings, 8 C. & P. 242; 34 E. C. L. 371.

But these cases were not regarded as precedents with respect to the general practice in such cases. Reg. v. Walkling, 8 C. & P. 243; 34 E. C. L. 372.

In Reg. v. Malings, 8 C. & P. 242; 34 E. C. L. 371, Alderson, B., said: "On trials for high treason the prisoner was always permitted to make his own statement after the counsel had addressed the jury."

The prisoner was not entitled to have his counsel make the statement for him. Reg. v. Shimmin, 15 Cox C. C. 122; Reg. v. Beard, 8 C. & P. 142; 34 E. C. L.

328; Reg. v. Butcher, 2 M. & Rob. 228. Although this was permitted in Reg. v. Weston, 14 Cox C. C. 346. See also People v. Lopez, 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. (N. Y.) 262. This was the subject of much discussion in England as late as 1881, when it was determined, by resolution of all the judges liable to be called on to preside at criminal trials (Stephen and Hawkins, JJ., dissenting), that counsel for a prisoner should not make any statements of alleged facts on the authority of the prisoner which it was not proposed to prove in evidence. See 1 Roscoe Crim. Ev. (8th Am. ed.) * 220.

3. In Georgia, in all criminal trials, the accused may make to the court and jury such statement as he may deem proper in his defense; such statement not to be made under oath and to have such force only as the jury may think right to give it; provided that the prisoner shall not be compelled to answer any questions on cross-examination. Code of Georgia (1882), § 4637.

The law of Florida is substantially the same as that of Georgia, except that the statement is made under oath. Rev. Stats. of Florida (1892), § 2908.

In Wyoming, the defendant in all criminal cases has his option either to be sworn and examined as a witness or to make a statement to the jury without being sworn. Rev. Stats. of Wyoming (1887), § 3288.

In Michigan and Alabama, prisoners were formerly permitted to make only an unsworn statement to the jury. But in both of those states they are now made competent witnesses for themselves. See Michigan Laws 1881; Act No. 245 (Pub. Acts 1881, p. 335);

the jury, who may give them such credit as, in their judgment, they merit.¹

But at common law a prisoner on trial for a criminal offense is not a competent witness in his own behalf.² Neither are persons jointly indicted and tried for the same offense competent witnesses for each other, or for the prosecution.³ So far there is and Criminal Code of Alabama, § 4473, Act of February 17, 1885.

The solicitor should not argue on the prisoner's failure to make a statement. Robinson v. State, 82 Ga. 535. And it is error to charge the jury that they may consider such failure. Bird v. State, 50 Ga. 585.

But counsel may comment on the statement in their addresses to the jury. Beasley v. State, 71 Ala. 328; Reg. v. Malings, 8 C. & P. 242; 34 E. C. L. 371.

It is objectionable for the court to discredit the prisoner's statement by comparing it with the evidence and pointing out discrepancies. Tucker v. State, 57 Ga. 503. But it is not objectionable to tell the jury to consider it in connection with all the evidence, facts, and circumstances of the case. People v. Jones, 24 Mich. 215.

The court may prevent the prisoner from making long rambling statements of irrelevant matter, but he should not be restricted to stating such facts only as are admissible in evidence. Coxwell v. State, 66 Ga. 309; Loyd v. State, 45 Ga. 58; Montross v. State, 72 Ga. 261; 53 Am. Rep. 840; Howard v. State, 73 Ga. 83.

When making their statements, prisoners may not be examined by their own counsel. Chappell v. State, 71 Ala. 322; Hawkins v. State, 29 Fla. 554; Brown v. State, 58 Ga. 212. Neither may they be cross-examined by counsel for the prosecution. Chappell v. State, 71 Ala. 322; Whizenant v. State, 71 Ala. 383; Hawkins v. State, 29 Fla. 554.

The court should sua sponte prevent any interference with the prisoner while making his statement, either by questions or suggestions from the jury, the attorney for the prosecution, or his own attorney. Hawkins v. State, 29 Fla. 554. But the court should, upon request of the prisoner's counsel, make such suggestions to him as will relieve him from embarrassment and enable him to make his statement complete if he desires to do so. People v. Annis, 13 Mich. 511.

In Michigan it was allowable to cross-examine the defendant on his statement, but the cross-examination was confined to matter contained in the statement. Gale v. People, 26 Mich. 157; People v. Thomas, 9 Mich. 321.

It is competent for the prosecution to introduce evidence in rebuttal to disprove the prisoner's statement. Burden v. People, 26 Mich. 162; Holsenbake v. State, 45 Ga. 43; Hanvey v. State, 68 Ga. 612. And the prisoner's statement, made upon a former trial in the same case, may be put in evidence by the prosecution and shown to be false. People v. Arnold, 43 Mich. 303; 38 Am. Rep. 182.

As the defendant does not make his statement in the capacity of a witness, his previous statements are admissible for the purpose of proving his guilt, but are not admissible for the purpose of impeachment. Ortiz v. State, 30 Fla. 256. See also Chappell v. State, 71 Ala. 322.

1. Ross v. State, 59 Ga. 248; Jones v. State, 65 Ga. 506; Stewart v. State, 66 Ga. 90; McConnell v. State, 67 Ga. 635; Brown v. State, 60 Ga. 210; *Reich v. It is error for the judge to charge that the statement of the defendant is not sufficient, in general, to overcome the testimony of a sworn credible witness. The jury should be left free to give the statement such credence as they may think proper. Day v. State, 63 Ga. 667; Durant v. People, 13 Mich. 351; Barber v. State, 13 Fla. 675.

An act of the legislature making a no conflict of authority. The decisions, however, are not harmonious as regards the competency of persons jointly indicted but tried separately. There are many cases in which it is held that accomplices jointly indicted with the prisoner at the bar, but not put upon trial with him, are competent witnesses either for or against him.¹ On the other hand, it is held that an order of severance does not affect the general rule; and that where persons are jointly charged with the commission of a crime, one defendant on trial for a criminal offense a competent witness for himself, does not make his co-defendants in the same indictment competent to testify for him. Foster v. State, 45 Ark. 328.

One of several persons jointly indicted for the same offense is not a competent witness for the prosecution, and it is fatal error to permit him to testify, the other defendants objecting, so long as the indictment against him is not disposed of. Edgerton v. Com., 7 Bush (Ky.) 142; People v. Donnelly, 2 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 182.

Separate Indictment.—An accomplice separately indicted is a competent witness for or against another indicted for the same offense. U. S. v. Henry, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 428; *U. S. v. No Indictment.—The fact that a witness is an accomplice of a defendant does not affect his competency if he is not indicted. Brown v. State, 24 Ark. 620; McKenzie v. State, 24 Ark. 636; Tinckler's Case, 1 East P. C. 354.

Where it is proposed to call an accomplice, jointly indicted with the prisoner, as a witness for the prosecution, it is the better practice to dispose of the indictment as to him by nolle prosequi, a verdict of acquittal at the request of the prosecution, or by judgment of conviction if he has pleaded guilty. Cockburn, C. J., in Winsor v. Reg., L. R., 1 Q. B. 312. But it is not of them is not a competent witness upon the trial of another, so long as they stand jointly indicted for that offense.¹ An order for a separate trial is not a matter of right. It rests within the sound discretion of the court whether the trial shall be joint or separate.²

If a material witness for the prosecution is joined in the indictment, he may be rendered competent as a witness by the entry of a nolle prosequi as to him, or by his acquittal upon motion of counsel for the prosecution before the opening of the case.³ And if, at the conclusion of the case for the prosecution, there is a defendant against whom there is no evidence, it is the usual practice for the court, on motion of counsel for the other defendants, to direct his acquittal, in order that he may be a competent witness for the defense.⁴ But if there is any evidence against him, the court may overrule the motion to direct a separate verdict in his favor for this purpose.⁵

In Com. v. Eastman, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 218; 48 Am. Dec. 506, the court said: "The submitting of the distinct case of one of several defendants to the jury during the progress of a trial is a discretionary power vested in the presiding judge peculiarly within his province and to be exercised only upon his views of the evidence. If there is any evidence against such defendant, there is no legal right in the other defendants to insist upon a finding separately as to him, with a view of using him, if acquitted, as a witness for them, although the presiding judge may strongly incline to the opinion that

One of a number of persons jointly charged with the commission of a crime, who has been separately tried and convicted, or has pleaded guilty, is, after judgment is pronounced in his case, a competent witness for or against his co-defendants, unless he is rendered infamous by the judgment of the court.¹ And, according to the weight of authority, such a defendant is a competent witness upon the trial of his co-defendants before he receives his sentence, since after conviction, or a plea of guilty, he is no longer a party to the issue.² But in some jurisdictions, it has been held that he is not competent to testify at the trial of those jointly indicted with him until judgment is rendered in his case, because, until then, he remains a party to the record, and the proceedings are not at an end in respect to him.³

In Rex v. Lafone, 5 Esp. 155, Lord Ellenborough rejected the testimony of a co-defendant who had suffered judgment, but this case has not been followed as a precedent in England. Thus, in Reg. v. George, 1 C. & M. 111; 41 E. C. L. 66, it appeared that two persons were jointly indicted for housebreaking. One of them pleaded guilty, and the other pleaded not guilty, and was tried. It was held that the prisoner who had pleaded guilty was a competent witness for his co-defendant, although no sentence had been passed on him. And in Reg. v. Hinks, 2 C. & K. 462; 61 E. C. L. 462, decided in 1845, it appeared that three persons were jointly indicted for larceny. Two of them pleaded not guilty and were tried; the third pleaded guilty and was offered as a witness for the prosecution at the trial of the other two. It was objected that he was incompetent, on the ground that no judgment had been pronounced against him, but the court permitted him to be examined, and reserved the point for the opinion of the fifteen judges, who, upon consideration of the case, were of opinion that, at common law, he was a competent witness against the other two prisoners.

In Com. v. Smith, 12 Met. (Mass.) 238, Shaw, C. J., said: "The question in the present case is whether a co-defendant who has pleaded guilty, but has not been sentenced, can be called as a witness for the prosecution. It has been held that a co-defendant who has not been tried, cannot be called as a witness for one put on trial separately. Com. v. Marsh, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 57. So it has been held in New York, that a party in the same indictment cannot be a witness for his co-defendant upon his trial, until he has been acquitted or convicted, People v. Bill, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 95; but the reason does not apply to one who, by conviction on his own confession, has ceased to be a party to the issue to be tried. Rex v. Fletcher, 1 Stra. 633. And in a late case, where a co-defendant had pleaded guilty to a charge of housebreaking, and was called as a witness before sentence, he was admitted. Reg. v. George, 1 C. & M. 111; 41 E. C. L. 66."

Therefore, an avowed particeps criminis, who is not under sentence for the commission of an infamous offense, is a competent witness upon the trial of his associates in crime, unless he is jointly indicted and tried with them.¹ The fact that he is called to testify under a promise of immunity from punishment, goes only to his credibility and does not affect his competency,² although Sir Matthew Hale appears, at one time, to have entertained a different opinion.³ The rule is said to be founded on

Upon the trial of the notorious Johnathan Wild, it appeared that he had under his command a corps of well disciplined thieves, and that his part in the conspiracy was to obtain rewards from the owners of stolen property for helping them to recover possession of it. He was indicted under Stat. 4 Geo. I., ch. 11, § 4, which provided that one guilty of this offense should suffer as the principal felon who stole the goods, and upon his trial the thief who stole the goods was admitted as a witness for the prosecution. Wild's Case, 1 Leach C. In a libel for a divorce, the particeps criminis is a competent witness. Moulton v. Moulton, 13 Me. 110; Brown v. Brown, 5 Mass. 320.

In Vermont, it was once held that, on an indictment for adultery, the particeps criminis was not competent for the prosecution, State v. Annice, N. Chip. (Vt.) 9; but this case was subsequently overruled in State v. Colby, 51 Vt. 295.

necessity, since without the testimony of confederates great offenders would frequently escape punishment for the want of evidence against them;¹ but such testimony should be received with great caution, and as a particeps criminis is generally called to testify for the prosecution under an express or implied promise of pardon, or of a discontinuance of the proceedings against him, it is a matter within the sound discretion of the court whether he will be admitted to testify, and thus escape punishment.² And if, when admitted as a witness, he violates the condition upon which he was admitted, by refusing to give a fair, full, and candid statement of the whole transaction, he may be tried and convicted on his own confession;³ but by the performance of the

for giving his evidence before he gives it, this, if proved, disables his testimony. And so, for my own part, I have always thought that if a person have a promise of pardon if he gives evidence against one of his own confederates, this disables his testimony if it be proved upon him." 2 Hale P. In Charnock's Case, 12 How. St. Tr. 1454, Lord Holt, addressing the jury, said: "Conspiracies are deeds of darkness as well as of wickedness, the discovery whereof can properly come only from the conspirators themselves, and the evidence of accomplices has been always good proof in all ages; and they are the most proper witnesses, for otherwise, it is hardly possible, if not altogether impossible, to have the full proof of such secret contrivances." This language was referred to with approval by Lord Ellenborough in Despard's Case, 28 How. St. Tr. 488.

Summer Ass. 1833; Reg. v. Saunders, Worcester Spring Ass. 1842; Reg. v. Salt, Staff. Spring Ass. 1843; Reg. v. Sparks, 1 F. & F. 388.

In Wight v. Rindskopf, 43 Wis. 344, which was an action by an attorney of a defendant in a former criminal prosecution, for services in inducing the prosecution to permit his client to testify against his confederates in crime, on condition that he himself would not be punished, Ryan, C. J., after reviewing the authorities on this subject, said: "So, it is seen that courts jealously reserve to themselves, and cautiously exercise, the discretion to admit accomplices as witnesses upon the implied promise of pardon; and that a public prosecutor has no authority to make any such agreement with a defendant in an indictment. It is for the court alone to countenance the escape of an accomplice from punishment for giving evidence against those indicted with him. In a proper case, it is doubtless the duty of a public prosecutor to move for leave to use the accomplice as a witness, but there his discretion stops. And though courts must necessarily trust largely in such cases to the view of the public prosecutor, yet they do not lightly give leave and are always presumed to exercise their own judgment in view of all the circumstances. A public prosecutor may propose to an accomplice to become a witness for the prosecution, but an agreement to use him as a witness upon any condition, without the sanction of the court, is a usurpation of authority, an abuse of official character, and a fraud upon the court."

It is not customary to admit more than one accomplice. Barnesley Rioters' Case, 1 Lew. 5. But under peculiar circumstances more than one may be admitted, Rex v. Noakes, 5 C. & P. 326; 24 E. C. L. 342; especially where they testify to different facts, no one of them being able to prove the whole. Scott's Case, 2 Lew. 36.

condition in good faith, he acquires an equitable right to a pardon, or an abandonment of the proceedings against him.¹ If, however, he should be indicted for the same offense, such equitable right may not be pleaded in bar, or otherwise interposed as a defense, but proceedings against him may be stayed until an application for relief can be made to the pardoning power.² The competency of an accomplice does not depend upon the ancient and exploded doctrine of approvement.³

(e) Prosecutors and Informers.—It was held in an early case that the person aggrieved by an offense, at whose instigation criminal proceedings had been set on foot, was not a competent witness for the prosecution,⁴ but the authority of this case was destroyed by subsequent decisions, in which it was laid down as a general rule that prosecutors were competent witnesses in cases where they had no direct and immediate interest in the event of the proceedings.⁵ A singular exception to this general rule was to

If an accomplice in one crime be also indicted for another, and the fact be within the knowledge of the court, he will not, as a rule, be admitted as a witness, Anonymous, 2 C. & P. 411; 12 E. C. L. 194; but if he be so admitted, though he testify in good faith against his accomplices upon one indictment, he will, nevertheless, be put upon his trial on the other and punished upon conviction. *Rex v. 3. Byrd v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 490; Sumpter v. State, 11 Fla. 254.

But the admission of accomplices as witnesses for the prosecution is the modern substitute for the old doctrine of approvement. State v. Wier, 1 Dev. (N. Car.) 363; People v. Whipple, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 710.

"But there is another species of confession which we read much of in our ancient books, of a far more complicated kind, which is called approvement. And that is, when a person indicted of treason or felony, and arraigned for the same, doth confess the fact before plea pleaded, and appeals or accuses others, his accomplices, of the same crime, in order to obtain his pardon. In this case, he is called an approver or prover, probator, and the party appealed or accused is called the appellee. Such approvement can only be in capital offenses, and it is, as it were, equivalent to an indictment, since the appellee is equally called upon to answer it; and if he hath no reasonable and legal exceptions to make to the person of the approver, which, indeed, are very numerous, he must put himself upon his trial, either by battle or by the country; and if vanquished or found guilty, must suffer the judgment of the law, and the approver shall have his pardon ex debito justitiæ. On the other hand, if the appellee be conqueror, or acquitted by the jury, the approver shall receive judgment to be hanged upon his own confession of the indictment; for the condition of his pardon has failed, namely, the convicting of some other person, and therefore, his confession remains absolute." 4 Bl. Com. 329-330.

4. In Rex v. Whiting, 1 Salk. 283, which was a criminal proceeding against the defendant for cheating, it appeared that his mother-in-law had promised him a note for five pounds, but through some trick he obtained her signature to a note for one hundred pounds. Lord Holt, C. J., said that she could not be a witness, for though the verdict upon the information could not be given in evidence in an action upon the note, yet the jury would surely be told of it to influence their verdict.

5. Rex v. Broughton, 2 Stra. 1229; be found in prosecutions for forgery, where it was held that the person whose signature was forged was incompetent to prove the forgery, unless he had a release from those interested in the validity of the instrument.¹ In the United States, this exception has been rejected in a number of jurisdictions as having no foundation in principle,² and the same result was reached in England,

Reg. v. Sewel, 7 Mod. 118; Reg. v. Mackartney, 1 Salk. 286; State v. Truss, 9 Port. (Ala.) 126; Com. v. Oliver, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 474.

Lord Kenyon laid it down as a rule that no objection could be made to the competency of a witness upon the ground of interest, unless he were directly interested in the event of the suit or could avail himself of the verdict in the cause so as to give it in evidence on any future occasion in support of his own interest. Smith v. Prager, 7 T. R. 58; Bent v. Baker, 3 T. R. 27. This rule has the approval of Lord Ellenborough in Rex v. Boston, 4 East 572.

See also Rex v. Ellis, 2 Stra. 1104; Rex v. Nunez, 2 Stra. 1043; prosecutions for perjury, which seem to have been overruled in Rex v. Broughton, 2 Stra. 1229, and Abrahams v. Bunn, 4 Burr. 2255.

In State v. Hassett, 1 Tayl. (N. Car.) 55, the court held that upon a prosecution for perjury, the party against whom the prisoner had previously testified was a competent witness, regarding the doctrine of Rex v. Ellis, 2 Stra. 1104, and Rex v. Nunez, 2 Stra. 1043, as having been exploded.

The fact that the prosecutor is liable for costs if the prosecution proves to be frivolous, does not render him incompetent. Baker v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 353; Gilliam v. Com., 4 Leigh (Va.) 688; State v. Blennerhassett, Walk. (Miss.) 7.

But it has been held that one who undertakes to indemnify the prosecutor against liability for costs, is not a competent witness for the prosecution. Com. v. Gore, 3 Dana (Ky.) 475.

It was held, however, that the fact that a witness for the prosecution had contributed funds to carry it on went only to his credibility. People v. Cunningham, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 524; 43 Am. Dec. 709.

In Rex v. Boston, 4 East 572, Lord Ellenborough, after stating the general rule, said: "The only anomaly that I know in the law, which may be regarded as an exception to this rule, is in the case of forgery, where a prosecutor shall not be permitted to say that the bond purporting to have been made by him was forged. I put this only as an instance. Upon what principle that anomalous case was so settled I cannot pretend to say, but having been so settled, it may be too much for judges sitting on trials to break in upon it. The anomaly can only be remedied now by the legislature." But it was otherwise if the question of forgery arose as one of the issues of fact in a civil action. Hunter v. Rex, 4 B. & Ald. 209; Furber v. Hilliard, 2 N. H. 480.

It has been said that the reason of the rule was that the court would, upon conviction of the prisoner, impound the forged instrument so that it could not afterwards be used in evidence against the person whose signature was forged. Com. v. Snell, 3 Mass. 82; Respublica v. Keating, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 110; Furber v. Hilliard, 2 N. H. 480, citing Tidd 528; Shep. Touchst. 70, 71; 2 East Cr. L. 994; 5 Coke 74, 75.

The person to whom the forged instrument was passed was a competent witness, notwithstanding he had a right of action for damages. State v. Nettleton, 1 Root (Conn.) 308.

by the enactment of a statute which puts the competency of witnesses in prosecutions for forgery on the same footing as in other criminal proceedings.¹

If the prosecutor would receive a direct benefit as a result of the prisoner's conviction, and without the aid of further proceedings, this was sufficient to disqualify him on the ground of interest, unless he was made competent by statute,² except in cases of 116; 34 Am. Dec. 672; State v. Shurtliff, 18 Me. 368.

Furber v. Hilliard, 2 N. H. 481, was not a criminal prosecution, but the court said it was the practice in that state to admit the person whose name was forged in criminal as well as in civil cases. See also Pope v. Nance, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 354; 18 Am. Dec. 60; White v. Green, 5 Jones (N. Car.) 47.

In People v. Howell, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 206, Kent, C. J., said: "The ancient rule in England, that a witness whose name was forged was incompetent to prove the forgery on an indictment, because he was interested in the question, still prevails in their courts, and it was adopted by this court in the year 1794. The grounds or reasons of that decision are not before the public, and we, therefore, do not know them. It is probable that the court assumed the English rule as they found it then existing. But since that time the question of interest in a witness has been investigated and defined with more precision, both in England and in this state. The rule now in all such cases, and I believe I may say in almost all criminal cases, except in the case of a forged instrument, is that the witness is to be received if he be not interested in the event of the suit, so that the verdict could be given in evidence in an action in which he was a party. The interest which the witness may have in the question put is no longer the test. That degree of interest goes only to the credit of the witness. The exclusion of the witness in the case of forgery has, therefore, now become an anomaly in the law of evidence, for it is certain that the conviction of the party charged with forging a check cannot be given in evidence in a subsequent civil suit on the check, and as the reason of the old rule has ceased, by a sounder definition of the question of interest, and as it is not now applied to other criminal cases, it would seem to be fit and proper that the rule itself should no longer be applied to the case of forgery."

2. Thus, in an indictment for forcible entry and detainer, where restitution of possession was awarded upon conviction of the defendant, the person whose land was entered upon or withheld by force was not a competent witness. Rex v. Williams, 9 B. & C. 549; 17 E. C. L. 440; Rex v. Beavan, R. & M. 342; State v. Fellows, 2 Hayw. (N. Car.) 340.

In Republica v. Shryber, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 68, it was held that the wife of the prosecutor, whose land was forcibly detained, was competent to testify as to the force employed but was not competent upon any other point.

And where the prosecutor or informer was entitled to the whole or a part of a penalty, immediately upon conviction of the offender, he was not a competent witness for the prosecution. Rex v. Tilly, 1 Stra. 316; Rex v. Stone, 2 Ld. Raym. 1545; Rex v. Piercy, Andr. 18; Rex v. Blaney, Andr. 240; Van Evour v. State, 2 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 309; State v. Vaughan, 1 Bay (S. Car.) 283; Northcot v. State, 43 Ala. 330. See also a dictum in Sallsbury v. State, 6 Conn. 104.

But a witness who was entitled to a part of the penalty might be rendered competent by a bona fide release of his interest. City Council v. Haywood, 2 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 308.

The benefit to be derived by the prosecutor or informer must be certain, otherwise it will not affect his competency. Thus, where it was discretionary with the court whether the offender should be punished by fine or imprisonment, it was held that the prosecutor was a competent witness. Rex v. Cole, 1 Esp. 169, overruling Rex v. Blackman, 1 Esp. 96.

So, where the statute provided that the offender should, upon conviction of larceny on the high seas, be fined not exceeding fourfold the value of the goods stolen, one moiety of the fine to be paid to the owner of such goods, it was held that the owner of the goods was a competent witness, since the court, robbery or theft, where the prosecutor was a competent witness, although entitled to restoration of his property upon conviction of the offender.¹ If, however, a conviction established only a right of action for a penalty or forfeiture, the prosecutor was a competent witness, because, in order to possess himself of the penalty or forfeiture, an action must be brought against the offender in which the verdict in the criminal prosecution was not admissible as evidence.² But in actions qui tam for the recovery of such penalties, the persons entitled to them were not competent witnesses.³ The fact that a witness will be entitled to a reward in the exercise of its discretion, might impose merely a nominal fine. U. S. v. Murphy, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 203.

Where it is clearly implied from the tenor and provisions of the statute, that the legislature meant to make the prosecutor competent, notwithstanding his immediate interest in the penalty imposed, the case will be considered as a statutory exception to the rule. In Rex v. Williams, 9 B. & C. 549; 17 E. C. L. 440, Bayley, J., said: "Where it is plain that the detection and conviction of the offender are the objects of the legislature, the case will be within the exception, and the person benefited by the conviction will, notwithstanding his interest, be competent. Where this is not the case, the general rule will be applicable and the person incompetent." To the same effect are U. S. v. Murphy, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 203; Murphy v. State, 28 Miss. 650.

By Stat. 2 Geo. II., ch. 24, which was aimed at bribery in elections, it was provided that if anyone who had violated the act became the first informer against another offender, and the latter were found guilty, the informer, if he had not himself been convicted, should be exonerated from all penalties and disabilities denounced against such offenders; and it was held that informers were competent witnesses on the trial of actions against those concerning whom they had given information, notwithstanding their testimony had a direct tendency to relieve them from punishment. These decisions go upon the ground that it was within the reason and spirit of the act that such persons should be competent to testify. Heward v. Shipley, 4 East 180; Bush v. Ralling, Sayer 289; Mead v. Robinson, Willes 423.

1. Salisbury v. State, 6 Conn. 104; Com. v. Moulton, 9 Mass. 30; State v. Casados, 1 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 91.

As pointed out by the court in Rex v. Williams, 9 B. & C. 549; 17 E. C. L. 440, this exception seems to be necessarily implied in Stat. 21 Hen. VIII., ch. 11, which provides that if a felon who robs or takes away any goods, money, or chattels, be attainted by reason of evidence given by the party robbed, or owner of the money, etc., or by any other, by his procurement, the party so robbed, or owner, shall be restored his money, and the court shall award a writ of restitution. But there is a dictum of Best, C. J., in Brook v. Carpenter, 3 Bing. 297; 11 E. C. L. 108, putting it on the broad ground of public policy. He said: "If you prevent the owner of goods stolen from giving evidence on the trial of an indictment for the felony, because he may, by such evidence, obtain restitution of his goods without an action, you would often defeat public justice. It would be absurd to expect a prosecutor to bring his action after the person who stole his goods is convicted."

An innkeeper, upon whose premises and from whose guest property is stolen, is a competent witness upon the prosecution of the offender, as the event of the prosecution will not affect his liability to the owner. Salisbury v. State, 6 Conn. 101.

from the government, or from a private individual, upon the conviction of the offender, goes only to his credibility and does not affect his competency.¹

b. PERSONS NOT PARTIES OF RECORD—(1) In General.—At common law it was a general rule that a person who had a direct legal interest in the event of a cause, such as would tend to bias him against the party objecting, was not a competent witness.² A mere interest in the question at issue, however, or a bias of feeling, due to the possession of interests similar to those of the

In Rex v. Williams, 9 B. & C. 549; 17 E. C. L. 440, Bayley, J., said: "The case of rewards is clear on the grounds of public policy, with a view to the public interest, and because of the principle upon which such rewards are given. The public has an interest in the suppression of crime and the conviction of guilty criminals. It is with a view to stir up greater vigilance in apprehending, that the rewards are given, and it would defeat the object of the legislature, by means of those rewards to narrow the means of conviction, and to exclude testimony which otherwise would have been admissible. It is upon the principle, therefore, that the exclusion of persons entitled to rewards would be inconsistent with the spirit of the acts giving the rewards, and against the grounds of public policy, that their competence is virtually continued. The instance of rewards given by private individuals, which was mentioned in the argument, stands upon a different principle, namely, that the public have an interest, upon public grounds, in the testimony of every person who knows anything as to a crime, and that nothing private individuals can do will take away the right the public have."

It was a general principle that if the effect of a witness's testimony would be to create, increase, or diminish a fund in which he might be entitled to participate, or to prevent the diminution thereof, he was not competent. *Governor v. Amount of Interest.—If it were made to appear that the witness was interested in the event of the suit, the amount of the interest was immaterial. In Bennett v. Hethington, 16 S. & R. (Pa.) 195, *Gibson, C. Although the case of the witness be, in every point and particular, the case of the party by whom he is called to testify; although he expect a benefit from the event; and, in short, although he be subject to as strong a bias as can influence the understanding and actions of man; yet, if he be not implicated in the legal consequences of the judgment, he is competent. By legal consequences are meant those that are fixed, certain and actual, and by which an advantage, not depending on a contingency, is to be gained or lost; such, for instance, as being entitled to give the verdict in evidence in another suit on the one hand, or being subjected to an incumbrance or duty on the other. This is what I understand to be the modern rule, as established in this country for its intrinsic excellence and good sense."

in another form, a direct certain beneficial interest went to the competency of a witness, and all contingent, uncertain and remote interests went only to his credibility.¹ And where there was a doubt as to his interest, it was customary to admit him and leave the question of credibility to the jury.²

Where an action was brought by or against one of a number of persons claiming some right by custom, and the question of the existence and validity of the custom was at issue, the courts used to hold that no one claiming such right by custom was a competent witness, although a stranger to the record, because the judgment obtained would be admissible in evidence for or against him in any subsequent action to determine the validity of his own claim. It was necessary to make it appear that a witness had a legal interest in the event of the suit in order to exclude him. A mere honorary obligation to the party calling him, which could not be enforced at law or in equity, was not sufficient to render him incompetent.¹ And, according to the weight of authority, a belief on the part of the witness that he was interested was not sufficient to exclude him if he were not in fact legally interested.² But, in some jurisdictions, it was held that such a belief rendered a witness incompetent, since it would have as strong a tendency to influence his testimony as the knowledge of an actual interest.³

If a witness acquired an interest in the subject-matter of the suit after he was possessed of knowledge which made him a material witness for one of the parties, he was nevertheless competent, unless such interest was acquired from the party offering him. A party could not thus be deprived of the testimony of a

In Hafner v. Irwin, 4 Ired. (N. Car.) 533, Ruffin, C. J., said: "A witness cannot, by creating by his own act a subsequent interest, without the concurrence of the party calling him, deprive the latter of his evidence. Much less can he do so by agreement with the opposite party. The case of Forrester v. Pigou, 1 M. & S. 9, would seem to be contrary. But the case is not satisfactory; for it does not appear to have been finally decided, but was sent back to a second trial in order to ascertain the facts. At all events, it is not sufficient to overturn the established general rule laid down in all the best writers, and received constantly in the courts of this state, and sanctioned by the approbation of this court in Doe v. Jackson, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 187. To sustain the objection would open a wide way for tampering with witnesses, so as to deprive parties of evidence material to their interest, and to which they had a right."

But where the witness acquired an interest, by a bona fide contract, in the course of business, without any intent on his part, or that of the parties to the action, to render him incompetent, it seems that the rule did not apply. Eastman v. Winship, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 46. See also opinion of Lord Ellenborough in Forrester v. Pigou, 1 M. & S. 14.

In Jackson v. Rumsey, 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 237, Kent, J., said: "The interest, in order to exclude the witness, must not have arisen after the fact to which he is called to testify happened, and by his own act, without the interference or consent of the party by whom he is called; because, in that case, it would be in the power of the witness, and even of the adverse party, to deprive the person wanting his testimony of the benefit of it."

In England, the rule seems to have been confined to cases where a fraudulent attempt was made to render the witness incompetent. See opinion of Lord Ellenborough in Forrester v. Pigou, 3 Camb. 380; 1 M. & S. 9.

Where the witness's interest in the subject-matter of the suit was balanced between the parties, but he was liable to one of them for costs, this destroyed the balance and rendered him incompetent for the party to whom he was so liable. *Beach v. include the matter in which he was interested.¹ A person who was not a party to the suit was presumed to be a competent witness, and the party objecting to his testimony had the burden of showing a disqualifying interest.²

(2) Real Parties in Interest—(a) General Rule.—It was a general rule of the common law that a witness was not competent where his testimony would tend to create, or increase, a fund in which he would be entitled to participate, or would tend to prevent the diminution of the same.³

(b) Cestui que Trustent.—Accordingly, a cestui que trust, being substantially, though not nominally, a party, was not a competent witness for the trustee in actions concerning the trust estate or fund,⁴ but he was competent for the other side, since in that case he testified against interest.⁵ And his admissions against interest were competent evidence against the trustee so far as they related to matters in which his interest and that of the trustee were identical.⁶

(c) Bankrupts and Their Creditors.—So, also, a bankrupt is interested in increasing the estate in the hands of his assignee, since his allowance in many cases depends upon the amount of funds recovered by the assignee, and he is always entitled to any surplus that may remain after payment of his debts and the expenses of the proceedings. Therefore, he was formerly not a competent witness where the effect of his testimony would be to increase

It was held that he was incompetent to give evidence concerning the taking of the barrel, since the verdict must necessarily include the whisky, in which he was directly interested.

the fund or prevent its diminution.¹ In order to become a competent witness for the assignee, it was necessary for him to obtain his certificate and release his allowance and his claim to the surplus,² and even then he was not competent for the purpose of impeaching or supporting the fiat issued against him.³ If it appeared that he had no interest in the event of the suit to which his assignee was a party, he was competent.⁴ And in an action against his sureties, where he was the principal debtor, he was competent, after his discharge, to prove usury in the contract, since the discharge freed him from all legal liability to either the creditor or the sureties.⁵

thereof, applied also to an insolvent debtor who made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and if his future acquisitions of property were liable to be seized to satisfy the judgment rendered in the insolvency proceedings, he could not be made a competent witness by releasing his surplus to the assignee.¹

The creditors of a bankrupt or of an insolvent debtor are the persons primarily interested in the fund which comes into the possession of the assignee, as it is to that they must look for the payment of their debts. At common law, they were not competent witnesses where their testimony would tend to preserve or increase the fund.² Neither were they competent witnesses to support the bankruptcy, as they were directly interested in having the debtor's whole estate applied to the payment of his debts,³ but they were competent to prove fraud on the part of the debtor in order to prevent his obtaining his discharge.⁴ A creditor who had sold his claim against the insolvent estate, or had made a valid agreement to sell it, had no further interest in the matter and was, therefore, a competent witness.⁵

(d) Persons Interested in the Estates of Decedents.—In an action by or against the executor or administrator of a deceased person, the result of which might either have increased or decreased the value of the decedent's estate, heirs at law and persons entitled to distributive shares of such estate were not formerly competent

In the following cases, persons who had made assignments for the benefit of creditors were admitted as witnesses for their respective assignees, under statutes excluding only parties and persons for whose immediate benefit the action was brought. Krum v. Beard, 31 Mo. 505; Allen v. Hudson River Mut. Ins. Co., 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 442; Jones v. East Soc. of M. E. Church, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 161; Legee v. Burbank, 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 419; *Allen v. In Jacks v. Nichols, 3 Sandf. Ch. (N.

Y.) 317, it was held that the fact that the witness was a preferred creditor was immaterial, unless it were shown that there were sufficient assets to pay his claim independently of the matter in controversy. But in the later case of Duel v. Fisher, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 516, the court said that the incompetency of a witness would not be presumed from doubtful circumstances, and accordingly held the objector had the burden of showing that the fund in hand was insufficient to pay the claim of a witness who was a preferred creditor.

The heirs of a deceased mortgagor were not, in a suit by an assignee to redeem, competent to prove the assignment fraudulent, for that would be to establish their own title. Randall v. Phillips, 3 Mason (U. S.) 378.

Where the ancestor had made a will, it was held that one who would have been a distributee of his estate, had he died intestate, was a competent witness, unless it was shown that he was interested under the will. M'Kinna v. Hayter, 2 Hawks. (N. Car.) 422.

A husband was not a competent witness in behalf of an estate of which his wife was a distributee. Caperton v. Calison, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 396; Terry v. Belcher, 1 Bailey (S. Car.) 568.

Where the issue was whether the deceased left anyone related to him with in the degrees entitled to claim a share of his estate, one claiming to be next of kin was not a competent witness. State v. Greenwell, 4 Gill & J. (Md.) 407.

In the following cases it was held that distributees were competent witnesses under statutory changes of the law: Perry v. McGuire, 31 Mo. 287; Stein v. Weidman, 20 Mo. 17 (overruling Penn v. Watson, 20 Mo. 13); Butt v. Butt, 1 Ohio St. 222; Gunnison v. Lane, 45 Me. 165; Nash v. Reed, 46 Me. 168; Wheeler v. Towns, 43 N. H. 56; Swofford v. Gray, 8 Ind. 508.

Co-executors.—In an action against the personal representative of a deceased co-executor to recover a legacy, upon the allegation that the funds for its payment came to the hands of such deceased co-executor, the surviving executor was not a competent witness for the plaintiff. Doebler v. Snively, 5 Watts (Pa.) 225.

2. Hall v. Alexander, 9 Ala. 219; Dent v. Portwood, 17 Ala. 242; Hernndon v. Givens, 19 Ala. 313; Boon v. Nelson, 2 Dana (Ky.) 391.

One who had transferred his entire interest in the estate was competent. Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 355.

So, also, was an heir who had conveyed his share of the real estate and released to the administrator as such, his interest in the personal property. Reed v. Gilbert, 32 Me. 519.

A distributee who had received his share and settled with the administratrix, was held to be a competent witness for her upon executing and delivering to her a release of all his interest in the recovery, the possible liability to refund in case of further claims against the estate, not then exhibited, being considered too remote and contingent to affect his competency, in the absence of proof of such outstanding claims. Spann v. Ballard, 1 Rice (S. Car.) 440.

Where co-heirs had executed mutual deeds of partition, one of them was held to be a competent witness for another in an action against a third party involving the title to the plaintiff's part of the estate. Morris v. Harris, 9 Gill (Md.) 19. But in Asay v. Hoover, 5 Pa. St. 21; 40 Am. Dec. 713, it was held that those heirs who had conveyed all their interest in the estate of the course, competent to testify against interest without executing releases.¹

A residuary legatee was not, at common law, a competent witness to protect or increase the fund upon which the residuum of the estate depended.² And a specific legatee was not competent in behalf of the estate if there appeared to be any probability of an abatement of his legacy.³ But a specific legatee who had been paid, was a competent witness for the executor in the absence of a showing that the remaining funds would not be sufficient to meet the liabilities of the estate. In such cases, the possibility that the legatee might be called upon to refund was considered too remote and contingent to affect his competency as a witness.⁴ And where a legatee's interest was such decendent to another heir, who was a party of record, were not competent witnesses for him.

A release by a distributee of his interest in the property in dispute, without releasing his entire interest in the estate, was not sufficient to restore his competency, Smith v. Morgan, 8 Gill (Md.) 133; Coate v. Coate, 37 Ala. 695; Allen v. Blanchard, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 631; unless the personal representative also released his interest in the estate from all liability for the costs of the action. King v. King, 9 N. J. Eq. 44; Baxter v. Buck, 10 Vt. 548. But in Boynton v. Turner, 13 Mass. 391, it appeared that a minor had hired a chaise to carry his sick brother home, and on his return a stage coach was driven against the chaise and it was upset and broken. His father's executrix brought an action against the driver of the coach for damages done to the chaise, and it was held that the son who had driven the chaise was made a competent witness for the executrix by a release of all his interest in any judgment which might be obtained in the case.

On the trial of an issue devisavit vel non, a legatee under the will was a competent witness against its validity, Landis v. Landis, 1 Grant's Cas. (Pa.) 248; unless he would, as a distributee, receive a greater share of the estate by defeating the will; in which case he was incompetent from interest to testify against it. Roberts v. Trawick, 13 Ala. 68. But he might then testify in support of it. Clark v. Vorce, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 232.

A legatee was competent for the executor, in an action against him for the price of a suit of mourning furnished the widow, as this was not a funeral expense which should be borne by the estate. Johnson v. Baker, 2 C. & P. 207; 12 E. C. L. 92.

4. Clarke v. Gunnon, 1 Ry. & M. 31; Clealand v. Huey, 18 Ala. 346; Johnson v. Lewis, 8 Ga. 460; Cornell v. Vanartsdalen, 4 Pa. St. 364; Mesick v. Mesick, 7 Barb. (N. Y.) 120; Higgins v. Morrison, 4 Dana (Ky.) 106.

Where the will had been proved twenty-seven years before the witness, a legatee, was called to testify, it was presumed that the legatee had been paid, and, there not being anything in as would exclude him, he might be rendered competent by releasing the same before testifying.¹

So, also, a devisee who took under the will a vested interest in the testator's real estate was not, at common law, a competent witness in support of the will.² And if it were to his interest to defeat the will, he was not competent to testify against it.³ In an action by a creditor against the executor to charge the land devised with the payment of the testator's debts, a devisee was not a competent witness for the defendant.⁴ In ejectment against a devisee, a co-devisee, a tenant in common of the defendant, not being in actual possession, was held to be a competent witness for the defense.⁵

(3) Persons Jointly Interested with a Party.—In a contest between a member of a firm and a third party, concerning partnership matters, another member of the firm was not a competent witness for his co-partner, because he was directly interested in protecting the firm.⁶ In case a member of the firm was sued the case to show that he would be called upon to refund, he was held to be competent. Levers v. Van Buskirk, 4 Pa. St. 315.

In Willcocks v. Phillips, 1 Wall. Jr. (C. * C.) 47, it appeared that the legatee had been voluntarily paid by the executor after notice of the claim against the estate then in litigation, and that if said claim were established, the estate would not be sufficient to pay it. Nevertheless, the paid legatee was admitted as a competent witness for the executor, since by the law of the jurisdiction neither the executor nor the creditor could recover the legacy back.

A specific legatee was a competent witness unless there was reasonable probability that his legacy must be resorted to for the payment of debts. Learey v. Littlejohn, 1 Murph. (N. Car.) 406; Carlisle v. Burley, 3 Me. 250.

1. Lowe v. Jolliffe, 1 W. Bl. 364; Goodtitle v. Welford, Doug. 139; Martin v. Mitchell, 28 Ga. 382; Whelpley v. Loder, 1 Dem. (N. Y.) 368; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239; Meehan v. Rourke, 2 Bradf. (N. Y.) 385; Reeve v. Crosby, 3 Redf. (N. Y.) 74; Coffin v. Coffin, 23 N. Y. 9; 80 Am. Dec. 235.

It has been held that a residuary legatee was rendered competent for the executor by assigning to him individually all his interest in the cause of action, and his releasing the residuary share of the witness from all liability for the costs of the action. Steininger v. Hoch, 42 Pa. St. 432. But such legatee would not have been competent if his residuary share had not been relieved of liability for costs. Baker v. Tyrwhitt, 4 Campb. 27.

In some cases, it has been held that a subscribing witness to a will may not testify in proceedings to determine its validity, unless he were a competent witness at the time the will was executed. Vrooman v. Powers, 47 Ohio St. 191; Huie v. McConnell, 2 Jones (N. Car.) 455.

2. Hilliard v. Jennings, 1 Ld. Raym. 595; cited in Windham v. Chetwynd, 1 Burr. 424; Pyke v. Crouch, 1 Ld. Raym. 730.

3. Thus, where he would take a greater interest as heir at law than was devised to him, he was not competent to testify in opposition to the will. Canfield v. Ball, 8 N. J. Eq. 582. And the same was true where a devisee under a prior will was offered to impeach a subsequent one under which he took nothing, because if the will were defeated the prior one might take effect. Hall v. Hall, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 373.

4. Norris v. Johnston, 5 Pa. St. 287. See also Bloor v. Davies, 7 M. & W. 235.

5. Jackson v. Nelson, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 248. The court rested this decision on the ground that the interest of the witness was in the question and not in the event of the action, since he could not be turned out of actual possession as a result of judgment, and not being a party to the action he would not be bound by the judgment, and the record could not be given in evidence against him.

individually for a partnership debt, it was held, in some jurisdictions, that a co-partner, not joined as a defendant, was a competent witness for the plaintiff, on the ground that his testimony was against interest, as he would be liable to the defendant for his proportionate share of the debt in case the plaintiff recovered;¹ but according to the weight of authority, he was not competent for the plaintiff to prove either the partnership or the

In Robertson v. Mills, 2 Har. & G. (Md.) 98, a co-partner of the defendant was admitted for the defense, the effect of his testimony being to charge himself with the whole debt and exonerate the defendant.

Effect of Release.—A partner of a defendant, who was not sued, could not, according to the weight of authority, be rendered competent for the defense, by being released from his liability to contribute, because it was still to his interest to protect the firm by preventing the seizure and sale of the defendant's interest therein. Young v. Bairner, 1 Esp. 103; Cheyne v. Koops, 4 Esp. 112; Simons v. Smith, 1 Ry. & M. 29; Cline v. Little, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 486; Tomkins v. Beers, 2 Root (Conn.) 498; Black v. Marvin, 2 P. & W. Clarke*, 36 Pa. St. 114; White v. Jones, 14 La. Ann. 692.

The English rule was afterwards so far modified as to admit the co-partner of the defendant, provided the defendant and the witness executed mutual releases. Wilson v. Hirst, 4 B. & Ad. 760; 24 E. C. L. 156. See also White v. Tucker, 9 Iowa 100; Chapman v. Andrews, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 240.

In some jurisdictions, however, it was held that a release by the defendant from all liability to contribute, rendered his co-partner, not joined as a party, a competent witness for him.

LeRoy v. Johnson, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 194; Bagley v. Osborn, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 527; Lefferts v. DeMott, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 136; Wilson v. Smith, 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 408. See also Chapman v. Andrews, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 240; Long v. Story, 13 Mo. 4.

A dormant partner, who was not a party to the action, might release his interest to his co-partners and be a witness for the firm. Clarkson v. Carter, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 84.

Where his interest was equally balanced between the parties, he was competent. Black v. Campbell, 6 W. Va. 51.

One who had a share in the profits of a firm but was not liable for its debts was rendered competent for the firm by releasing all his interest in the suit. Curcier v. Pennock, 14 S. & R. (Pa.) 51.

In an action against the representative of a deceased partner, upon a partnership contract, it was held that the surviving partner was competent for the defense to prove the partnership, on the ground that the survivor only might be sued on such contract, and, though his testimony would defeat the action against the decedent's representative, the witness still remained liable himself. Grant v. Shurter, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 148.

One partner was a competent witness for another if he had no interest in the event of the suit. Thomas v. Brady, 10 Pa. St. 164; Sloan v. Bangs, 11 Rich. (S. Car.) 97; Mooreman v. De Graffenread, 2 Mill (S. Car.) 195; Grant v. Shurter, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 148. See also Ward v. Coulter, 4 N. J. L. 236.

liability of the defendant, because he was directly interested in increasing the number of persons who should share the burden for which he was liable by his own admission.¹ Where partners were joined as parties to an action, one of them could not, pendente lite, make such a disposition of his interest as would render him competent for his co-partners.²

A member of a firm was competent to prove the joint ownership of property by himself and his co-partner when his own interest was not in litigation, for example, where it was sought to appropriate his partner's interest to the payment of his individual debts. Page v. Weeks, 13 Mass. 199.

Pollys*, 16 B. Mon. (Ky.) 355.

The case of Crook v. Taylor, 12 Ill. 355, supported a contrary rule, but it was overruled in Hurd v. Brown, 25 Ill. 616, and Brown v. Hurd, 41 Ill. 121.

In Columbian Mfg. Co. v. Dutch, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 128, Shaw, C. J., said: "By testifying against the plaintiffs in favor of the defendant, he would defeat the action against himself and so would seem to have an interest against the plaintiffs. But it must be considered that by defeating this action he lays the foundation for another action against himself, in which he must be solely charged with the whole debt; whereas, if he testifies against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiffs, he fixes the other defendant as equally liable with himself for the debt; equally liable for the whole in the first instance, and ultimately liable prima facie to contribution. This principle was recognized and formed the point of the decision in Brown v. Brown, 4 Taunt. 752, which was recognized and confirmed by Mant v. Main- waring, 8 Taunt. 139; 2 J. B. Moore 9. There appearing to be a plain interest in the witness, to charge the other defendant with a proportion of the debt, and no apparent interest to counterbalance it, it appears to us that he had a preponderance of interest to testify in favor of the party calling him, and was, of course, incompetent."

A partner who had sold out to his co-partners, and had been released by them, was held competent for the plaintiff in an action against the firm for a debt incurred while he was a member. Hosack v. Rogers, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 313.

But he was not competent for them if the effect of a judgment in their favor would be to discharge a claim for which he remained jointly liable. Kapp v. Barthan, 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 622.

A partner, who had assumed all the debts and liabilities of the firm, was competent for the plaintiff in an action against his former co-partners, because he was ultimately liable for the whole debt in any event. Bell v. Thompson, 34 Ill. 529; Brown v. Hurd, 41 Ill. 121.

In Ripley v. Thompson, 12 Moore 55; 22 E. C. L. 433, which was an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, a partner of the defendant was offered as a witness for the plaintiff and rejected, on the ground that he was interested in procuring a verdict against the defendant which would relieve him from paying a part of the claim. It is difficult to reconcile this decision with the English cases cited in the last preceding note.

In Pennsylvania it was held that a partner of the defendant could not be compelled to testify in behalf of the plaintiff. Taylor v. Henderson, 17 S. & R. (Pa.) 453.

But it was held that in actions against personal representatives of deceased partners, surviving partners, who were willing to testify, were competent for the plaintiff. Collier v. Leech, 29 Pa. St. 404; Brewster v. Sterrett, 32 Pa. St. 115; Wright v. Funck, 94 Pa. St. 26.

2. Dougherty v. Smith, 4 Metc.

One part owner of personal property was not a competent witness for another who was engaged in a contest with a third person involving the title to such property.¹ In an action to enforce a liability arising from the partial ownership of property, or a joint contract, a part owner, or joint contractor, not sued, was not competent for the defense, because he was liable to contribute if the plaintiff succeeded;² neither was he competent for the plaintiff, since it was to his interest to compel the defendant to share the liability.³ A part owner of goods, who authorized his

In Collins v. Flowers, 1 How. (Miss.) 26, the court said: "We understand it to be a well established rule of evidence that a member of a partnership can never be so far divested of his interest in the firm, by any act of himself and co-partners, as to be made a competent witness, in a matter relating to the partnership whilst he was a member."

In an action against partners upon a note signed with the firm name, the one who signed, being willing to testify and having been first released by the plaintiff from any other action on the note, was held to be a competent witness for the plaintiff, on the ground that he was called to testify against interest to make himself liable with others. Whitehead v. Pittsburgh Bank, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 172.

1. Caldwell v. Cole, 13 Me. 120.

But a partner who sold partnership property might be a witness for the vendee, where the title to the property was in question, upon receiving a release from the vendee to himself. Churchill v. Bailey, 13 Me. 64.

2. Thus, in a proceeding against a steamboat to recover damages done to the plaintiff's property, a part owner of the boat, though not a party of record, was not competent for the defense. Steamboat Farmer v. McCraw, 31 Ala. 659. See also West v. Steamboat Berlin, 3 Iowa 532.

Neither was a part owner of a vessel competent for the master in an action against the latter for the wages of seamen. Lufkin v. Patterson, 38 Me. 282. Nor was the master competent for the owners of the vessel in a similar action. Malone v. Bell, 1 Pet. Adm. 139; Jones v. The Phoenix, 1 Pet. Adm. 201. See also Galloway v. Morris, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 445; Atkins v. Burrows, 1 Pet. Adm. 244.

The mortgagee of the share of one of the owners of a vessel was competent for the owners, in an action against them for the price of supplies. Macy v. DeWolf, 3 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 193.

A joint contractor, being liable to contribute in case the plaintiff recovered, was not competent for his fellow contractor. Ransom v. Keyes, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 128.

Thus, in assumpsit for services as a schoolmistress, a co-contractor, though not sued, was held incompetent for the defense. Hall v. Rex, 6 Bing. 181; 19 E. C. L. 47; 3 M. & P. 273.

An agreement, by one member of a firm, to indemnify an officer in selling property which had been levied on for a partnership debt, did not, per se, render another partner incompetent as a witness for the officer in a suit against him by one who claimed the property sold, such contract being outside of the legitimate business of the firm, and not binding on the other partner without his consent. Thompson v. Franks, 37 Pa. St. 327. Compare Ward v. Chase, 35 Me. 515.

Where two persons had separate causes of action for a failure to perform a covenant, the one who did not sue was a competent witness for the other. Ford v. Bronaugh, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 14.

3. In an action for repairs done to a vessel against one part owner, who neglected to plead the non-joinder of the others in abatement, another part owner was not a competent witness for the plaintiff to prove the ownership of the defendant. Marquand v. Webb, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 89.

But one joint owner was competent to prove the tortious acts of another for which the witness was not liable. Thus, where the plaintiff, who had bought the bar of a steamboat, was wrongfully ejected therefrom by a number of the owners of the boat, a part owner who was not a joint tort-feasor with the defendants, was held to be a competent witness for the plaintiff to prove the co-owner to sell the same as his own, looking to the vendor for payment, was competent to prove the contract of sale as he had no interest in the event of the suit.¹ In an action against the owner of part of a milldam to recover damages for flowing lands, the owner in severalty of another part of the dam was competent for the defendant.² Where a lessee covenanted that he would pay to each of the lessors severally a specified part of the rent reserved, one of the lessors was competent for another in an action by the latter to recover his share of the rent.³

(4) In Actions Concerning Real Estate.—In ejectment by a tenant in tail to try the validity of a common recovery, the remainderman was not a competent witness for the plaintiff, because he had a direct interest in the plaintiff's recovery upon which his remainder would immediately revest.⁴ In an action of ejectment, the tenant in possession was not competent for the defendant, because a judgment for the plaintiff would have the effect of turning him out of possession.⁵ Neither was a lessor competent to prove a right of possession in his lessee.⁶

A lessor was a competent witness for his lessee generally, unless the matter in controversy involved his own interest directly tortious acts of the defendants. Lee v. Murray, 12 Mo. 280.

In an action on a policy of insurance on goods, a part owner of the vessel, not interested in the insurance, was competent to prove the loss and other facts. Ruan v. Gardner, 1 Wash. (U. S.) 145.

1. Outwater v. Dodge, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 403.

2. Clement v. Durgin, 5 Me. 9. The court reasoned that the record of the case could not be used as evidence for or against the witness in an action against him, and neither was he liable to contribute in case of a recovery by the plaintiff.

"The person to whom the remainder of an estate is, after the determination of the particular estate, limited by will, cannot be admitted to prove the will, because he has, although it be remote, a vested interest in the matter in question." *Lee, C. In quare impedit, respecting the right of presentation to an advowson claimed by the defendant through his mother, who was seised of an estate of inheritance, it was held that the father of the defendant, who was tenant by the curtesy, was not a competent witness for the defense. *Gully v. or some right in which he was bound to protect the lessee.¹ So, also, a lessee might be a witness for his lessor when he had no interest in the event of the suit,² but was incompetent for him on the trial of an issue which might affect his own enjoyment of the estate demised.³ A tenant in common was a competent witness for his co-tenant in an action of ejectment brought by the latter against a disseisor.⁴

122; 13 Am. Dec. 514; Wilson v. Douglas, 2 Strobb. (S. Car.) 97.

In Strawbridge v. Cartledge, 7 W. & S. (Pa.) 398, it was held that the lessor of the defendant in ejectment was not competent for his lessee, notwithstanding he had conveyed his reversionary interest before the trial, because, if the plaintiff recovered, the witness would be answerable to him for the mesne profits so long as he had held the land by his tenant during the ownership of the plaintiff.

1. Thus, where the lease did not bind the lessor to protect the lessee against trespassers, he was competent for the lessee in an action for trespass to the leased premises. McCormick v. Bailey, 10 Cal. 230. So, also, a landlord who had leased his land to a tenant for a year for a specified part of the crop, was competent to prove a trespass upon the land and damages by the destruction of the crop. His interest was in the question only, and not in the event of the suit, since he was not entitled to any part of the damages which the plaintiff might recover, but must bring a separate action against the trespasser to recover his own damages for the loss of rent. Sanderlin v. Shaw, 6 Jones (N. Car.) 225.

In an action by a lessee to recover damages for obstructing him in the use of a right of way to repair a dam which was a part of the demised premises, the plaintiff's lessor was held to be incompetent to prove the right of way, on the double ground that he was directly interested in the matter in controversy and was also bound to protect his tenant in the quiet enjoyment of the premises. Dickson v. Boland, 4 Pa. St. 112.

2. Grant v. Beall, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 419; Baker v. Pearce, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 502; Detweiler v. Groff, 10 Pa. St. 376.

In an action for injury to the reversion in taking out coal, the lessee of the surface was a competent witness for the plaintiff. Pennsylvania Salt Mfg. Co. v. Neel, 54 Pa. St. 9.

A lessee who had covenanted not to remove from the demised premises any building which he might put thereon until the rents were paid, was a competent witness for the lessor in an action for damages against a third person who had purchased such a building from the lessee and removed it by his consent, the rents not being paid; he was liable to one of the parties in any event, and his interest was equally balanced. Forbes v. Williams, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 393.

In a contest between the landlord and an execution creditor of the tenant, as to the distribution of the proceeds of the tenant's goods found on the demised premises, the tenant was competent to prove the terms of the demise. Collins' Appeal, 35 Pa. St. 83. See also Alexander v. Mahon, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 185.

And where the landlord had distrained property claimed by a third person as his own, the tenant was a competent witness for the claimant. McConahy v. Kessler, 3 P. & W. (Pa.) 467.

In an action by a landlord against the sheriff for removing the goods of the tenant from the premises under an execution, without securing the payment of the rent, the tenant was not competent for the plaintiff, for he came to compel the sheriff to pay his rent. Thurgood v. Richardson, 4 C. & P. 481; 19 E. C. L. 484.

3. Kuester v. Keck, 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 16. In an action against the owner and lessor of a ferry for damages done to the plaintiff's property, the lessee, who had charge of the ferry and was receiving tolls at the time of the loss, was not a competent witness for the defendant, because he was liable over to him for any damages which had resulted from his own negligence. Harris v. Plant, 31 Ala. 639.

4. Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 460; Bennett v. Hethington, 16 S. & R. (Pa.) 193. In such cases, the witness was interested in the question only as he could not be put in either a better or a worse position by the judgment. Thus,

In a contest between a mortgagee and a subsequent purchaser of the premises, respecting the validity of the mortgage, the mortgagor was not a competent witness for the mortgagee, because he was interested in having the proceeds of the land applied in discharge of a debt for which he was personally liable.¹ But where the contest was between two mortgagees as to the priority of their respective liens, the mortgagor stood indifferent and was competent for either of them.² Where the mortgaged premises had been sold at sheriff's sale the mortgagor was competent for the purchaser to prove usury in the mortgage.³ And upon the trial of an issue between a mortgagee and a third person the mortgagor was a competent witness if he would neither gain nor lose by the event of the suit.⁴

in Bennett v. Hethington, 16 S. & R. (Pa.) 196; Gibson, C. J., said: "Here the plaintiff has elected to sue alone, and what would the witness gain by his recovery? The possession of his own freehold would not be restored; but for that he would be driven to a separate action, in which the verdict in this would not be competent evidence. Neither would the possession of his co-tenant, when recovered, avail him to save the bar of the Statute of Limitation, for he who recovers an undivided interest in a several action, holds in common with him from whom it is recovered; the latter continuing to hold the estates of those who remain ousted." See also Cheswell v. Eastham, 16 N. H. 296.

But in an early Connecticut case, it was held that, in such an action, one tenant in common was not competent for another, because, in that state, the possession of one was the possession of all, even when recovered from a disseisor. Barrett v. French, 1 Conn. 354; 6 Am. Dec. 241.

1. Howard v. Chadbourne, 3 Me. 461; Hartz v. Woods, 8 Pa. St. 471.

But he might be rendered competent for the mortgagee if the latter released him from so much of the debt as should not be satisfied by the land mortgaged and covenanted to resort to the lands as the sole fund for the payment of the debt. Howard v. Chadbourne, 5 Me. 15.

2. Willard v. Ramsburg, 22 Md. 206; Wilcox v. Hill, 11 Mich. 256; Gilman v. Moody, 43 N. H. 244. Contra, Sitlington v. Brown, 7 Leigh (Va.) 271.

And upon an issue of priority of liens between a mortgagee and an attaching creditor of the mortgagor, the mortgagor was admissible as a witness for the mortgagee. Carter v. Champion, 8 Conn. 549; 21 Am. Dec. 695.

In a contest between two mortgagees it was held that the mortgagor was not competent to defeat the lien of the prior mortgage by proving it usurious. Beverley v. Brooke, 2 Leigh (Va.) 425.

3. Cummins v. Wire, 6 N. J. Eq. 73; Brolasky v. Miller, 9 N. J. Eq. 807; Nichols v. Holgate, 2 Aik. (Vt.) 138.

And the mortgagor was a competent witness for a subsequent judgment creditor who attacked the lien of the mortgage on the ground of usury. Post v. Dart, 8 Paige (N. Y.) 639. Or on the ground of a want of consideration for the mortgage. Lamar v. Simpson, 1 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 71; 42 Am. Dec. 345. And he was also competent for a grantee of the mortgaged premises to prove payment of the mortgage. Beach v. Cooke, 28 N. Y. 508; 86 Am. Dec. 260. See also Gage v. Whittier, 17 N. H. 312. But the grantee was not competent to prove payment by the mortgagor. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Waggoner, 16 Ind. 367.

In an action by a mortgagee to recover possession of the mortgaged property from a subsequent purchaser, the mortgagor was held competent to prove the consideration of the mortgage and that it remained unpaid. Miller v. Dillon, 2 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 73. See also King v. Bailey, 8 Mo. 332.

But in ejectment by a mortgagee, against one claiming from the mortgagor under a quitclaim deed, the mortgagor was not competent for the plaintiff; because he was liable on his mortgage bond for the whole debt, if the defendant succeeded, but, having conveyed by quitclaim only, he was bound by no covenants to his grantee in any event. Jackson v. M'Chesney, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 360; 17 Am. Dec. 521.

A junior mortgagee was not competent for the mortgagor to prove the prior mortgage invalid.¹ In proceedings to set aside a mortgage on the ground of fraud, the mortgagee was not competent to prove that his assignee took without notice of the alleged fraud,² but if a mortgagee had no legal interest in the event of the suit he was a competent witness either for or against the mortgagor.³

One who had conveyed land by deed of quitclaim, was a competent witness for his grantee because, being bound to him by no covenants, he would incur no liability to him in any event.⁴ But a mortgage of the principal debtor's land, paid the debt and foreclosed the mortgage, the mortgagor was a competent witness for him in an action against the mortgagor's immediate vendor to recover damages for a breach of the covenants of warranty running with the land. Gunter v. Williams, 40 Ala. 561.

In ejectment by an assignee of a mortgagee against a stranger, the mortgagor was competent for the defendant to prove notice to the mortgagee that part of the land did not belong to the mortgagor, and was by mistake included in the mortgage. Mott v. Clark, 9 Pa. St. 399; 49 Am. Dec. 566.

1. Doe v. Bamford, 11 Ad. & El. 786; 39 E. C. L. 228.

In an action upon a bond accompanied by a mortgage, it was held that a subsequent mortgagee was competent for the defendant, but the court said it would have been otherwise had the action been on the mortgage instead of the bond. Enters v. Peres, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 279.

Prior Attachment.—Neither was a mortgagee competent to defeat the lien of an attachment levied on the mortgaged premises prior to the execution of his mortgage. Rideout v. Newton, 17 N. H. 71.

2. Perrin v. Johnson, 16 Ind. 72.

But in Shrom v. Williams, 43 Pa. St. 520, it was held that the original mortgagee was competent to prove that the mortgagor had received only a part of the amount for which the mortgage was given, and that the assignee of the mortgage took with knowledge of that fact.

3. Thus, where the mortgagee had entered, for condition broken, and rented the premises to another, he was competent to prove these facts in an action for use and occupation brought by the mortgagor against the tenant. Plympton v. Moore, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 191.

The mortgagee was competent for the mortgagor in a writ of entry brought by the latter against an alleged disseisor, as the record could not be used as evidence either to support or defeat his mortgage. Woodman v. Skeetup, 35 Me. 464.

The grantor was competent to prove the execution of the deed so far as he was concerned. Smith v. Morrow, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 442; Jackson v. Britton, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 507. Contra, Barry v. Wilbourne, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 91.

One who had twice granted the same land, once by deed of warranty, and again by deed of quitclaim, was competent for the grantee by quitclaim, because it was to his interest to support the deed of warranty. Wise v. Tripp, 13 Me. 9. But one who had acquired land by fraud, and fraudulently conveyed it by quitclaim, was not competent for his grantee, because he was liable to him for the fraud. Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 371.

A co-parcener who had executed a one who conveyed with general warranty was not competent to support the title, because in the event of its defeat he was liable on his covenants;¹ his competency might, however, be restored by a valid release from all liability on his covenants.² And if he conveyed with special warranty against all persons claiming under him, he was competent for his grantee without a release when the opposing party did not claim under him.³ A grantor was competent to impeach his deed when he was without interest in the event of the suit, or was called to testify against interest.⁴ The deed of release to another co-parcener, was competent for the latter in a contest for possession of the land. Rogers v. Turley, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 355.

One who had conveyed adjoining parcels of land to different persons by deeds of warranty, was not competent to prove that the first deed did not include the premises conveyed by the latter, as he was interested in supporting the latter deed. Jackson v. Hallenback, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 394.

Where the boundary and not the title was in controversy, he was competent for the grantee. Robertson v. Mosson, 26 Tex. 248. And he was competent where the title set up by the other party was not in conflict with that which he had conveyed and was called to sustain. Prescott v. Hawkins, 22 N. H. 191; Harris v. Fletcher, 10 N. H. 20.

A grantor to whom both parties traced their title, through subsequent conveyances, was a competent witness, since the parties were equally interested in the covenants. Roberts v. Whiting, 16 Mass. 186.

A parol promise to make good the boundaries as described in the conveyance, amounts only to a moral obligation, and was not sufficient to render the grantor incompetent. Jones v. Love, 9 Cal. 68.

grantor in a deed of trust was not competent for the trustee if he retained any interest under the deed.¹ A grantor was competent for his grantee where the title which he had conveyed was not in issue or where he could incur no liability on his covenants in any event.²

A grantee of land, which had been previously attached, was not a competent witness against the attaching creditor of his grantor in the suit in which the attachment was made.³ Neither was he competent for his grantor to charge the land with a vendor's lien after the title had passed from him to a third person.⁴ One who had purchased a part of the real estate of a deceased person was not competent to fasten upon another part previously sold a secret trust for the payment of the decedent's debts, since by creating such fund he would prevent the pursuit of his own land;⁵ but in a contest between his vendor and a third person, in which he had no legal interest, he was a competent witness.⁶

A grantor with covenants of general warranty was competent in an action against his grantee, to show that he conveyed by mistake a greater interest in the land than he possessed; in such case he was called to testify against his interest, as his testimony tended to render him liable on his covenant to his grantee. Stewart v. Chadwick, 8 Iowa 463.

For the same reason he might be a witness to prove that he had no title. Wright v. Nichols, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 298; Brown v. Downing, 4 S. & R. (Pa.) 494.

But in Ringgold v. Bryan, 3 Md. Ch. 488, it appeared that the vendee had mortgaged the premises and that the mortgage had been foreclosed and the premises purchased by the mortgagee. Under this state of facts, the court admitted the witness to prove notice to the mortgagee of the vendor's lien, because in case of its enforcement he would be personally liable for the mortgage debt. And in Hill v. McLean, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 107, the vendee was admitted to prove notice of the vendor's lien to a subsequent purchaser, having been rendered competent to give such evidence by the statutes of the state.

(5) Vendors and Purchasers of Personal Property.—The vendor of personal property in possession, who sells it as his own, is bound by an implied warranty of title, and for this reason he was not, at common law, a competent witness for his vendee in an action in which the title to such property was in question,¹ but he might be a witness for the vendee when released from liability on his warranty;² and he was competent for one contesting the title of his vendee, as he was then called to testify against interest.³ Where, however, the sale was attacked by the creditors of the vendor he was not, according to the weight of authority, competent to prove it fraudulent, or to prove the title to the property in himself at the time of its seizure, because he then came in a financially irresponsible condition to pay his own debts with property which presumptively belonged to another.⁴ But there are cases in which it was held that where there was other covenants in a deed, one was competent for the other. Cheswell v. Eastham, 16 N. H. 296; Ford v. Bronaugh, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 14.

A witness who had purchased an interest in real estate, to which it appeared his vendor had no title, was competent to prove the amount of rent received and improvements made by the vendor. Hogan v. Stone, 1 Ala. 496; 35 Am. Dec. 39.

The assignee of a preemption warrant was a competent witness if the facts intended to be proved by him did not tend to support the title of the party calling him. Wilson v. Speed, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 283.

In a suit against one who was alleged to have conveyed all his property in fraud of his creditors, the grantee was competent for the defendant, unless it were shown that he had knowledge of the grantor's purpose, or that the property, or the money received on the sale thereof, was still in his hands and subject to seizure for the grantor's debts. Johnson v. Johnson, 3 Met. (Mass.) 63.

But the donor of personal property, being bound by no warranty, was competent for the donee. Humphries v. Dawson, 38 Ala. 199; Jones v. Hoskins, 18 Ala. 489; Easley v. Dye, 14 Ala. 158.

evidence of a fraudulent conspiracy between the vendor and the vendee, the declarations of the former might be received in evidence against the latter when the property was pursued by creditors of the vendor.¹ In such contest, the vendor was competent for the vendee to prove that the property seized belonged to the latter.² And in trover for the conversion of the goods, the plaintiff's vendor was a competent witness for him, unless the defendant claimed ownership under an adverse title.³

This modification of the general rule was recognized and applied in Howe v. Scannell, 8 Cal. 325. But in the later case of Waugenheim v. Childs, 23 Cal. 444, the court repudiated the doctrine, and held that the vendor was incompetent in all such cases to prove the sale fraudulent.

But in Howerton v. Holt, 23 Tex. 51, it appeared that the witness had made an assignment of certain personal property for the benefit of his creditors and that the property was afterwards seized by the sheriff upon execution against the assignor, was sold and the proceeds applied in discharge of the claim of the execution creditor. In an action by the assignee against the sheriff for damages, it was held that the assignor was not competent for the plaintiff, as the effect of his testimony would be to have the value of the property again applied to the payment of his debts.

Thus, one who had sold property for a valuable consideration and afterwards disposed of it in payment of a gambling debt, was held competent for the vendee for value in an action of replevin to recover the property. Fister v. Beall, 1 Har. & J. (Md.) 31.

But there are cases in which it was held that he was not competent for one party to prove that he did not sell the property to the other. M'Cabe v. Morehead, 1 W. & S. (Pa.) 513; Wright v. Bonta, 19 Tex. 385.

2. Loud v. Pierce, 25 Me. 233; Chamberlain v. Smith, 44 Pa. St. 431.

Thus a vendee was a good witness for his vendor after the rescission of the contract of sale. Stafford v. Ames, 9 Pa. St. 343; Babcock v. Huntington, 9 Ala. 869.

In a suit to enjoin an execution sale of property claimed to be exempt, one who purchased the property after a preliminary injunction was a competent witness for the vendor, as the property was, at the time of the sale, relieved from the lien of the levy and the security of the injunction bond was substituted therefor. Turley v. Brewster, 33 Tex. 188.

In replevin against an officer to recover property claimed to be exempt from execution, the vendee of the property was competent to prove that the plaintiff had a right to the possession of the property at the time when the action was brought. Mumma v. McKee, 10 Iowa 107.

Where a person had bought goods as an agent, and they were afterwards seized on execution against him, the alleged principal was competent for the vendor, who replevied the goods as having been obtained through fraud. Cutter v. Rathbun, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 577.

In a suit by the vendor against a guarantor of payment of the purchase price, the vendee was a competent witness, as he was liable to one of the parties in any event. Smith v. Bainbridge, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 12.

The vendee of property which he had in turn conveyed by deed of trust, for the benefit of his creditors, was competent against his vendor in replevin for the possession of the goods after mutual releases executed by him and his trustees. Ratcliffe v. Sangston, 18 Md. 383.

3. Sherman v. Bruce, 37 Ill. 39; Russell v. McKenzie, 13 Md. 560; Wallace v. Peck, 12 Ala. 768; Hayes v. Grier, 4 Binn. (Pa.) 80.

But he was competent for his agent where he had no interest in the event of the suit. Case v. Reeve, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 79.

As where the money sought to be recovered from the agent had already been paid over to the principal. Seidel v. Peckworth, 10 S. & R. (Pa.) 442; Stroecker v. Hoffman, 19 Pa. St. 226.

He might, also, testify for his agent where his interest had been released. Kirksey v. Bates, 1 Ala. 303.

He might testify as to his understanding of the terms of a contract negotiated by him for his principal. Linsley v. Lovely, 26 Vt. 123.

A broker who had effected a policy was a competent witness to prove all matters connected with it, notwithstanding he had a lien on it for his premiums. Hunter v. Leathley, 10 B. & C. 858; 21 E. C. L. 184.

An agent who sold goods, receiving as commissions all he could get above a certain price, was competent to prove the contract of sale. Benjamin v. Porteus, 2 H. Bl. 590; Caune v. Sagory, 4 Martin (La.) 81.

An attorney was competent to prove the delivery of an execution and instructions to an officer in due time and manner to bind him. Phillips v. Bridge, 11 Mass. 242.

So, also, an agent was competent to prove the existence, loss, and contents of a written power to himself. Grayson v. Bannon, 8 Watts (Pa.) 524; Kirkpatrick v. Cisna, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 244; Connelly v. Chiles, 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 242.

But he could not testify to the contents of a written appointment, unless it was lost or destroyed. Kennebec Purchase v. Call, 1 Mass. 483. See also Caldwell v. Wentworth, 16 N. H. 318.

One who had sold goods on a del credere commission was not competent for his principal in an action for the purchase price. New York Slate Co. v. Osgood, 11 Mass. 60.

1. Edmonds v. Lowe, 8 B. & C. 407;

Upon the same ground of necessity a servant was a competent witness for or against his master, unless the cause of action resulted from his own negligence or misconduct.¹ So, also, the master was a competent witness for his servant, notwithstanding his interest in the services of the latter; such interest going only to the credibility of the witness and not to his competency.²

(b) When Liable to One of the Parties.—In an action against a master or principal to recover damages resulting from the alleged misconduct of the servant or agent of the defendant, such servant or agent was not, at common law, competent for the defendant, because if the plaintiff recovered the defendant might bring an action against the witness to recover the damages and costs which he was obliged to pay to the party injured, and in such action the record in the former suit would be admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing the quantum of damages sustained by the master or principal, after the fact of the misconduct had been

2. In State v. Aaron, 4 N. J. L. 263; 7 Am. Dec. 592, which was a trial for murder, it appeared that the defendant was a black boy and that, according to an act for the gradual abolition of slavery, he was to remain the servant of the owner of his mother, she being a slave, and the executors, administrators, and assigns of such owner, in the same manner as if he had been bound to service by the trustees or overseers of the poor, until he reached the age of twenty-five years. At the trial he offered his master as a witness, and the trial judge rejected him on the ground that he was disqualified by reason of interest. For this error the judgment of conviction was reversed. Kirkpatrick, C. J., said: "As to the competency of Levi Solomon as a witness, little need be said. It is merely the case of master and servant, and is no way varied by the circumstance of the boy's being black and the master white. He is, by the words of the act, put in the situation of an indentured servant, and although this relation has existed from the earliest ages, no case has been produced, and, I am bold to affirm, no case can be produced, where that relation alone has been adjudged to create such an interest as to exclude the master from being a witness for the servant. If such a principle were once admitted, it would extend itself to all the relations in life; it would exclude the father from being a witness for his son, for he is entitled to his services, and the son from being a witness for the father, for he is entitled to receive from him his maintenance. It would even exclude the creditor in the case of his debtor, and the debtor in the case of his creditor, for it is easy to see that they may be mutually dependent upon the personal exertions of one another for their rights and for their support. But these interests, however they may weigh upon the human mind, have never been considered as direct and positive, going to the proved by other evidence.¹ So, also, in an action to recover damages done to property of the plaintiff when it was in the possession of his servant or agent, such servant or agent was not, unless released from liability, competent for the plaintiff, because if he obtained a verdict the witness was placed in a state of security from liability.²

St. 186; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Hutchins, 34 Ill. 108; Horne v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 72; Memphis, etc., R. Co. v. Tugwell, 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 91. Finlayson*, 3 C. & P. 305; 14 E. C. L. 319; Plumer v. Alexander, 12 Pa. St. 81.

But the pilot was competent, unless his was the act of negligence complained of. Johnson v. Lightsey, 34 Ala. 169; 73 Am. Dec. 450; Bentley v. Bustard, 16 B. Mon. (Ky.) 697; 63 Am. Dec. 561.

In an action against a railroad company for damages resulting from the washing out of a culvert, the engineer who planned it and superintended the erection of it, was not competent for the company until released. Galena, etc., R. Co. v. Welch, 24 Ill. 31.

A deputy was not competent for the sheriff where the alleged cause of action was the negligence of the deputy. Dorrance v. Com., 13 Pa. St. 160.

In order to exclude a witness, the record must have been evidence for or against him directly. Thus, in an action against a sheriff for the misconduct of an assistant of his deputy, it was objected that the assistant was incompetent on the ground that the record would be evidence against the deputy, and that the record in an action against the deputy would be evidence against the assistant. But Lord Tenterden held that the interest was too remote to render the witness incompetent. Clark v. Lucas, Ry. & M. N. P. C. 32.

An agent who had lost his principal's money at gaming was not competent for the principal in an action against the winners to recover it back. Allen v. Lacy, Dudley (Ga.) 81; Jones v. McRay, 6 Jones (N. Car.) 192.

A release from liability to the master or principal, of course restored the competency of the witness. Downes v. Davis, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 72.

The rule did not apply if the servant was in the presence of his master and was acting in obedience to his orders in doing the act complained of. Barnes v. Cole, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 188; Noble v. Paddock, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 456.

In order to exclude the witness on this ground, it should be made to appear affirmatively that he had rendered himself liable to the party calling him. Juniata Bank v. Beale, 1 W. & S. (Pa.) 227; Ashe v. Murchison, 8 Ired. (N. Car.) 215.

(7) Bail and Surety.—One who was bail for a defendant was not, at common law, a competent witness for him, for his liability on the bail bond depended directly upon the event of the suit;¹ and a surety was not competent for his principal where his testimony would tend to diminish or extinguish his liability on the contract of suretyship.² The rule applied to sureties in replevin

But in New York, the court refused to follow this rule and admitted the plaintiff's servant on the ground that a recovery against the defendant would be no bar to an action against the servant. Dudley v. Bolles, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 467.

The servant of the defendant was competent for the plaintiff to prove that he did the act complained of by the direction of the defendant; the witness and the defendant being joint trespassers, a recovery against the defendant was no bar to a suit against the witness. Jones v. Lowell, 35 Me. 538; The General Worth v. Hopkins, 30 Miss. 703.

Where a witness to an assignment had become incompetent to give evidence in consequence of his becoming special bail for the defendant in the action, the court permitted his handwriting to be proved. Bell v. Cowgell, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 7.

But where the condition of the bond was simply for the appearance of the defendant and not to perform or endure the sentence of the court, the sureties were not disqualified as witnesses. Andrews v. State, 4 Wis. 385.

One who had given a bond of indemnity against costs was not a competent witness for the party protected by the bond. Butler v. Warren, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 57.

A party who had given security for costs could not, by taking the pauper's oath, have his security discharged for the purpose of examining him as a witness. Black v. Crain, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 516.

The security was competent when called to testify against interest. Molyneux v. Collier, 13 Ga. 406.

Guarantor.—The guarantor was competent for the obligors in a bond, because if the plaintiff were defeated the guarantor would not be relieved of his obligation. Caldwell v. McCortney, 2 Gratt. (Va.) 187; Mayo v. Avery, 18 Cal. 309. Compare Gilliam v. Henneberry, 6 Jones (N. Car.) 224.

But a guarantor of the solvency of the maker of a note was not competent to prove a want of consideration therefor. Hanna v. Spencer, 3 Ind. 351.

Neither was he competent to prove a partial failure of consideration, or a want of consideration, as he was interested in diminishing the amount due. Paine v. Hussey, 17 Me. 274; Hanna v. Spencer, 3 Ind. 351.

A surety was competent for his principal where the issue on trial did not involve his own liability. Covington, etc., R. Co. v. Ingles, 15 B. Mon. (Ky.) 637; Townshend v. Townshend, 6 Md. 295; Hill v. Hill, 32 Pa. St. 511; Atwood v. Wright, 29 Ala. 346.

Usury.—And in an action upon a promissory note between the original parties thereto, a surety has been held competent to prove usury in the contract. Webb v. Wilshire, 19 Me. 406; Nichols v. Bellows, 22 Vt. 581; 54 Am. Dec. 85; Phillips v. Caldwell, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 1.

Sureties in a forthcoming bond, who were without further interest than an obligation to deliver the property, were competent to testify as to other matters in the case. Greene v. Tims, 16 Ala. 541; Bates v. Steamboat Madison, 18 Mo. 99; Steamboat Madison v. Wells, 14 Mo. 360. See also Planters', etc., Bank v. Willis, 5 Ala. 770.

In Cook v. Lyon, 10 Iowa 434, the common-law rule was recognized by the court, but the law had been changed by statute.

Where several actions of replevin were tried together before the same jury, a surety in one of the replevin bonds was competent to testify in the cases in which he was not interested in the same manner as if the actions had been tried separately. Kimball v. Thompson, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 441; 50 Am. Dec. 799.

After judgment against a surety in a replevin bond, he was a competent witness in an action against the sheriff for taking insufficient sureties. Myers v. Clark, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 535.

It was not a valid objection to the competency of a witness that he was a surety on the bond of a third person, who had replevied from an officer property which he had taken in execution or attachment against the defendant. *Johnson v. And a surety in a bond to release an attachment was not competent for the defendant. Rucker v. Pritchett, 3 Bush (Ky.) 689.

A surety in an attachment bond was competent for his principal in a suit against him to enjoin the attachment proceedings, as the decree could not affect his liability on the bond one way or the other. Atkins v. Guice, 21 Ark. 164.

He was, also, competent on the trial of an issue taken on the answer of the garnishee in the attachment proceedings. Peters v. Moss, 1 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 331.

A surety who was released from liability to contribute was a competent witness for his co-surety. Jones v. Letcher, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 363.

But in Benedict v. Hecox, 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 496, it was held by a majority of the court that, where payment had been enforced from one of the sureties, a co-surety was competent for him in an action against the principal debtor to recover the amount so paid. See also Governor of Virginia v. Evans, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 581.

And a surety who was not a party to a suit was a competent witness against his co-surety. Craig v. Callaway County Ct., 12 Mo. 94; Leech v. Kennedy, 3 Strobb. (S. Car.) 488. But he was not competent against his co-surety upon an issue of non est factum, as it was to his interest that the co-surety should share the liability with himself. Rowe v. Ware, 30 Ga. 278; Whately v. Johnson, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 498. See also Hale v. Wetmore, 4 Ohio St. 600.

In Greely v. Dow, 2 Met. (Mass.) 176, it was held that a surety was competent for his co-surety to prove a discharge by the plaintiff.

obtaining an order of court discharging the former from liability,¹ or by depositing in court a sufficient sum of money to meet the obligation of the undertaking.²

(8) Principal Obligors.—The principal obligor in a bond was not a competent witness for his surety in a separate action against the latter, for if the judgment went against the surety, the principal's liability would be increased to the extent of the costs of the suit.³ But he might testify for his surety after being released from his liability to pay costs, as his interest was then

But in Gray v. Young, Harp. (S. Car.) 38, the court thought it had no power to discharge the bail by the substitution of another in order to render him competent.

So, upon appeal from an inferior court, if the appellant wished to examine his surety on the appeal bond, another surety might be substituted. Salmon v. Rance, 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 311; Tompkins v. Curtis, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 251; M'Culloch v. Tyson, 2 Hawks (N. Car.) 336.

An undertaking of a surety for costs might be stricken out and a new surety substituted, in order to render the first one competent. Stimmel v. Underwood, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 282. And so of one who had indorsed the writ and thereby become liable for the costs, Roberts v. Adams, 9 Me. 9; and an attorney for a non-resident plaintiff, who was liable for costs through his client's failure to file a bond, might be released from his liability by the filing of a sufficient bond and thus become a competent witness. *Brandigee v. Neither was the wife of the principal obligor competent for the surety. Vandiver v. Glaspy, 7 Rich. (S. Car.) 14.

A principal who had suffered a default, and against whom a separate judgment had been entered, was competent for his surety upon an issue joined between him and the plaintiff. Preble County Bank v. Russell, 1 Ohio St. 313; Simpson v. Bovard, 74 Pa. St. 351.

Where the contract upon which the sureties were sued had been rescinded by the principal, on account of fraud, he was competent for the defense, as he could not be made liable for the costs. Hazard v. Irwin, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 95.

And in an action by a surety, against a co-surety, for contribution, the principal debtor was competent, not being liable for costs. Leavenworth v. Pope, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 419; Hunt v. Chambliss, 7 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 532.

In an action against an officer, for a failure to return an execution issued on a replevin bond, an obligor in the bond was competent to prove that it had not been legally acknowledged. Williams v. Hall, 2 Dana (Ky.) 97.

balanced between the parties.¹ And where the surety filed a bill in equity to be relieved from his obligation on account of indulgences extended to the principal, the latter was competent because he was not liable for the costs of the suit in equity.² In a separate action against the surety the principal was competent for the plaintiff. In such case, his testimony tended to increase his liability to the extent of the costs of the action.³ In an action against an obligor, a co-obligor not sued was competent for the defense if he had no interest in the event of the suit;⁴ and he was also competent for the plaintiff,⁵ unless the defendant sought to escape liability by a defense which was not available to the witness.⁶

(9) Parties to Negotiable Instruments.—It was held by Lord Mansfield that a person who had signed a negotiable instrument, thereby giving it credit and circulation, should not be permitted to give testimony impeaching its validity after it had passed into the hands of an innocent holder.⁷ This rule was adopted in a number of jurisdictions in the United States,⁸ with the qualification that it applied only to parties to negotiable instruments,

But in Cannon v. Jones, 4 Hawks (N. Car.) 368, it appeared that the obligee had already obtained his judgment at law, and the surety then brought his bill to be relieved against the judgment. It was held that the principal was not competent for him, as, in that case, he was liable for the costs of the suit in equity.

which had actually been negotiated before maturity, in the ordinary course of trade, and had passed into the hands of bona fide holders,¹ and to matters only which tended to destroy the validity of an instrument at the time of its execution, thus not precluding the witness from testifying to subsequent matters which

In a suit between the original parties to a negotiable instrument, the surety not sued was competent to prove usury. In such case, the instrument had not been given currency by indorsement, and the above rule did not apply. Fox v. Whitney, 16 Mass. 118.

So, also, in an action against an accommodation indorser, by one who had discounted the note, the maker, being released by the defendant, might prove usury, as the plaintiff had not taken the instrument as an indorsee in the ordinary course of business, but was a lender and a party to the usurious contract. Van Schaack v. Stafford, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 565; Bubier v. Pulsifer, 4 Gray (Mass.) 592; Little v. Rogers, 1 Met. (Mass.) 108. But in a similar case in Maine, the witness was held incompetent under the rule. Chandler v. Morton, 5 Me. 374.

In an action by an indorser against the promisor, one who signed as agent for the promisor was not competent to prove usury. Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 126; 9 Am. Dec. 123. But it was otherwise if the witness acted as agent for the indorser. Webster v. Vickers, 3 Ill. 295.

The rule did not apply where the note or bill was not sued on. Thus, in an action to recover from a prior indorser the amount advanced to take up the bill, the drawer and acceptor might prove that the bill was indorsed for the accommodation of the party who made the advance. Wright v. Truefitt, 9 Pa. St. 507. But in Deering v. Sawtel, 4 Me. 191, it was held that the rule applied even where the validity of the instrument came collaterally in question.

The rule excluded only those whose names were on the instrument. Therefore, a former owner of a coupon payable to bearer was competent to impeach it in the hands of the holder. Columbia Coal, etc., Co. v. Fox, 33 Pa. St. 239.

A party to a non-negotiable instrument was competent to prove it void. Williams v. Miller, 10 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 139.

But in a few cases, it was held that the assignor of a bond was not competent to prove any fact which would render the security invalid at the time of its assignment. Gillian v. Clay, 3 Leigh (Va.) 590; Wise v. Lamb, 9 Gratt. (Va.) 294; Canty v. Sumter, 2 Bay (S. Car.) 93.

In an action by an indorsee against the maker of a promissory note, which was indorsed after it was due and dishonored, the indorser was competent to prove that it was paid before indorsed. Thayer v. Crossman, 1 Met. (Mass.) 416; American Bank v. Jenness, 2 Met. (Mass.) 288; Newell v. Holton, 10 Gray (Mass.) 349; Adams v. Carver, 6 Me. 390. Thus, where a promissory note was indorsed on the last day of grace, it was held that it was dishonored and the maker was competent to impeach it. Pine v. Smith, 11 Gray (Mass.) 38.

The payee in a negotiable instrument was competent to impeach the consideration so long as the legal title to the same remained in him. Watts v. Smith, 24 Miss. 77.

A person to whom a bill of exchange had been indorsed as agent for the payee for collection, and who had indorsed it to another in trust for the payee, was competent for the drawer in an action against him to collect the bill. Barker v. Prentiss, 6 Mass. 430.

might defeat the holder, unless he was disqualified on account of interest.¹ This rule, however, was quickly repudiated by the English courts, and it was laid down as a general rule that payees and indorsers of negotiable instruments might be admitted to prove them voidable or void ab initio, unless the witnesses were disqualified for some other reason.² The weight of authority in the United States is in support of this latter rule.³

In a contest between the holder and the maker or drawer of a negotiable instrument, an indorser who stood indifferent between the parties was competent to prove any fact which did not show the instrument void in its inception.⁴ But where the genuineness of the instrument was in question, he was not a competent

In Alabama, the court apparently adopted the rule laid down by Lord Mansfield in the case of Ross v. Wells, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 139, but, in subsequent cases, the later English rule was followed. Todd v. Stafford, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 199; Griffing v. Harris, 9 Port.

And in New Hampshire, the court first followed the rule of Walton v. Shelley, 1 T. R. 300, in Houghton v. Page, 1 N. H. 60, and it was subsequently recognized as law in Bryant v. Ritterbush, 2 N. H. 212; Carleton v. Whitcher, 5 N. H. 196; Odiorne v. Howard, 10 N. H. 343. But in Haines v. Dennett, 11 N. So, also, in New York, the rule of Walton v. Shelley, 1 T. R. 300, was adopted in some early cases. Winton v. Saidler, 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 185; Coleman v. Wise, 2 Johns. (N. Thus, in an action by the holder against an indorser, a subsequent indorser was not competent for the plaintiff, because, if the money were collected from the previous indorser, that would discharge the witness from liability. *Hayes v. A default would not render one joint maker competent for another, where they were joined as defendants. Turner v. Lazarus, 6 Ala. 878. At common law, the drawer of a bill of exchange was not competent for the holder in an action against the acceptor, because, if the plaintiff did not prevail, the witness was liable to him for damages, interest, and costs.⁵ But it seems that he was competent for the acceptor, as he was liable to the holder in case of a failure to recover from the acceptor.⁶ In an action by the indorsee against the drawer, the acceptor was competent to prove

1. Thus, the maker was a competent witness if his liability were extinguished by the Statute of Limitations, Breitenbach v. Houtz, 35 Pa. St. 153; or by a discharge in bankruptcy. Hayden v. McKnight, 45 Ga. 147.

2. Vance v. Collins, 6 Cal. 435; Mevey v. Matthews, 9 Pa. St. 112; Routh v. Helm, 6 How. (Miss.) 127; Kleimann v. Boernstein, 32 Mo. 311. But a verdict against him was not sufficient. To restore his competency it was necessary that judgment be rendered. Haig v. Newton, 1 Mill (S. Car.) 423.

3. Moore v. Henderson, 18 Ala. 232; Nisbet v. Lawson, 1 Ga. 275.

So, in an action against the indorser, the maker was not competent to prove that he had paid the amount of the note to the defendant. Palmer v. Tripp, 6 Cal. 82. But, in an action upon a note of a third party given as collateral security, the maker of the note, for the payment of which the collateral was held, was competent to prove it paid. Fry v. Coleman, 1 Grant's Cas. (Pa.) 445.

4. In a contest between the indorser and indorsee of a note, the maker was competent to prove that the indorsement was for collection and not for value, Gilman v. Pugh, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 286; and he was competent to prove the execution of the note by himself and its indorsement by the defendant. Crowley v. Barry, 4 Gill (Md.) 194. He was competent for the plaintiff to prove that defendant owed the witness the amount of the note and had agreed to pay it at maturity. Schley v. Merritt, 37 Md. 352; Columbia Bank v. Magruder, 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 172; 14 Am. Dec. 271.

The maker was competent also to prove that the note was made payable to the payee at the request of one to whom the maker was indebted. Campbell v. Knapp, 15 Pa. St. 27.

In an action of trover for a note, the maker was a competent witness, for his liability remained the same in any event. Woodruff v. Smith, 6 N. J. L. 214.

5. Scott v. McLellan, 2 Me. 199; Hewitt v. Lovering, 12 Me. 201; Dennistoun v. Fleming, 7 Pa. St. 528; Smith v. Thorne, 9 Watts (Pa.) 144; Montgomery Bank v. Walker, 9 S. & R. (Pa.) 237; 11 Am. Dec. 709; Hubble v. Brown, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 70; Huntington v. Champlin, Kirby (Conn.) 166. But where the drawer and holder both resided in New York, and the holder sued the drawee in Massachusetts, where the latter resided, it was held that the drawer was competent for the plaintiff, his liability to damages under the laws of New York being too remote and contingent an interest to exclude him. Barney v. Newcomb, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 46.

It has been held that the drawer was competent to prove the handwriting of the acceptor. Dickinson v. Prentice, 4 Esp. 32; Barber v. Gingell, 3 Esp. 60.

In an action by the indorsee against the indorser, the drawer was competent to prove non-acceptance and notice. Whiteford v. Buckmyer, 1 Gill (Md.) 127; 39 Am. Dec. 640; Eddy v. Peterson, 22 Ill. 535.

6. Pacific Bank v. Mitchell, 9 Met. (Mass.) 297. Thus he was competent that the drawer had no funds in his hands, thereby showing it to be an accommodation acceptance.¹

(10) Parties to Assignments of Choses in Action.—The assignor of a chose in action was not a competent witness for the assignee, where it appeared that he was in any degree interested, or that the assignment had been made for the purpose of removing his disability.² But in many cases the assignor was permitted to testify where the assignment had been made in good faith in the ordinary course of business, and it did not appear that he was disqualified on the ground of interest.³ The assignee of a chose for the drawee, to prove the conditions upon which he had promised to accept. Storer v. Logan, 9 Mass. 55.

1. In Kinsley v. Robinson, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 327, Shaw, C. J., said: "If it is an acceptance for value, as it appears prima facie, the acceptor is liable at all events; in one case, to the indorsee, the plaintiff; in the other, to the drawer, the defendant. If it was an accommodation acceptance, he is not ultimately liable in any event, because, in one, he will be exempted from an action; in the other, though liable to an action in the first instance, he has a remedy over for the like amount, which the law deems precisely equivalent." To the same effect is Parsons v. Phipps, 4 Tex. 341.

The drawee in a bill was competent for the drawer to prove the acceptance of the bill. Tarble v. Underwood, 34 Ill. 67.

It has been held that the assignor for value was not competent to rebut a defense to the original cause of action, unless he were released by the assignee from his implied warranty of the existence of the debt. Ludwig v. Meyre, 5 W. & S. (Pa.) 435; Watson v. McLaren, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 557; Delee v. Sandel, 12 La. Ann. 208.

Where the defense was that the claim had been paid before the assignment, the assignor was not competent for the assignee without a release. Woolfolk v. McDowell, 9 Dana (Ky.) 268.

(Ky.) 440.

Where the cause of action was assigned pendente lite, and the assignee was substituted as plaintiff, it was held the assignor was a competent witness for him. Warner v. Turner, 18 B. Mon. (Ky.) 758; Freeman v. Jennings, 7 Rich. (S. Car.) 381.

The assignor of a judgment was competent for the assignee in a suit to enforce it, Doub v. Barnes, 1 Md. Ch. 127; and the assignor of a judgment might testify against the assignee. Himblewright v. Armstrong, 25 Pa. St. 428.

In Burrows v. Shultz, 6 Pa. St. 325, and Reading R. Co. v. Johnson, 7 W. & S. (Pa.) 317, the assignors of judgments were rejected because their names still appeared on the record as parties to the actions.

Under a statute of Missouri, it was held that the assignor of a chose in action was not competent for the assignee to prove any facts occurring prior to the assignment, Parish v. Frampton, 32 Mo. 396; Hendricks v.

(11) Attorneys.—In the absence of a disqualifying interest in the event of the suit, an attorney was, at common law, a competent witness for his client.² While there is no rule of law to prevent his testifying, it is, nevertheless, regarded by both bench and bar as very objectionable practice, which should be adopted only in cases of absolute necessity, and then it is better for the attorney to retire from the case.³ But an attorney whose fee was to be a percentage of the amount recovered, was not competent for his client, because he was directly interested in the event of the suit;⁴ and the same was true if he was, for any reason, Ebbitt, 37 Mo. 24; but he was competent to prove the consideration for the assignment. Weil v. Tyler, 38 Mo. 558; Perry v. Siter, 37 Mo. 279; Bidwell v. St. Louis Floating Dock, etc., Co., 40 Mo. 42.

North American Ins. Co.*, 13 Mass. 61, it was held that a person who furnished money to buy a cargo, and took an assignment of the bill of lading as security, was a competent witness for the assignor in an action against the underwriters for the loss of the cargo.

In Massachusetts it was held, under Statute 1851, ch. 233, § 97, that the assignee of a chose in action was a competent witness for the nominal plaintiff in an action thereon. Palmer v. White, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 321. Under the same statute the donee causa mortis of a note was held competent for the nominal plaintiff in an action to collect the note. Bates v. Kempton, 7 Gray (Mass.) 382. But in the absence of an enabling statute such donee was not a competent witness. Thorpe v. Amos, 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 26.

In England, it was once considered a sufficient ground for a new trial that the attorney of the successful party testified in his behalf. Stones v. Byron, 1 B. C. Rep. 248; 11 Jur. 44; 16 L. J. Q. B. 32; Dunn v. Packwood, 1 B. C. Rep. 312; 11 Jur. 242; 4 D. & L. 395, note (b); Rex v. Brice, 2 B. & Ald. 606. But these cases were subsequently overruled in *Cobbett v. liable for the costs of the action.¹ The attorney of one party may be called to testify for the other, except as to facts that came to his knowledge through confidential relations with his client.²

(12) Bailor and Bailee.—In an action by a bailee against a third person to recover the property committed to him, or damages for its loss or conversion, the bailor was not competent for the plaintiff to prove the general ownership of the property in himself, as he was directly interested in the event of the suit.³ But in a contest between the bailor and a third person, the bailee was competent to support the title of the bailor,⁴ even when he had converted the goods to his own use by a sale or exchange of them, as in that case he was liable to one of the parties in any event and his interest was balanced.⁵

(13) Parent and Child.—At common law there was nothing in the relation of parent and child to prevent their being witnesses for each other. The natural bias of feeling which accompanies the relationship went only to the credibility of the witnesses.

the trial, his competency was restored. McLaughlin v. Shields, 12 Pa. St. 283.

The fact that an attorney expected to receive a larger fee if his client recovered, did not disqualify him as a witness. Miles v. O'Hara, 1 S. & R. (Pa.) 32; Slocum v. Newby, 1 Murph. (N. Car.) 423.

An attorney might be a witness for his client, although his judgment fee depended upon his success in the cause. Newman v. Bradley, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 240.

If the act of an attorney were set up as a defense to his client's claim, his contingent liability to the client was not sufficient to render him incompetent as a witness. Orphans' Court v. Woodburn, 7 W. & S. (Pa.) 162; Braine v. Spalding, 52 Pa. St. 247.

1. Thus, an attorney for a non-resident plaintiff, who had given no bond for costs, was not competent for his client, because he was himself liable for the costs, Jones v. Savage, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 658; but if he were fully indemnified and secured against costs, he was competent, although liable in the first instance. Chaffee v. Thomas, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 358; Brandigee v. Hale, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 125. So, also, an attorney who had indorsed the original writ, and thereby made himself liable for costs, was not a competent witness for his client, Chadwick v. Upton, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 442; and the same was true where the indorser of the writ had become such at the attorney's request, because he was answerable over to the indorser for the costs. Meserve v. Hicks, 24 N. H. 295.

2. Buckmaster v. Kelley, 15 Fla. 180; McLaine v. Bachelor, 8 Me. 324. Thus, he might be called for the other side and asked who employed him, in order to show the real party and so let in his declarations, Levy v. Pope, 1 M. & M. 410; 22 E. C. L. 343; and where notice to produce a written instrument had been served, the attorney for the opposite party might be asked if he had the instrument, in order to let in secondary evidence of its contents if not produced. Bevan v. Waters, 1 M. & M. 235; 22 E. C. L. 301.

But after releasing to the bailee his interest in the property, he was competent to prove its loss and value. Moran v. Portland Steam Packet Co., 35 Me. 55. And he was competent without a release to prove facts in which he had no interest. Maine Stage Co. v. Longley, 14 Me. 444.

4. Wright v. Ross, 2 Greene (Iowa) 266; Walmsley v. Hubbard, 24 Tex. 612. Compare Smith v. Seward, 3 Pa. St. 342.

5. Oliver v. McClellan, 21 Ala. 675. The contrary was decided in Pierce v. Hindsall, 1 Tyler (Vt.) 153.

Accordingly, in the absence of a disqualified legal interest in the event of the suit, a parent was a competent witness for his child,¹ and a child was also competent for his parent.² The cases holding the heirs and distributees of the estate of a deceased person incompetent for the personal representative, have been examined in another place.³

(14) Debtor and Creditor.—One who was prima facie liable for a debt was not competent to sustain a suit in which it was sought to charge another person with the whole or any part of that debt.⁴ But in a contest among creditors as to the disposition to be made of the debtor's property, or the proceeds thereof, the debtor was a competent witness;⁵ and in a trial of the right of property taken upon execution, the judgment debtor was competent for the claimant,⁶ but was not competent to prove the title

It has been held that a witness who was liable for a debt was competent for the plaintiff, in an action to obtain a judgment against another for the same debt, even where the satisfaction of such judgment would discharge the witness from liability. These decisions proceeded on the ground that it was not certain that the witness would be benefited by the plaintiff's success, because he might not enforce his judgment, and, until he did so, he might proceed against the witness as before. Eastman v. Winship, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 46; Philbrook v. Handley, 27 Me. 55. In an action by or against an executor or administrator, one who had an unsatisfied claim against the estate was not a competent witness for the personal representative, where the estate was insolvent;⁴ but if it were not shown that the estate was insolvent, the creditors were admissible as witnesses.⁵ A general creditor of a party to an action was not disqualified as a witness, notwithstanding the party's ability to meet his obligations depended largely upon his success in the action in which the witness was called.⁶ But the witness was incompetent if payment

A witness who had a written order for the payment of his claim out of the amount to be recovered by the plaintiff in an action, was held incompetent on the ground of interest. Peyton v. Hallett, 1 Cai. (N. Y.) 363; Benedict v. Brownson, Kirby (Conn.) 70. But the promise of an order for the amount recovered was not sufficient to exclude

2. Judicial Officers.—It is contrary to the policy of the law to permit a judge who sits at the trial of a cause to be examined as a witness therein.² If, however, a judge be sitting with others, and his presence on the bench is not necessary, he may be examined as a witness; but he should then take no further judicial part in the trial.³ Neither may a judge be required to testify as to what took place on the trial of another cause at which he presided;⁴ but he may testify as to collateral matters which occurred in his presence during the progress of the trial.⁵ An arbitrator is a competent witness to prove what proceedings took place before him, so as to arrive at what was the subject-matter of the adjudication, but he may not be questioned as to the reasons of his award. "The acts of the arbitrators, and not the hidden operations of their minds, are the proper subjects of inquiry."⁶

3. Jurors.—In early English practice traverse jurors were taken from the immediate neighborhood where the cause of the litigation occurred. This was done on the hypothesis that those who knew most about the matter in controversy were best able to render a just verdict, but this theory was long since exploded, and a juror is not now permitted to communicate informally to his associates his personal knowledge of material facts. If he is cognizant of matters material in evidence, he should be sworn and examined as a witness.¹

In some early cases in England, the affidavits of jurors were admitted to impeach their own verdicts,² but in the time of Lord Mansfield this doctrine was completely exploded, and since that time the courts have consistently refused to admit jurors to prove misconduct or mistake in arriving at their verdict.³ The great

A judge before whom the proof of a deed was made is competent to prove that it was made outside of the state, thereby showing it to be illegal and void. Jackson v. Humphrey, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 498.

At the trial of an issue joined upon the return to a writ of mandamus to a court, the individual members of the court are competent for the court, Justices v. House, 20 Ga. 328; and where a note signed by the justices of the inferior court is sought to be enforced by mandamus against the county treasurer, the justices are competent to prove fraud or mistake in the consideration of the note. *Rogers v. In Montana, it is provided by statute that the affidavits of jurors may be received to prove that the verdict was the result of a determination by chance. Gordon v. Trevathan, 13 Mont. 387.

In Tennessee, the rule is that affidavits of jurors should not be read on applications for new trials, except in extraordinary cases. Fish v. Cantrell, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 579; Larkins v. Tarter, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 681; Scott v. State, 7 Lea (Tenn.) 232.

the public rather than to the witnesses who testify before them, and when justice requires it, as in a prosecution for perjury committed before the grand jury, they may be called as witnesses to prove who testified before them and what testimony was given.¹ But according to the weight of authority, they are not competent to undo their own work by showing facts which will vitiate an indictment found by them.²

Thus, in an action for malicious prosecution, one of the grand jurors may be called to prove the fact that the defendant was the prosecutor. Sykes v. Dunbar, Sel. N. P. 1305; Freeman v. Arkell, 1 C. & P. 135; White v. Fox, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 369; 4 Am. Dec. 643; Huidekoper v. Cotton, 3 Watts (Pa.) 56. So a member of the grand jury may be called to testify that a certain person did not testify before them. Com. v. Hill, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 137.

The fact that a witness sat as one of the grand jury which found an indictment, does not render him incompetent as a witness for the prosecution upon the trial of the prisoner. State v. McDonald, 73 N. Car. 346.

In State v. Broughton, Ired. (N. Car.) 96; 45 Am. Dec. 507, Ruffin, C. J., after commenting on the reasons for the secrecy of grand juries, said: "But that is the immunity of the public and not the privilege of the witness, and, therefore, it would seem that the rule should create an obligation on the conscience of the juror and be enforced by a court only when the public justice may be advanced by it, and that it cannot be urged by the witness himself, when it would defeat justice, and thus encourage witnesses before that body to commit perjury by false statements or the suppression of the truth. For it is obvious that if grand jurors are, through all time and to all purposes, prohibited from disclosing and proving the testimony of witnesses before them, there is a perfect exemption from temporal penalties of perjury before a grand jury. The consequences of such a doctrine would be alarming, for, besides the danger of tempting the witnesses to commit so great a crime without the fear of punishment, grand jurors would have no credible evidence on which to act, on the one hand, and the citizen, on the other, would be deprived of one of his most boasted and valuable protections against arbitrary accusations and arrests."

But in Imlay v. Rogers, 7 N. J. L. 347, the court refused to admit a grand juror to prove that a witness, who had been examined, swore differently before the grand jury.

Where there was a misnomer in an indictment, it was held that a grand juror was not competent to prove who was meant. State v. Wammack, 70 Mo. 410.

Thus, an idiot is incompetent to testify; and, as his infirmity is incurable, he can, under no circumstances, become competent.¹

A witness is not excluded merely because he is a lunatic. That is not enough per se to exclude him; but he must, at the time of the examination, be so under the influence of his malady as to be deprived of that "share of understanding which is necessary to enable him to retain in memory the events of which he has been witness, and gives him a knowledge of right and wrong." This is the test of competency; and, if at the time of his examination the witness has this degree of understanding, he is competent.²

nady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 435; Huling v. Huling, 32 Ill. App. 519.

It is provided by Gen. Stats. of Minnesota, 1878, ch. 73, § 7, that persons "who are of unsound mind or intoxicated at the time of their production for examination," shall be incompetent. It was held that it was the intent of the statute to exclude persons as witnesses only when unsound or intoxicated to a degree that would exclude them at common law. Cannady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 435. Compare Clements v. McGinn (Cal. 1893), 33 Pac. Rep. 920.

Infirmity of Persons from Age.—Testimony of a person eighty years of age was held insufficient upon an issue in chancery as to the fairness of a conveyance, his memory being too impaired to recollect whether he made alleged payments, amounting to $1,300, in 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, or 1865, or whether he got any of the money from the grantor, his son-in-law. McCutchen v. Pigue, 4 Helsk. (Tenn.) 565.

At the trial of an action, a witness seventy-eight years old, with little knowledge of passing events, and but a feeble memory of past transactions, who did not know, while upon the stand, where he stayed the night before, or where he came from to the court room, and seemed to have absolutely no memory in reference to the recent events in his life, was permitted to testify as to the circumstances attending a conveyance executed to him some six years previously. It was held that his testimony was worthless. Woodhull v. Whittle, 63 Mich. 575.

Texas.—In Lopez v. State, 30 Tex. App. 487, the court said: "But under our statute declaring the persons incompetent to testify, it is expressly provided that 'insane persons who are in an insane condition of mind at the time when they are offered as witnesses, or who were in that condition when the events happened of which they are called to testify, as well as other persons who, after being examined by the court, appear not to possess sufficient intellect to relate transactions in respect to which they are interrogated, or who do not understand the obligations of an oath,' are absolutely incompetent to testify. Code Crim. Proc., art. 730, subdivisions 1, 2. Under the plain, unambiguous and imperative language of our statute we are compelled to hold that such persons are totally incompetent and inadmissible as witnesses. There is no exception to this statutory rule."

An idiot is defined by Sir Edward Coke to be one who, from his nativity, is, by a perpetual infirmity, non compos mentis. Co. Lit. 247a. But Mr. Wharton says: "It was held that an idiot was inadmissible, and so of a lunatic. It is now settled, however, that in all cases, either an idiot or a lunatic may be received, if, in the discretion of the court, he appears to have sufficient understanding to apprehend the obligation of an oath, and be able to give a correct answer to the questions put." Whart. Crim. Law, § 752. Thus implying that an idiot may have lucid intervals, or be of sufficient understanding to comprehend the nature of an oath.

In Reg. v. Hill, 20 L. J. M. C. 222; 5 Eng. L. & Eq. 547, it was held that the mere fact of insanity is not enough per se to exclude a witness. The judges were all of opinion that if, at the time

And a witness, though of unsound mind at the time of the examination, may testify, if it appears that he has sufficient intellect to understand the obligation of an oath and to be able to give a correct account of the matters which he has seen or heard in reference to the questions in issue.²

But a witness permanently insane and unable to understand the obligation of an oath is incompetent.³

A witness is presumed, upon reaching the age of fourteen, to be competent, and to exclude him upon the score of idiocy or insanity, the defect in the understanding must ordinarily be shown by the party objecting to his competency; not upon his preliminary examination, but by testimony aliunde.⁴

The burden of proof as to restoration to sanity rests upon the party offering the witness. Thus, an inquisition of lunacy found of his examination, he appeared to the judge to be of sufficient understanding to distinguish between right and wrong—to appreciate the nature and obligation of an oath—then he was admissible; all beyond was matter affecting the weight of his testimony and his credit as a witness, and was, therefore, matter for the consideration of a jury. "If," says Coleridge, J., "his evidence had, in the course of the trial, been so tainted with insanity as to be unworthy of credit, it was the proper function of the jury to disregard it, and not to act upon it."

Condition of the Witness at the Time of the Event to Which He Testifies.—"A respectable text writer observes that the witness, to be competent, must have been in possession of his intellect at the time of the event to which he testifies, as well as at the time of the examination, and that it ought to appear that no serious fit of insanity had intervened so as to cloud his recollection and to cause him to mistake the illusions of the imagination for the events he had witnessed." Rapalje's Witnesses, § 4, citing Allison's Pr. 436.

And it is expressly provided by Texas Code of Civ. Proc., art 730, subd. 1, 2, that persons "who were insane when the events happened of which they are called to testify are incompetent as witnesses." Lopez v. State, 30 Tex. App. 487.

But in Holcomb v. Holcomb, 28 Conn. 177, it was held that the question whether a person who has appeared as a witness was insane at the time of the event goes to the credibility of the witness and not to his competency. And it has been held that one who has been adjudged restored to sanity may testify as to facts that occurred while he was under guardianship as insane. Sarbach v. Jones, 20 Kan. 497. Compare Endel v. Walls, 16 Fla. 786.

3. Armstrong v. Timmons, 3 Harr. (Del.) 343; Livingston v. Kiersted, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 362.

4. Robinson v. Dana, 16 Vt. 474. In that case the court said: "But a witness of fourteen is regarded by the law as having arrived at the age of maturity and as competent to give testimony, and whatever exists that would exclude him from being a witness, except in case of being interested, should be established by testimony aliunde. If a witness is objectionable on the ground of legal insanity, is wanting in a sense of moral obligation, is a lunatic, or non compos, he cannot be permitted to testify; but the fact should not be proved by the witness himself, —for he is as unsuitable to prove or disprove those facts as any other.

... Perhaps the court may exercise a discretion, in allowing this preliminary examination of a witness over fourteen, but it is not error in the court to refuse it."

This is the general rule that a party against one is prima facie evidence of his incompetency, and unless it be overcome by evidence of his sanity, he should not be permitted to testify, even as against one not a party to the proceedings in lunacy.¹

The question as to whether a monomaniac is competent is one upon which the text writers differ, and upon which there seems to be no direct adjudication,² unless a case before the court of objecting to a witness as incompetent must show the incompetency. State v. Holloway, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 45; Perine v. Grand Lodge, 48 Minn. 82; Knight v. Jackson, 36 S. Car. 10.

But in Lopez v. State, 30 Tex. App. 487, the trial court permitted defendant's counsel to examine the prosecuting witness upon her voir dire to determine her competency, and upon the evidence thus adduced, together with testimony, the appellate court held her to be incompetent.

Pleadings.—The witness's competency cannot be determined "by the allegations of the pleadings. It is not the purpose or office of pleadings to ascertain or make or present any issue on the competency of witnesses to be sworn on the trial. The trial court may take into account the allegations and admissions in the pleadings bearing on the mental condition of any person offered as a witness, as it may resort to any other evidence to ascertain the fact; but they are not to be taken as conclusively determining such condition. The court below did not err in overruling defendant's objection to plaintiff as a witness based on the allegation in her complaint that she was at one time insane. It was not the duty of the trial court to examine plaintiff as to her mental soundness, merely because defendant alleged her to be unsound, unless it saw in her some indication of unfitness to testify." Cannady v. Lynch, 27 Minn. 437.

Although one alleging that he is of unsound mind, and suing by his next friend, under Code, § 2580, admits his mental incapacity, yet it is a question for the court to determine whether or not he is competent to testify. Worthington v. Mencer, 96 Ala. 310.

In an action for assault and battery the plaintiff is not rendered incompetent by an allegation in his complaint that the injuries received have impaired his mind. Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507.

2. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 365, note.

In Roscoe's Crim. Ev. 128, it is said that the safest rule is to exclude their testimony.

In Best's Principles of Ev., § 149, it is said: "Whether the evidence of a monomaniac, i. e., a person insane on only one subject, can be received on matters not connected with his delusion, remained unsettled until recently, and some text writers thought it the safest rule to exclude the testimony of such persons, it being impossible to calculate with accuracy the extent and influence of such a state of mind. This would be hard measure. A monomaniac may perfectly understand the nature and obligation of an oath; his general intellect may equal or surpass that of his interrogators, and, indeed, he seems much in the condition of a lunatic who is in a perpetual lucid state on all subjects save one."

In his work on Criminal Evidence, Mr. Wharton says: "Insanity, unless amounting to entire extinction of reason, is not considered ground for absolute exclusion from the witness box. It is, however, admissible, in order to affect his credit, to prove that witness was subject to insane delusions. If insanity or other mental incompetency be set up as a ground for exclusion, the preliminary examination of the witness is the peculiar province of the court. If the witness, in the opinion of the court, is absolutely incompetent, he should be ruled out. But to justify such exclusion mere streaks of insanity are not sufficient. A man may have many delusions, and yet be capable of narrating facts truly; and, in any view, the existence of such delusions on his part at the time of trial goes to his credit, and not to his competency. Evidence of mental disturbance at the time of the event narrated can be received to affect credibility. An inquisition of lunacy may be prima facie evidence of incompetency, but does not exclude if, upon hearing, the court find that the witness understands the nature of an oath, and the facts of which he speaks. When there is no inquisition, the burden is on the party disputing sanity. We have already noticed that where it appears that a witness was absolutely deficient of the requisite perceptive powers at the time of the event to be testified to he may be excluded by the court. Instances of this kind, however, are of very rare occurrence." Whart. Crim. Ev. (8th ed.), §§ 370-373.

1. Reg. v. Hill, 5 Cox C. C. 259. But compare Waring v. Waring, 12 Jur. 947.

In District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 519, the court, by Field, J., says of this case: "Such was the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in England, in the case of Reg. v. Hill, 5 Cox C. C. 259. There the prisoner had been convicted of manslaughter; and on the trial a witness had been admitted whose incompetency was urged on the ground of alleged insanity. He was a patient in a lunatic asylum, under the delusion that he had a number of spirits about him which were continually talking to him, but the medical superintendent testified that he was capable of giving an account of any transaction that happened before his eyes; that he had always found him so; and that it was solely with reference to the delusion about the spirits that he considered him a lunatic. The witness himself was called, and he testified as follows: 'I am fully aware I have a spirit, and twenty thousand of them. They are not all mine. I must inquire. I can where I am. I know which are mine. Those that ascend from my stomach and my head, and also those in my ears. I don't know how many they are. The flesh creates spirits by the palpitation of the nerves and the rheumatics. All are now in my body and around my head. They speak to me incessantly, particularly at night. That spirits are immortal, I am taught by my religion from my childhood. No matter how faith goes, all live after my death, those that belong to me and those that do not.' After much more of this kind of talk he added: 'They speak to me instantly; they are speaking to me now; they are not separate from me; they are around me speaking to me now; but I can't be a spirit, for I am flesh and blood.

They can go in and out through walls and places which I cannot.' He also stated his opinion of what it was to take an oath: 'When I swear,' he said, 'I appeal to the Almighty. It is perjury, the breaking of a lawful oath, or taking an unlawful one; he that does it will go to hell for all eternity.' He was then sworn, and gave a perfectly collected and rational account of a transaction which he declared that he had witnessed. He was in some doubt as to the day of the week on which it took place, and on cross-examination said: 'These creatures insist upon it, it was Tuesday night, and I think it was Monday;' whereupon he was asked: 'Is what you have told us what the spirits told you, or what you recollected without the spirits?' And he said: 'No. The spirits assist me in speaking of the date, I thought it was Monday and they told me it was Christmas eve, Tuesday; but I was an eye-witness, an ocular witness to the fall to the ground.' The question was reserved for the opinion of the court whether this witness was competent, and after a very elaborate discussion of the subject, it was held that he was. Chief Justice Campbell said that he entertained no doubt that the rule laid down by Baron Parke, in an unreported case which had been referred to, was correct, that wherever a delusion of an insane character exists in any person who is called as a witness, it is for the judge to determine whether the person so called has a sufficient sense of religion in his mind and sufficient understanding of the nature of an oath, and it is for the jury to decide what amount of credit they will give to his testimony.

"Various authorities," said the Chief Justice, 'have been referred to, which lay down the law that a person non compos mentis is not an admissible witness; but in what sense is the expression non compos mentis employed? If a person be so to such an extent as not to understand the nature of an oath, he is not admissible. But a person subject to a considerable amount of insane delusion may yet be under the sanction of an oath and capable of giving very material evidence upon the subject-matter under consideration.' And the Chief Justice added: 'The proper test must always be—does the lunatic

c. INTOXICATED PERSONS.—A person intoxicated at the time of the trial is incompetent.¹ But, unlike the case of a lunatic, his incapacity is not shown by the introduction of witnesses on the part of the party objecting to him; but the court, from its own view, will decide upon his competency.²

The fact that a person has been judicially declared a drunkard, does not raise a presumption of incompetency, as does an inquisition of lunacy.³

While the intoxication of a witness at the time of the transactions of which he testifies does not destroy his credibility, it undoubtedly impairs it; but if his testimony is corroborated, or his recollection of the transaction appears to be distinct and clear, he is entitled to belief.⁴

d. DEAF MUTES.—It was formerly held that persons who were deaf and dumb from their birth were, in contemplation of law, idiots,⁵ but, owing to the remarkable success achieved in educating such persons in modern times, this presumption no longer exists.⁶ And when a deaf mute is brought forward as a witness, if the court is satisfied that he possesses the requisite amount of intelligence and understands the obligation of an oath, he may understand what he is saying; and does he understand the obligation of an oath? The lunatic may be examined himself, that his state of mind may be discovered, and witnesses may be adduced to show in what state of sanity or insanity he actually is; still, if he can stand the test proposed, the jury must determine all the rest.' He also observed that in a lunatic asylum the patients are often the only witnesses of outrages upon themselves and others, and there would be impunity for offenses committed in such places if the only persons who can give information are not to be heard. Baron Alderson, Justice Coleridge, Baron Platt and Justice Talfourd agreed with the Chief Justice, the latter observing that, 'If the proposition that a person suffering under an insane delusion cannot be a witness were maintained to the fullest extent, every man subject to the most innocent, unreal fancy would be excluded. Martin Luther believed that he had a personal conflict with the devil. Doctor Johnson was persuaded that he had heard his mother speak to him after death. In every case, the judge must determine according to the circumstances and extent of the delusion. Unless judgment and discrimination be applied to each particular case there may be the most disastrous consequences.' This case is also found in the 2d of Denison and Pearce's Crown Cases 254, where Lord Campbell is reported to have said that the rule contended for would have excluded the testimony of Socrates, for he had one spirit always prompting him. The doctrine of this decision has not been overruled, that we are aware of, and it entirely disposes of the question raised here."

be sworn and examined.¹ He may give his evidence through an interpreter by means of signs,² or, if he can read and write, he may be required to reduce his answers to writing.³

5. Want of Religious Belief.—It was the rule of the common law—a rule which still obtains in many of the states—that persons who are insensible to the obligations of an oath are incompetent to testify as witnesses.⁴ This doctrine is based upon the ground that the law requires all evidence to be given under the sanction of an oath, and, as without religious belief a person cannot be subject to this indispensable sanction, he should not be permitted to blasphemously invoke the name of a supreme being in whose existence as “the rewarder of truth and avenger of falsehood he does not believe.”⁵

That a witness would feel bound to speak the truth out of regard to his own character, or from a sense of moral rectitude, or from any other motive than a regard for the sanctity of his oath, is not sufficient.⁶

If a man sincerely believe himself to belong to the highest order of intelligences, it may be his misfortune, not his fault, but he cannot be sworn by the greater. If sworn he must be allowed to swear by himself.”

Mr. Greenleaf says: “It is not sufficient that a witness believes himself bound to speak the truth from a regard to character, or to the common interests of society, or from the fear of the punishment which the law inflicts upon persons guilty of perjury. Such motives have indeed their influence, but they are not considered as affording a sufficient safeguard for the strict observance of truth.” 1 Greenl. Ev., § 368.

Our law, in common with the law of most civilized countries, requires the additional security afforded by the religious sanction implied in an oath; and, as a necessary consequence, rejects all witnesses who are incapable of giving this security. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 368.

To be competent as a witness, one must have a conscience alive to the

The proper test of the competency of a witness, on the ground of his religious principles, is "whether he believes in the existence of a God who will punish him if he swears falsely."¹

Applying this test an universalist has been admitted to testify, it not appearing that he did not believe in the punishment of the wicked in this life.²

It is not, however, indispensable to competency that the witness should believe that the punishment of perjury will be inflicted in the next world; it will be sufficient if he has a religious sense of accountability to God, and believes that he will punish in this world the commission of perjury.³

conviction of accountability to a higher power than human law. Solely his regard for the good of society, or his fear of punishment, is not sufficient. Com. v. Winnemore, 2 Brews. (Pa.) 378.

In Maryland, no one is incompetent as a witness, "provided he believes in the existence of God, and that, under His dispensation, such person will be held morally accountable for his acts, and be rewarded or punished therefor, either in this world or the world to come." Const. Dec. of Rights, § 36.

In Ohio, it has been held that one who "saw God in trees, bushes, herbage and everything he saw—who believed in future punishments during this life, not beyond, and if he did anything wrong he was condemned in his conscience," was a competent witness. Easterday v. Kilborn, Wright (Ohio) 345. See also Clinton v. State, 33 Ohio St. 27.

In Cubbison v. M'Creary, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 262, it was held that the test of a witness's competency is the existence of a belief in a God who will punish him if he swear falsely, and that disbelief in a future state of existence is not sufficient ground for the exclusion of testimony, though it may lessen its weight when admitted. See also Blair v. Seaver, 26 Pa. St. 274.

In Kansas, the rule has been still further relaxed, an Indian having been permitted to testify who simply believed that he would be hanged if he told a lie. Smith v. Brown, 8 Kan. 608. In Nebraska, on the contrary, an Indian was not permitted to testify; but he did not seem to have any conception of the nature of an oath, answering to all questions on the subject that he did not want to tell a lie, but would tell the truth; the supreme court sustained this ruling, and said that his parrot-like utterances that he would tell the truth amounted to nothing. Priest v. State, 10 Neb. 393. In both of these cases, however, the court seemed to have considered the question of the witness's competency rather with regard to his mental than his religious capacity.

Atheists, that is, persons who do not believe in the existence of a God, where the common-law rule is in force, are invariably held incompetent.¹

The law will never presume a person to be incompetent for want of religious belief. On the contrary, there is a presumption that a person brought up in a Christian country is of the Christian faith, and a competent witness. The burden of proof is, therefore, upon the adversary of the party producing the witness to show that he is incompetent upon this ground.²

It has been said that stronger evidence is required to exclude a witness for want of religious belief than is required to set aside a juror.³

It is held, in State v. Belton, 24 S. Car. 187; 58 Am. Rep. 245, that a witness who stated that he had never heard of God, or of heaven, or of hell, or of the devil, was incompetent to testify, although he had learned the Lord's prayer, and stated that he had heard it said that the bad man caught those who lied and cursed. The court said, however, that "the competency of a witness is not affected by a disbelief in a future state, and that his testimony should be admitted if he believes in the existence of a God, and in divine punishment of crime." Citing Jones v. Harris, 1 Strobb. (S. Car.) 160.

Contra.—In State v. Cooper, 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 96; 5 Am. Dec. 656, the court seems to make the belief in a future state of rewards and punishment the test.

In Atwood v. Welton, 7 Conn. 66, it was held that a person who disbelieves in any punishment in a future state, though he believes in the existence of the Supreme Being, and that men are punished in this life for their sins, was incompetent. See also Curtis v. Strong, 4 Day (Conn.) 51.

In Jackson v. Gridley, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 98, a belief in a future state of rewards and punishments was said to be necessary to render a witness competent. But the point was not directly in issue, as the witness believed nothing.

Infidels.—Although Professor Greenleaf and Mr. Phillips (1 Greenl. Ev., § 368; 1 Phil. Ev., pp. 10, 11) speak of infidels as being incompetent in certain cases, this view does not seem to be supported by authority. Omychund v. Barker, Willes 549; Smith v. Coffin, 18 Me. 157. Nor does it appear that, applying the test given in the text supra, an infidel's testimony could be excluded. And Mr. Greenleaf, in another section of his work (1 Greenl. Ev., § 371), describes the manner in which persons who are not of the Christian religion should be sworn, which would appear to be superfluous if their testimony is not admissible.

And if he professes faith enough to give religious sanction to his oath, his testimony is taken. Courts incline against the total exclusion of evidence on such grounds, because it seals up what is, perhaps, the only source of information. The choice is very often between a doubtful witness and none. It is, therefore, safer to let the objection go to his credit. But there are no such reasons for tenderness in the case of a juror,

The question is as to the state of the witness's mind at the time of the trial; and this may be shown by his declarations made previously.¹

The atheistical declarations of the witness having been proved, the law will presume them to have been sincere, and that the belief thus disclosed remains unchanged.²

The witness himself cannot be questioned concerning his want of religious belief, either before or after he has been sworn.³

In Com. v. Smith, 2 Gray (Mass.) 516; 61 Am. Dec. 478, the court, by Shaw, C. J., said: "The want of such religious belief must be established by other means than the examination of the witness upon the stand. He is not to be questioned as to his religious belief, nor required to divulge his opinion upon that subject in answer to questions put to him while under examination. If he is to be set aside for want of such religious belief, the fact is to be shown by other witnesses, and by evidence of his previously expressed opinions voluntarily made known to others."

In Free v. Buckingham, 59 N. H. 225, it is said: "But it is not customary, in modern practice, to permit an inquiry into a man's peculiarity of religious belief. This is not because the inquiry might tend to disgrace him, but because it would be a personal scrutiny into the state of his faith and conscience contrary to the spirit of our institutions. New Hampshire Bill of Rights, arts. 4, 5; Const. U. S., First Amendment."

"The witness himself is never questioned, in modern practice, as to his religious belief, though formerly it was otherwise. 1 Swift's Dig. 739; Wakefield v. Ross, 5 Mason (U. S.) 19; American Jurist, vol. IV., p. 79, n. It is not to be allowed, even after he has been sworn. The Queen's Case, 2 B. & B. 284. Not because it is a question tending to disgrace him, but because it would be a personal scrutiny into the state of his faith and conscience, foreign to the spirit of our institutions. No man is obliged to avow his belief, but if he voluntarily does avow it, there is no reason why the avowal should not be proved like any other fact. The truth and sincerity of the avowal, and the continuance of the belief thus avowed, are presumed, and very justly too, till they are disproved. If his opinions have been subsequently changed, this will generally, if not always, be provable in the same mode. Atwood v. Welton, 7 Conn. 66; Curtiss v. Strong, 4 Day (Conn.) 51; Swift's Ev. 48, 50; Scott v. Hooper, 14 Vt. 535; Mr. Christian's note to 3 Bl. Com. 369; 1 Phil. Ev. 18; Com. v. Bachelor, 4 Am. Jur. 79, note. If the change of opinion is very recent, this furnishes no good ground to admit the witness himself to declare it; because of the greater inconvenience which would result from thus opening a door to fraud, than from adhering to the rule requiring other evidence of this fact. The old cases, in which the witness himself was questioned as to his belief, have, on this point, been overruled. See Christian's note to 3 Bl. Com. (369) n. (30). The law, therefore, is not reduced to any absurdity in this matter. It exercises no inquisitorial power, neither does it resort to secondary or hearsay evidence. If the witness is objected to, it asks third persons to testify whether he has declared his belief in God and in a future state of rewards and punishments, etc. Of this fact they are as good witnesses as he could be, and the testimony is primary and direct. It should further be noticed that the question, whether a person about to be sworn is an atheist or not, can never be raised by anyone but an adverse party. No stranger or a volunteer has a right to object. There must, in every instance, be a suit between two or more parties, one of whom offers the person in question as a competent witness. The presumption of law, that every citizen is a believer in the common religion of the country, holds good until it is disproved; and it would be contrary to all rule to allow anyone, not party to the suit, to thrust in his objections to the course pursued by the litigants. This rule and uniform course of proceeding shows how much of the morbid sympathy expressed for the atheist is wasted. For there is nothing to prevent him from taking any oath of office; nor from swearing to a complaint before a magistrate; nor from making oath to his answer in chancery. In this last case, indeed, he would not be objected to for another reason—namely, that the plaintiff, in his bill, requests the court to require him to answer upon his oath. In all these, and many other similar cases, there is no person authorized to raise an objection. Neither is the question permitted to be raised against the atheist, where he himself is the adverse party, and offers his own oath in the ordinary course of proceeding. If he would make affidavit, in his own cause, to the absence of a witness, or to hold to bail, or to the truth of a plea in abatement, or to a loss of a paper, or to the genuineness of his books of account, or to his fears of bodily harm from one against whom he requests surety of the peace, or would take the poor debtor's oath; in these and the like cases the uniform course is to receive his oath like any other person's. The law, in such cases, does not know that he is an atheist; that is, it never allows the objection of infidelity to be made against any man seeking his own rights in a court of justice; and it conclusively and absolutely presumes that, so far as religious belief is concerned, all persons are capable of an oath of whom it requires one, as the condition of its protection, or its aid; probably deeming it a less evil that the solemnity of an oath should, in a few instances, be mocked by those who feel not its force and meaning, than that a citizen should, in any case, be deprived of the benefit and protection of the law, on the ground of his religious belief. The state of his faith is not inquired into where his own rights are concerned. He is only prevented from being made the instrument of taking away those of others."

In Arnd v. Amling, 53 Md. 192, the trial court examined a witness on his voire dire as to his religious belief; and, upon his reply that he believed in God and future punishments, permitted him to testify; the appellate court, while disapproving the custom as contrary to the modern practice, held that it was not reversible error.

In that case the court, by Hines, J., said: "The unquestioned tendency of modern legislation, as well as judicial interpretation, is to the exclusion of inquiry into religious belief as a test of the competency of a witness. In this state, legislation, in civil cases at least, has kept pace with this tendency, so that by virtue of the provisions of the Civil Code no religious test can be applied." The court then cited the provision in the Kentucky constitution "That the civil rights, privileges or capacities

This evidently means that a witness is competent, without regard to his believing or not believing in a God who will reward the just and punish the wicked. The law leaves the matter of competency to considerations independent of the religious belief of the witness. 13. In New York, the constitution (art. 1, § 3) declares that "no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief." But it has been decided that a witness may be interrogated as to the extent and nature of his religious belief, for the purpose of impeaching his credibility and diminishing the weight which would otherwise be given to his testimony. *Stambro v. In England, it is provided by statute that if any person, called to give evidence in any court of justice, whether in a civil or criminal proceeding, shall object to take an oath, or shall be objected to as incompetent to take an oath, such person shall, if the presiding judge is satisfied that the taking of an oath would have no binding effect on his conscience, make a solemn promise and declaration, after which he is liable to prosecution for perjury if he testifies falsely.³

In New Mexico, a Chinaman who believes in the Chinese religion, but takes the ordinary oath and states that he regards it as binding, is competent, so far as religious belief is concerned.⁶

In some states, where the statutes enact that "all persons," or "every human being," or "everyone who can understand an oath," shall be competent, probably religious disbelief would not affect the competency of a witness.⁷ And where the constitution provides that "no person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles," the right of a party to testify in his own behalf is held to be a civil right that cannot be denied on the ground that he does not believe that God will punish perjury.⁸

6. Infamy.—At common law, a person convicted of an infamous crime was not, thereafter, competent to testify as a witness in any court of justice, unless his competency was restored by a reversal of the judgment of conviction, or by a pardon. This subject, however, has been separately treated in another volume of this work.¹

7. Indians, Chinamen, and Negroes.—Formerly there were statutes in some of the states prohibiting Indians and Chinamen from testifying for or against white persons.² In the absence of such a statute, however, the law makes no such distinction.³ So, also, it was formerly the law in many states that a negro was incompetent to testify for or against a white person;⁴ but in states where this was the rule it has generally been held that the act of Congress, known as the Civil Rights Bill,⁵ placed negroes on the same footing as white persons in respect to their competency as witnesses.⁶ In one jurisdiction, however, the contrary was held on the ground that Congress has no constitutional power to prescribe rules of evidence for the courts of the states.⁷

to dispense with oaths and affirmations." In Clinton v. State, 33 Ohio St. 27, it was held that "the common-law rule still obtained, notwithstanding this provision, and the witness, to be competent, must believe in the existence of a God who will punish him if he swears falsely," but that one who believes in the existence of a God and that an oath is binding on the conscience, is a competent witness though he does not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments.

Maryland.—In Maryland, no one is incompetent as a witness or juror "provided he believes in the existence of God, and that, under His dispensation, such person will be held morally accountable for his acts, and be rewarded or punished therefor either in this world or the world to come." 8. Husband and Wife—a. AT COMMON LAW—(1) In General.—At common law, neither husband nor wife was a competent witness in any action, suit, or proceeding, civil or criminal, to which the other was a party.¹ For this prohibition, jurists and text writers have assigned several reasons. Some of the early authorities place it, in part at least, upon the technical ground of the unity of husband and wife.² Again, it was put upon the ground

The wife of a freedman, with whom he intermarried during the existence of their slavery, according to the ceremony then permitted to them, and with whom he continued to live as his wife, after emancipation, was not a competent witness for him or against him. Hampton v. State, 45 Ala. 82.

In Pedley v. Wellesley, 3 C. & P. 558; 14 E. C. L. 448, it appeared that the defendant married the plaintiff's principal witness after she was subpoenaed to give her evidence in the case. It was strongly urged that the defendant could not thus deprive the plaintiff of his evidence, but the court refused to permit her to be examined without the defendant's consent.

The husband is not a competent witness to a deed in which land is conveyed to his wife. Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. (Va.) 321.

Where husband and wife are defendants, neither of them can be required to answer interrogatories to be used in evidence against the other. Carter v. Taylor, 20 La. Ann. 421; Draper v. Hensingsen, 16 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 281.

2. Blackstone says this is "partly because it is impossible their testimony of common interest, which was a disqualification at common law,¹ but perhaps the most potent reason is public policy, it being deemed of fundamental importance to society to preserve the sanctity and harmony of the marital relation.²

Conversations between husband and wife in the presence of third persons may be received in evidence if they are material to the issue.³

Where either the husband or wife was a beneficial party, though not a party to the record, the other was incompetent to testify.⁴ And where one of them was incompetent by reason of

should be indifferent, but principally because of the union of person, and, therefore, if they were admitted to be witnesses for each other, they would contradict one maxim of law, nemo in propria causa testis esse debet, and if against each other, they would contradict another maxim, nemo tenetur seipsum accusare." 1 Bl. Com. 443.

In Windham v. Chetwynd, 1 Burr. 424, Lord Mansfield said: "In matter of evidence, husband and wife are considered as one, and cannot be witnesses, the one for the other. The husband cannot be witness for his wife in a question touching her separate estate."

1. In Peaslee v. McLoon, 16 Gray (Mass.) 488, the court was of the opinion that the unity of interest of husband and wife was the chief, if not the sole, reason for their exclusion as witnesses at common law.

2. Mr. Greenleaf says: "This exclusion is founded partly on the identity of their legal rights and interests, and partly on principles of public policy, which lie at the basis of civil society. For it is essential to the happiness of social life that the confidence subsisting between husband and wife should be sacredly cherished in its most unlimited extent."

In Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 223, the court said: "In the present case, the witness was called to discredit her husband; to prove, in fact, that he had committed perjury; and the establishment of the fact depended on his own confessions; confessions which, if ever made, were made under all the confidence that subsists between husband and wife. It is true, the husband was dead, but this does not weaken the principle; indeed, it would seem rather to increase than lessen the force of the rule. Can the wife, under such circumstances, either voluntarily be permitted, or by force of authority be compelled, to state facts in evidence which render infamous the character of her husband? We think most certainly that she cannot be. Public policy and established principles forbid it. This rule is founded upon the deepest and soundest principles of our nature. Principles which have grown out of those domestic relations that constitute the basis of civil society; and which are essential to the enjoyment of that confidence which should subsist between those who are connected by the nearest and dearest relations of life. To break down or impair the great principles which protect the sanctities of husband and wife would be to destroy the best solace of human existence." See also Co. Litt. 6 b; Davis v. Dinwoody, 4 T. R. 679, per Lord Kenyon; Barker v. Dixie, Cas. temp. Hardw. 264; Wowles v. Young, 13 Ves. Jr. 144; O'Connor v. Marjoribanks, 4 M. & G. 443; 43 E. C. L. 232, per Tindal, C. J.

Whether or not the presence of third persons will remove the mutual disability of the husband and wife themselves to testify to such conversations does not seem clear. In Campbell v. Chace, 12 R. I. 333, it was held that it did not. And in Jacobs v. Hesler, 113 Mass. 157, it was held that the presence of young children of the family, who were not shown to have paid any attention to the conversation, did not affect the private character of the same. But in Lyon v. Prouty, 154 Mass. 488, the court refused to reverse the judgment, upon the objection that the husband had been permitted to testify to a conversation between himself and his wife in the presence of their daughter, a girl fourteen years of age, it appearing that the conversation was upon a topic which was necessarily of deep interest to the girl, and must have attracted her attention.

In Goodright v. Moss, Cowp. 594, Lord Mansfield said: "As to the time of the birth, the father and mother are the most proper witnesses to prove it. But it is a rule, founded in decency, morality and policy, that they shall not be permitted to say, after marriage, that they have had no connection, and, therefore, that the offspring is spurious; more especially the mother, who is the offending party."

Thus the mother of a child begotten out of wedlock, but born after her marriage, is not competent to prove that her husband is not its father. Den-adultery.¹ In an action for criminal conversation, the plaintiff, though competent under the statute as a witness in his own behalf, is nevertheless incompetent to prove his wife's adultery.² And, in such action, the wife is not competent to prove her own turpitude unless her disability has been removed by statute.³ But if a divorce a vinculo has been obtained before the trial of the action for criminal conversation, it seems that the former wife is competent for the plaintiff even to prove the charge of adultery.⁴

(2) Effect of a Divorce or the Death of One Spouse.—The rule was so strictly enforced that a divorce a vinculo did not render either spouse competent to testify to any matter which transpired during coverture, if such matter would have been excluded had the marital relation continued,⁵ though after such divorce either

In Dickerman v. Graves, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 309; 53 Am. Dec. 41, the court said: "The general rule, that the husband and wife are not competent to testify against each other, as to what occurred during the marriage relation, even after the marriage contract is dissolved, is, no doubt, a wise and salutary rule. The object of the law is that the most entire confidence may exist between those sustaining the relation of husband and wife, and that there may be no apprehension that such confidence can ever, at any time or in any event, be violated, so far, at least, as regards any testimony or disclosure in a court of law. But the case now under consideration comes neither within the rule nor the principle of the rule. The wife was not called here to testify against the husband, but, on the contrary, she was called to testify, and did testify, in his favor, and on his behalf. She herself made no objection, but testified freely and voluntarily. There was and would be no violation of any confidence reposed in her by the husband, for he himself called her to testify, and she testified wholly at his request, and by his procurement. There is nothing, therefore, in the rule of law on this subject, which would warrant the exclusion of the testimony of this witness in the present case. The case of Ratcliff v. Wales, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 63, is precisely like the present. It was an action for criminal conversation with the plaintiff's wife. The plaintiff, after showing a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, called his former wife to prove the adultery with the defendant for which the action was brought. It was adjudged that the testimony of the witness was properly admitted."

For Defense.—In such action the divorced wife will not be permitted to testify for the defense except as to matters which transpired after the divorce was obtained. Croae v. Rutledge, 81 Ill. 266.

of them might testify to any matter which did not violate the confidence of their former relation.¹ And neither did the death of one spouse remove the seal of secrecy from the lips of the other in regard to confidential communications which had taken place between them.² And in England, the rule was not confined to confidential communications.³ In the United States, however,

3. In O'Connor v. Marjoribanks, 4 M. & G. 435; 43 E. C. L. 228, Tindal, C. J., said: "It is impossible to gain much light from the cases decided at nisi prius relative to this subject, as the two principal ones appear to be in direct opposition to each other. We must see, therefore, which of them best accords with the general principles of law, and it appears to me that of the two, Monroe v. Twistleton, Peake's Add. Cas. 219, is the sounder, and that the doctrine therein laid down is built upon the general rule of law which, subject to certain well-known exceptions, is this: That a wife never can be admitted as a witness either for or against her husband. She cannot be a witness for him, because her interest is precisely identical with his; nor against him, upon grounds of public policy, because the admission of such evidence would lead to dissension and unhappiness, and possibly to perjury. There are cases to show that this intimate relation subsisting between the parties is not to be considered as dissolved by death, so as to let in the evidence of either party as to transactions occurring during their joint lives. But we are asked to confine the rule to cases where the communications between the husband and wife are of a confidential nature. But such a limitation of the rule would very often be extremely difficult of application, and would introduce a separate issue in each cause as to whether or not the communications between husband and wife were to be considered of a confidential character. Upon the whole, I think it better to adopt Lord Alvanley's rule in Monroe v. Twistleton, Peake's Add. Cas. 219, and to hold, therefore, that the evidence of the widow was improperly admitted in this case."

In the same case, Coltman, J., said: "In the argument in this case, a distinction has been taken, and it has been contended that as to some things a wife may be examined after the death of her husband, though not as to such matters as were in the nature of confidential communications between them. But, undoubtedly, that is not the rule during the lifetime of both parties, for the rule then is that, with the exception of certain well-known instances, neither husband nor wife can be admitted as a witness for or against the other. And I think that no such distinction as that now attempted to be set up arises upon the death of one of it was very generally held that the survivor might testify to matters, a knowledge of which did not come to the witness through the confidence of the marital relation,¹ unless there was some other ground of exclusion; such, for example, as interest in the event of the suit.²

(3) For and Against Co-defendants of Husband or Wife.—Where two or more persons were jointly indicted and jointly tried for the commission of a crime, the husband or wife of one of them was not, at common law, a competent witness for or against the others.³ But according to the weight of authority, the rule was otherwise if the defendants had separate trials, as in that event the record of the testimony given at the trial of a co-defendant could not be used as evidence either for or against the consort of the witness.⁴ There are cases, also, in which the rule the parties. With respect to the authorities, we are obliged to make our election between conflicting cases, and I agree that the doctrine laid down in Monroe v. Twistleton, Peake's Add. Cas. 219, is the sound one; that although the relation of husband and wife may have ceased to exist by a divorce of the parties, the objection as to the admissibility of evidence of either still subsists, and I think it makes no difference that the relation has been put an end to by death." Maule, J., also said: "I, also, am of opinion that this evidence was inadmissible. Beveridge v. Minter, 1 C. & P. 364, is favorable to the admissibility of the witness, but the previous case of Monroe v. Twistleton, Peake's Add. Cas. 219, is the other way. I certainly think that more weight is due to the latter case, for it appears to have been more considered and more fully argued. It does not seem to have been cited in Beveridge v. Minter, 1 C. & P. 364."

was relaxed where the defendants were being jointly tried, and the wife of one of them was permitted to testify in favor of her husband's co-defendant where it clearly appeared that the proffered testimony could have no bearing on the question of her husband's innocence or guilt.¹ Upon trials for criminal conspiracy,

If a defendant wished the benefit of the testimony of the wife of a co-defendant, his proper course was to move for a separate trial. Com. v. Easland, 1 Mass. 15.

Where persons are jointly indicted for a misdemeanor and one is put on trial alone, he may call as a witness the wife of a co-defendant who stands defaulted on his recognizance. State v. Worthing, 31 Me. 62.

Where the husband or wife had been either acquitted or convicted, the other was a competent witness in the prosecution of another person for the same offense. Reg. v. Williams, 8 C. & P. 283; 34 E. C. L. 391; Reg. v. Thompson, 3 F. & F. 824.

Where two or more persons are separately indicted and tried, the wife of one may testify against another. Blumann v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1893), 21 S. W. Rep. 1027; People v. Bosworth (Supreme Ct.), 19 N. Y. Supp. 114; People v. Langtree, 64 Cal. 256.

Contra.—There are cases which hold that a separate trial of the defendants did not alter the rule that the husband or wife of one of them was not competent to testify in behalf of another. Pullen v. People, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 48; State v. Smith, 2 Fred. (N. Car.) 405.

Thus, in People v. Colbern, 1 Wheel. Cr. Cas. (N. Y.) 479, it appeared that two persons were indicted for forgery. One of them was put upon trial, the other not having been taken. It was held that the husband of the defendant not yet in custody could not be examined as a witness at the trial of the other defendant.

C. C. 59; Reg. v. Bartlett, 1 Cox C. C. 105.

Where two prisoners were jointly indicted and tried for burglary, one of them proposed to call the wife of the other to prove an alibi, and it was held that she was a competent witness for that purpose. Reg. v. Moore, 1 Cox C. C. 59.

So, also, where persons were jointly indicted for stealing potatoes, and some potatoes were found in the house of each, the court allowed the wife of one defendant to testify that the potatoes found in the house of the other did not belong to the prosecuting witness. Reg. v. Bartlett, 1 Cox C. C. 105.

And in Reg. v. Sills, 1 C. & K. 494; 47 E. C. L. 494, which was the trial of an indictment for burglariously breaking into a house and stealing personal property therefrom, it was proved that a part of the stolen property was found in the house of each of the prisoners, and Chief Justice Tindal permitted the wife of one of the defendants to testify that she took to the house of the other the property found there.

Where the wife and another were jointly indicted for stealing her husband's goods, it was held that the husband might testify for the Crown, since his wife could not in any event be convicted of stealing his property. Reg. v. Glassie, 7 Cox C. C. 1.

But it is otherwise if she can be convicted of the offense charged. Thus the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict., ch. 75, gives married women complete control of their separate property, and makes the husband and wife criminally liable for theft from each other. Under this statute it is held that where a wife and her paramour are jointly indicted for the larceny of the husband's property at the time of their elopement, the husband is not a competent witness for the Crown. Reg. v. Brittleton, 12 Q. B. Div. 266.

But where the wife's testimony would improve or injure her husband's case, she could not testify. Reg. v. Hamp, 6 Cox C. C. 167; Rex v. Webb, cited in 3 Russ. on Crimes 630; 1 Hale 301.

the husbands and wives of the defendants were excluded from the witness stand, because any evidence relevant to the issue on trial must necessarily tend either to acquit or convict all of the defendants.¹

(4) In Collateral Proceedings.—It was laid down as a rule, in an early English case, that neither husband nor wife ought to be permitted to give any evidence, in any form of proceeding, which would even tend to charge the other with the commission of a crime.² After much discussion, this rule was discarded as too broad and general, and it became the established rule of Westminster Hall that, in collateral proceedings which did not involve the mutual interests of husband and wife, either of them might testify to matters which merely tended to criminate the other, since neither the record of such collateral proceedings, nor the testimony given therein, could afterwards be used as evidence in a direct prosecution against the consort of the witness.³ This

Thus, she could not be examined where her proposed testimony would impeach the credit of witnesses who had testified against her husband. Rex v. Smith, 1 M. C. C. 289; Reg. v. Denslow, 2 Cox C. C. 230.

In Shields v. Ruddy, 2 Idaho 884, which was a civil action to recover damages for a conspiracy to defraud the plaintiff, it was held that the wife of one of the defendants might testify for the plaintiff under an instruction from the court that her testimony was not to be considered against her husband.

2. Rex v. Cliviger, 2 T. R. 263.

3. In Rex v. All Saints, 6 M. & S. 194, Lord Ellenborough said: "The objection rests only on the language of Rex v. Cliviger, 2 T. R. 263, that it may tend to criminate him, for it has not an immediate tendency, inasmuch as what she stated could not be used in evidence against him. The passage from Lord Hale P. C. 301, has been pressed upon us where it is said the wife is not bound to give evidence against another in a case of theft, if her husband be concerned, though her evidence be material against another and not directly against her husband. Admitting the authority of that passage, it assumes that the husband was under the criminal charge, that he was included in the simul cum aliis. But if we were to determine, without regard to the form of proceeding, whether the husband was implicated in it or not, that the wife is an incompetent witness as to every fact which may possibly have a tendency to criminate her husband, or which, connected with other facts, may, perhaps, go to form a link in the complicated chain of evidence against him, such a decision, as I think, would go beyond all bounds; and there is not any authority to sustain it; unless, indeed, what has been laid down, as it seems to me, somewhat too largely, in Rex v. Cliviger, 2 T. R. 263, may be supposed to do so."

In Rex v. Bathwick, 2 B. & Ad. 639; 22 E. C. L. 152, upon a question as to the settlement of a pauper, a witness was produced who testified that he had married her. Another witness was then produced to prove that the marriage was void on the ground that the pretended husband had been married to her before his marriage to the pauper. It was held that she was competent to prove that fact. Lord Tenterden, C. J., said: "The decision in the case of Rex v. Cliviger, 2 T. R. 263, appears to have been founded on a supposed legal maxim of policy, viz., that a wife cannot be a witness to give testimony in any degree to criminate her husband. This will undoubtedly be true in the case of a direct charge and proceeding against him for any offense; but in such a case she cannot be a witness to prove his innocence of the charge. The present case is not a direct charge or proceeding against the husband. It is true that if the testimony given by both be considered as true, the husband, Cook, has been guilty of the crime of latter rule was generally adopted in the United States,¹ though it seems that such testimony should not be compelled if the witness declines to give it voluntarily.² And even in collateral proceedings, neither the husband nor the wife should be permitted to testify directly to the criminality of the other.³

(5) Where the Marriage Is Void.—Where the supposed marriage is void the alleged husband and wife are competent witnesses for or against each other, even though they in good faith

bigamy; but nothing that was said by the wife in this case, nor any decision of the court of session founded upon her testimony, can hereafter be received in evidence to support an indictment against him for that crime. This is altogether res inter alios acta. Neither the husband nor the wife has any interest in the decision of the question, and the interest of the parish of Pancras required that the illegality of the second marriage should be established if it was in fact illegal." In New Jersey, a husband or wife, in a suit in which neither is a party, may be asked a question for the purpose of discrediting the testimony of the other, when the matter inquired into is not an indictable offense. Ware v. State, 35 N. J. L. 553.

3. Thus, on the trial of an indictment against a man for the crime of adultery, the husband of the woman, with whom the crime is alleged to have been committed, is not a competent witness to prove the act of adultery, as such testimony would be a direct charge of criminality against his wife. State v. Welch, 26 Me. 30; 45 Am. Dec. 94; State v. Gardner, 1 Root (Conn.) 485; Com. v. Gordon, 2 Brews. (Pa.) 569; Cotton v. State, 62 Ala. 12.

In Com. v. Sparks, 7 Allen (Mass.) 534, the same question arose and the witness was excluded.

The court said: "It has never been determined that a husband or wife is admissible as a witness, in any collateral proceeding, to testify directly to the commission of any criminal act of the other. Nor ought such testimony to be received in any proceeding or upon any trial; for, as nothing would be more likely to exasperate the parties and be the means of implacable discord and dissension between them, its admission would be a violation of that principle of public policy upon which the general rule of their exclusion as witnesses against each other is founded."

In Minnesota, the husband of the faithless wife may testify in such cases. State v. Vollander (Minn. 1894), 58 N. W. Rep. 878. To the same effect is Van Cort v. Van Cort, 4 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 621.

In State v. Wilson, 31 N. J. L. 77, the alleged guilty parties were jointly indicted for adultery. The woman was first tried and acquitted; and, upon the trial of her alleged paramour, the husband of the woman was offered as a witness to prove that he had come upon the defendant and his wife in flagrante delicto. The court, upon a review of the authorities, held that he was not competent to give such testimony.

Upon the trial of an indictment for stealing wheat, a married woman was called on the part of the Crown to prove that her husband, who had absconded, was present when the wheat was stolen, and that she saw him deliver it to the prisoner then on trial. Taunton, J., after consultation with Littledale, J., excluded the evidence on the ground that the wife was directly accusing her husband of crime, and while her testimony could not be used against him if he were put upon trial for that offense, yet it might cause a charge to be made against him. Whether or not persons who represent themselves as husband and wife may, at the trial of a cause to which one of them is a party, prove their cohabitation meretricious for the purpose of removing their mutual disability as witnesses, was at one time a question of considerable doubt. See Campbell v. Twemlow, 1 Price 81. It is said that Lord Kenyon once refused to admit a woman as a witness for the defendant in a trial for forgery where, in the course of the trial, the prisoner had frequently referred to her as his wife; but, upon hearing an objection to her competency, denied that they were in fact married. Ruled on Chester Circuit 1782, and referred to by Richards,

C. B., in Campbell v. Twemlow, 1 Price 81. Upon the authority of this ruling of Lord Kenyon, Best, C. J., sitting as a trial judge, rejected as a witness a woman who had been held out to the world as the wife of the defendant, and lived with him at his home as his wife, though she stated, when called as a witness, that she was not his wife. Batthews v. Galindo, 4 Bing. 610. Upon a rule nisi for a new trial, it was unanimously decided, by the court of common pleas, that the witness should not have been excluded. The Chief Justice himself said: "I am clearly of opinion that my decision at nisi prius was wrong; but I was led into error by the decision of Lord Kenyon, which, I am satisfied, bears directly upon the point. It cannot be material when or where the declarations are made as to the character in which the female stands. . . . The true principle to follow on such occasions is that which is stated in Starkie, that the witness is not to be excluded, unless de jure wife of the party. Where the situation of the female may be changed in a moment, and is so different from that of a wife, who cannot be separated, it is much better that the objection should go to the credit than to the competency of the witness." prima facie proof of a valid marriage, the first wife is not competent to prove such marriage invalid.¹ But after proof of the first marriage, the second wife is a competent witness to prove the defendant's marriage to her, because such marriage is void and she is not his lawful wife.² If, however, the second marriage is not disputed, and the issue is as to the fact or validity of the first marriage, the alleged second wife should not be admitted as a witness, because she is prima facie the lawful wife of the defendant.³

Quanstrom, 93 Mich. 254; Boyd v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 1080; State v. Ulrich, 110 Mo. 350.

1. In Peat's Case, 2 Lewin C. C. 288, the prisoner was indicted for marrying a second wife during the lifetime of the first, and his defense was that the first marriage was void, because the first wife had a husband living at the time of her marriage to the defendant, and he proposed to call her as a witness to prove that fact. Alderson, Baron, was first inclined to permit her to testify, but after consultation with Williams, J., he determined not to do so. The point was reserved, but the prisoner was acquitted and the case did not come up for review. This ruling has been followed in Canada. See Reg. v. Madden, 14 U. C. Q. B. 588; Reg. v. Tubbee, 1 U. C. Pr. Rep. 98, but it has been much criticised by able text writers. Mr. Russell says: "The first impression of the very learned baron seems to have been the correct one. The only ground on which the witness could be rejected was that she was the lawful wife of the prisoner, for the general rule does not extend to a wife de facto but not de jure." 1 Russ. Cr., p. 319, note (m), citing 2 Stark. Ev. (2d. ed.) 402. Mr. Wharton, also, in criticism of the Canadian cases above cited, says: "This, however, is founded on a petitio principii. The question is whether the first marriage is valid. If so, she is not a witness. But she is a witness if such marriage is invalid. For the court to refuse to admit her when called by the defendant to disprove the marriage, is to prejudge the question in issue." 1 Whart. Ev., § 426. And in Wells v. Fletcher, 5 C. & P. 12; 24 E. C. L. 190, it appeared that a woman called as a witness for the defendant had been married to him, but she was permitted to state that she had previously been married to another man, but not having seen him for thirty years she thought he was dead, and, therefore, married the defendant, but afterwards learned that her first husband was living. The court admitted her as a witness, on the ground that the second marriage was void.

In Dumas v. State, 14 Tex. App. 464; 46 Am. Rep. 241, the defendant called his alleged first wife to testify in his behalf, in rebuttal of evidence of their marriage which had been introduced by the state. She refused to be examined, and it was held on appeal that the trial court properly compelled her to testify.

Upon a prosecution for bigamy, Lord Chief Justice Hale said: "The first and true wife is not allowed to be a witness against her husband, but I think it clear the second may be admitted to prove the second marriage, for she is not his wife, contrary to the sudden opinion delivered in July, 1664, at the Assizes in Surrey in Arthur Armstrong's Case, for she is not so much as his wife de facto." 1 Hale P. C. 693.

In 1 East P. C. 469, it is said: "The first and true wife cannot be a witness against her husband, nor vice versa, but the second may be admitted to prove the second marriage, for, the first being proved, she is not so much as wife de facto. But that must be first established."

In Norris' Peake on Ev. 248, it is said: "It is clearly settled that a woman who was never legally the wife of a man, though she has been in fact married to him, may be a witness against him. As, in an indictment for bigamy, the first marriage being proved by other witnesses, the second wife may be examined to prove the marriage with her, for she is not de jure his wife."

3. In Miles v. U. S., 103 U. S. 304,

(6) Assignment or Release of Interest.—In many cases, where the husband or wife was disqualified at common law by reason of a direct interest of the other in the event of the suit, such a disqualification might be removed by a valid assignment or release of such interest.¹ Thus, the husband of a legatee whose legacy had been released to the executor was a competent witness in reversing 2 Utah 19, the court said: "The marriage of the plaintiff in error with Caroline Owens was charged in the indictment and admitted by him upon the trial. The fact of his previous marriage with Emily Spencer was, therefore, the only issue in the case, and that was contested to the end of the trial. Until the fact of the marriage of Emily Spencer with the plaintiff in error was established, Caroline Owens was prima facie his wife, and she could not be used as a witness against him. The ground upon which a second wife is admitted as a witness against her husband, in a prosecution for bigamy, is that she is shown not to be a real wife by proof of the fact that the accused had previously married another wife, who was still living and still his lawful wife. It is only in cases where the first marriage is not controverted, or has been duly established by other evidence, that the second wife is allowed to testify, and she can then be a witness to the second marriage and not to the first. The testimony of the second wife to prove the only controverted issue in the case, viz., the first marriage, cannot be given to the jury on the pretext that its purpose is to establish her competency. As her competency depends on proof of the first marriage, and that is the issue upon which the case turns, that issue must be established by other witnesses before the second wife is competent for any purpose; even then she is not competent to prove the first marriage, for she cannot be admitted to prove a fact to the jury which must be established before she can testify at all." See also Dixon v. People, 18 Mich. 84, where it appeared that the defendant's wife had first married one Phillips, who disappeared in April, 1860. In 1862 she read in a newspaper what she supposed to be an account of his death. In 1865, having heard nothing more of her husband, she married the defendant. The trial court admitted her as a witness for the state, over the defendant's objection. For this error the conviction was reversed, the appellate court saying that, in the absence of further evidence, it must be presumed that Phillips was dead, and that the witness was the defendant's lawful wife. Compare Griggs' Case, T. Raym. 1; Finn v. Finn, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 339.

(7) Exceptions to the Rule—(a) Crimes Committed Against Each Other.—An exception to the rule excluding the testimony of husband and wife against each other is to be found in cases of personal outrage committed by one upon the other. In all manner of offenses involving personal injury to the wife or affecting her liberty, she has always been allowed to testify directly against her husband as a matter of necessity.³ And similarly, where the husband is the injured party, he may testify against his wife.⁴ In cases where the husband and wife are competent to testify against each other, they may also testify in favor of each other.⁵

In Daniel v. Proctor, 1 Dev. (N. Car.) 428, it was held that the wife of a sole executor who had renounced the office was a competent witness to prove the execution of the will, upon the ground that the executor took nothing under the will, and no commissions were given him thereunder. The court thought that any interest which he may have had at the time of the execution of the will was contingent upon the allowance of commissions by the court. But in Huie v. McConnell, 2 Jones (N. Car.) 455, it was held that the wife of one named as an executor in a will was not a competent witness to prove the same, although her husband had entered a renunciation of the office in open court, and had released all his interest under the will. This decision went upon the ground that a witness to a will must be competent at the time of its execution. The court disapproved the case of Daniel v. Proctor, 1 Dev. (N. Car.) 428, saying that it had been virtually overruled.

is a competent witness to testify for the prosecution;¹ and upon the trial of a husband for assisting another man to commit a rape upon his wife she may be a witness against him.²

This relaxation of the rule excluding husband and wife as witnesses for or against each other is demanded by the necessities of justice, but it extends no farther than such necessities require. Consequently, the exception is confined to cases of personal violence endangering the bodily safety or liberty of the witness.³

No outrage upon the feelings of the wife by the commission of an offense, however detestable, will render her competent as a witness against her husband when he is put upon trial for the offense. Thus bigamy, adultery, and even incest committed by the husband with the wife's daughter, are not such personal wrongs to the wife as will render her testimony admissible against the offender.⁴

In State v. Armstrong, 4 Minn. 335, Flandran, J., said: "A prosecution for the crime of adultery does not fall within the cases in which a wife could testify against her husband under the general rule, for two reasons. First, the necessity which warrants the exception does not exist, as all the material features of such an offense are susceptible of proof without her aid as readily as in other crimes. Second, it is not a crime against her person, and involves no violence to or abuse of her."

In Bassett v. U. S., 137 U. S. 496, the prisoner was indicted for polygamy, and his wife was called as a witness for the prosecution and permitted to testify as to confessions made by him to her in respect to the crime charged, and her testimony was the only direct evidence against him. This testimony was admitted under the first paragraph of section 1156 of the Code of Civil Procedure, enacted in 1884, section 3878 of the Compiled Laws of Utah, 1888, which reads: "A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent, nor the wife for or against her husband without his consent, nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other." The contention was that polygamy is, within the language of that paragraph, a crime committed by the husband against a wife. But it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that this statutory provision was merely declaratory of the common law, and that at common law such an offense was not a crime against the wife within the exception to the general rule admitting her testimony against her husband. Mr. Justice Brewer, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "We conclude, therefore, that the section quoted from the Code of Civil Procedure, if applicable to a criminal case, should not be adjudged as working a departure from the old and established rule, unless its language imperatively demands such construction. Does it? The clause in the Civil Code is negative, and declares that the exception of the incompetency of wife or husband as a witness against the other does not apply to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other. Is polygamy such a crime against the wife? That it is no wrong upon her person is conceded; and the common-law exception to the silence upon the lips of husband and wife was only broken, as we have noticed, in cases of assault of one upon the other. That it is humiliation and outrage to her is evident. If that is the test, what limit is imposed? Is the wife not humiliated, is not her respect and love for her husband outraged and betrayed, when he forgets his integrity as a man and violates any human or divine enactment? Is she less sensitive, is she less humiliated, when he commits murder, or robbery, or forgery, than when he commits polygamy or adultery? A true wife feels keenly any wrong of her husband, and her loyalty and reverence are wounded and humiliated by such conduct. But the question presented by this statute is not how much she feels or suffers, but whether the crime is one against her. Polygamy and adultery may be crimes which involve disloyalty to the marital relation, but they are rather crimes against such relation than against the wife; and, as the statute speaks of crimes against her, it is simply an affirmation of the old familiar and just common-law rule. We conclude, therefore, that under the statute the wife was an incompetent witness as against her husband."

In Iowa and Nebraska, the courts have taken the position that bigamy, adultery and incest committed by the husband are crimes against his wife; and, in prosecutions for those offenses, she is permitted to testify against him. State v. Bennett, 31 Iowa 24; State v. Hazen, 39 Iowa 648; State v. Sloan, 55 Iowa 219; State v. Hughes, 58 Iowa 165; Lord v. State, 17 Neb. 529; Owens v. State, 32 Neb. 174.

(b) Agency.—Where the wife has acted as agent for her husband in the transaction of his business, he is bound by her acts, declarations and admissions concerning that business, and they are admissible in evidence against him the same as those of any other agent.¹ But, at common law, she could not be called as a witness to prove her acts as such agent.² It is, however, pretty generally provided by statute that where the husband or wife acts as agent for the other in any business transaction, the one so acting may be a witness for the other concerning all things done or said within the scope of such agency.³ And in one jurisdic-disapproved in People v. Quantstrom, 93 Mich. 254; Bassett v. U. S., 137 U. S. 496. They do not seem to be supported by reason or authority. Nevertheless, in direct opposition to the emphatic language of the Supreme Court of the United States, Colorado has fairly outdone Iowa and Nebraska by holding that a husband's perjury in a divorce suit against his wife is a crime against her which renders her competent to testify against him upon his trial for the offense. Dill v. People, 19 Colo. 469.

overruling Magness v. Walker, 26 Ark. 470, the court said: "The result of the cases, here and elsewhere, upon this subject is that the common-law disability to testify for or against each other as between husband and wife remains; that in all cases where they act as agents for each other, their acts, declarations and admissions in the course of the business of the agency may be proved by others and will bind the principal, but they cannot themselves testify in the case. We recognize the fact that this in some degree militates against the principle of mutuality, allowing one party to testify and disqualifying the agent, who may be the husband or wife of the other. The harmony of the rules of evidence has been broken by the restricting nature of the enabling clause of the constitution removing only the disqualification of interest and allowing that springing from policy to remain. The constitution itself restores the mutuality in cases of suits for or against the estate of persons deceased, but does not proceed farther. We cannot do so without judicial legislation; expressio unius est exclusio alterius. If it be desirable, the change is within the power of the legislature. Meanwhile, husbands and wives who avail themselves of each other's agency, must rest upon the common-law modes of proof."

tion at least, the court appears to have departed from the common-law rule without the aid of an enabling statute.¹

Where the wife acts in her husband's presence, she cannot be said to act as his agent, and her testimony is not, therefore, admissible.² Proof of the agency must, in any such case, be given as a condition precedent to the testimony of the husband or wife, as the case may be,³ and then such testimony must be confined

It is not necessary that the wife should have been agent for her husband in all the matters in controversy in a suit, in order that her testimony may be admitted. Thus, in an action on an account annexed, each item of the account upon which a distinct issue is raised, is a cause of action as to which she may testify, if it was transacted by her in her husband's absence. Packard v. Reynolds, 100 Mass. 153.

In Birdsall v. Dunn, 16 Wis. 239, Dixon, C. J., said: "If the ex parte declarations of the wife without oath are admissible in such a case, it is difficult to perceive upon what principle her testimony under oath, if properly tendered to the same facts, is to be excluded. Courts might not compel her to testify against her own will, or at the instance of the opposite party, but if she comes willingly, her husband consenting, it would seem that she ought to be admitted." And after a review of authorities, the learned Chief Justice continues: "It is apparent from this brief examination of decisions that the rules of the common law excluding witnesses, either on the ground of interest or of public policy, are by no means inflexible. They yield to the exigencies of particular cases, and an exception is formed whenever the purposes of justice require it. We are of opinion, especially since the enactment of the statute removing the disability of parties, that the case of a wife acting as the agent of her husband should constitute an exception as to all business transactions by her within the scope of her employment, and, therefore, that the testimony of Mrs. Dunn, the wife of the defendant, should have been received to that extent."

In Alabama, under a statute which removed the incompetency of parties and persons interested in the event of the suit, the court held that a husband who managed his wife's separate estate might be a witness as to what disposition he had made of money belonging to her. As the statute had removed the objection arising from interest and from being a party, the court took the view that the necessity of the case should override the objection arising from public policy. In an action to recover damages for injuries inflicted on the plaintiff by a vicious dog, it was held that the fact that the defendant's wife sometimes tied the dog and watched him in her husband's absence, did not constitute her his agent so as to let in her testimony in his behalf. Garrison v. Barnes, 42 Ill. App. 21; Bates v. Cilley, 47 Vt. 1.

In an action against a railroad company for killing the plaintiff's cow, which had escaped from the pasture, the fact that the plaintiff's wife was the only person who saw and knew the circumstances does not make her a competent witness. Baxter v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 102 Mass. 383.

Where the husband has acted as agent for his wife or she for him, the witness is competent to prove the agency. Sumner v. Cooke, 51 Ala. 521; Burke v. Savage, 13 Allen (Mass.) 408; Chunot v. Larson, 43 Wis. 536; 28 Am. Rep. 567; Schmied v. Frank, to the matters which come properly within the scope of the agency.¹

Where the wife has kept her husband's books of original entry, she is a competent witness for him when he sues on the book account.² But it is necessary that they be books of original entry. If she has made up the books from original memoranda, made

Bedford*, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 243, where it was held that a wife was not competent to prove that her husband gave her the money to pay a note. This decision was put upon the ground that these facts must have come to her knowledge through the confidence of the marital relation.

1. Mountain v. Fisher, 22 Wis. 93; Robertson v. Brost, 83 Ill. 116; Robertson v. Robnett, 43 Ill. App. 191.

In an action for malicious prosecution for perjury, alleged to have been committed by the plaintiff concerning a business transaction in which the defendant's wife acted as his agent, it was held that she was not a competent witness, as she had not acted as her husband's agent in the alleged wrongful prosecution of the plaintiff, which was then the matter at issue, and not the business transaction which she had conducted as his agent. Bliss v. Franklin, 13 Allen (Mass.) 244.

Under the Massachusetts statute, she may testify only to a contract or cause of action which is in issue and on trial. It is accordingly held that she may not testify to the payment by her, in her husband's absence, of a promissory note upon which he is sued. Bruce v. Matthews, 101 Mass. 64. Neither is she a competent witness for him in an action for breaking and entering his dwelling house in his absence, and using vile and abusive language to her, such being a transaction in which she took no active part. Bunker v. Bennett, 103 Mass. 516.

In Robertson v. Brost, 83 Ill. 119, it was held that where the wife is sent to demand money due her husband, she is not thereby rendered competent to prove admissions of the defendant going to prove a prior contract. The court said: "The asserted agency of the wife was only in going after the money some time afterward. She demanded payment and it was refused. That was all the transaction there was of the business of such agency. Had it been material to the issue, which it was not, to prove the facts of demand of payment and refusal of payment, then the wife might have been an admissible witness to prove these facts as matters of a business transaction, where the transaction was had and conducted by a married woman as the agent of her husband. But the claim that such an agency as there was here to go for the money for the coal converted the wife into a competent witness to prove a prior contract of the sale of the coal, by testifying to admissions made at the time of her demand of payment, is, as we view it, a perversion of this provision of the statute. Its allowance would be to enable the wife to be made a competent witness for the husband in every suit. He would need but to send her to the adverse party for some purpose pertaining to the subject of litigation, and thus qualify her, under the guise of an agency, to testify to admissions made which would go to establish the cause of action."

So, also, a wife, requested by her husband to call the indorser of a note held by him into the house and ask him whether he was going to pay it or not, is not competent to prove admissions made by the indorser, or prove an agreement by him which would make him liable on the note without demand of payment from the maker. Hale v. Danforth, 40 Wis. 382.

2. Littlefield v. Rice, 10 Met. (Mass.) 287; Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day (Conn.) 37; 3 Am. Dec. 255.

A contrary ruling was made in an early Vermont case. One reason given by the court for the decision was that, if the wife were admitted, she would be subject to cross-examination and might be compelled to testify against her husband. Carr v. Cornell, 4 Vt. 116. The same point was urged in Littlefield v. Rice, 10 Met. (Mass.) 290, but the court did not consider it a sufficient reason for excluding the wife as a witness, and disproved the reasoning of the Vermont court. Since the decision of Carr v. Cornell, 4 Vt. 116, a statute has been passed in that state by him from day to day, she is not thereby rendered a competent witness.¹

(e) Actions for the Value of Lost Baggage.—A well-known exception to the common-law rule excluding parties from the witness stand was to be found in actions against carriers for the loss of baggage, the amount and value of which was known only to the owner. As the wife generally packs her husband's trunk, and always her own, it will readily be seen that the same ground of necessity which justified the admission of the plaintiff himself would also, in such cases, render his wife admissible as a witness in his behalf.²

(b) UNDER ENABLING STATUTES—(1) Statutes Removing Disqualification of Interest.—Statutes removing the disability of parties and persons interested in the event of the suit, do not render the husbands or wives of such parties and interested persons competent to testify, because, as has been seen, interest is not the only ground upon which they are excluded from the witness stand.³ But in actions where they are both parties, either as making the wife a competent witness for her husband in such cases. See Eastabrooks v. Prentiss, 34 Vt. 457.

In Dibble v. Brown, 12 Ga. 223; 56 Am. Dec. 460, the court said: "Justice has her necessities, one of which is that wrong must be prevented, even by overriding rules of evidence which are ordinarily not only salutary but indispensable. The rule is applicable to this case. It is not pretended that there is any evidence attainable, to prove the contents of this trunk, but that of Mrs. Dibble. She packed it and she alone knew its contents. The necessity of her admission is found in the fact, which clearly appears on the face of this record, that if she is excluded the plaintiff loses his rights. The reason of the rule is fortified by a consideration of the confidence and trust which the public are obliged to repose in carriers, and the facility with which that confidence may be abused."

In McGill v. Rowand, 3 Pa. St. 452; 45 Am. Dec. 654, Rogers, J., said: "The principle of necessity, which alone enables a party under certain circumstances to prove the contents of a box or trunk, applies with as much, if not greater, force to the wife as to the husband. The wife usually packs her husband's trunk, and always her own, and, therefore, to say that she cannot, in a proper case, be a witness, will amount almost to a repeal of the rule and in most cases to a denial of justice. We, therefore, see no reasonable objection to the admission of the husband or wife, or both, to testify to the amount of their wearing apparel, and to its value, belonging to each, including in the catalogue the wife's jewelry and every other article pertaining to her wardrobe that may be necessary or convenient to either in traveling."

In Illinois, however, the wife, though competent to prove the contents of lost baggage, is not competent to prove the value thereof. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Taylor, 24 Ill. 323; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Copeland, 24 Ill. 332; 76 Am. Dec. 749.

The wife, being the real party in interest, is competent for all purposes, except to disclose confidential communications. Scrutchfield v. Sauter, 119 Mo. 615; Hutchinson v. Hutchinson, 16 Colo. 349; Williams v. Jacksonville, etc., R. Co., 26 Fla. 533.

In such case, the witness must have an interest in the event of the suit. Thus, where a married woman, claiming as heir of her deceased father in conjunction with her husband, sues to set aside a deed executed by her father, on the ground of undue influence and mental incapacity, her husband has no such interest in the event of the suit as will make him a competent witness in the case. His wife never having been seised of the land, he is not even a tenant by the curtesy inchoate. Wood v. Broadley, 76 Mo. 23; 43 Am. Rep. 754.

Notwithstanding the existence of a statute making parties competent to testify in their own behalf, the husband and wife may not testify to matters protected by the confidence of the marital relation, and even where no objection is made the court may ex mero motu interpose and put an end to such violation. Goodrum v. State, 60 Ga. 509.

In Babbott v. Thomas, 31 Barb. (N. Y.) 277, which was an action brought to cancel a bond and mortgage and to restrain the foreclosure of the mortgage, upon the ground that the consideration was usurious, the plaintiff offered himself as a witness in his own behalf, and it was objected that, as the wife was joined as a party plaintiff, the husband was an incompetent witness in the case. Pratt, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I think the husband was a competent witness on his own behalf. In the first place, the wife was not a necessary party to the suit. If she could be affected by the result of the suit, it would not be in consequence of any direct adjudication upon her rights but from the adjudication upon the rights of her husband. If the suit had been brought by the husband alone the effect of an adjudication would be precisely the same. If he should succeed in procuring the bond and mortgage to be canceled, the land would be free from the mortgage, as well in regard to her inchoate right of dower husband and wife to recover damages for a personal injury inflicted upon the wife, the husband, being the real party in interest, may testify in his own behalf,¹ and should the husband die before as to the husband's fee. So, on the other hand, had he failed it would forever be conclusive upon the question of usury. She might as well be made a party in an action of ejectment by or against the husband. Her inchoate right of dower is not such a right as to be capable of being established or divested by a judicial determination against the wife directly."

In Kentucky, it is held that where the husband and wife sue as joint owners of property, only one of them may testify. Covington v. Geyler, 93 Ky. 275; Raison v. Williams (Ky. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 8.

In Virginia, it was held, prior to the act expressly making husband and wife competent witnesses, that where they were both parties, and both interested in the event of the suit, neither of them was competent to testify. DeFarges v. Ryland, 87 Va. 406; Burton v. Mills, 78 Va. 470; William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. (Va.) 372; Murphy v. Carter, 23 Gratt. (Va.) 486; Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 317. But if one of them, though a party, had no interest in the matter in controversy, the other might testify. Thomas v. Sellman, 87 Va. 683; Farley v. Tillar, 81 Va. 279; Hayes v. Virginia Mut. Protection Assoc., 76 Va. 228.

But the disinterested party might not testify for or against the other. Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 390.

Thus, in a suit to annul a postnuptial settlement upon the wife, neither the husband nor wife could testify, as both were interested. Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 317; Wiltz v. Osburn, 83 Va. 227.

In Kaime v. Omro, 49 Wis. 372, the court said: "This action was brought by the respondents against the village of Omro in its corporate name, for the purpose of recovering damages for an injury sustained by Mahitabel Kaime upon one of the sidewalks of a street in said village, which the respondents alleged was out of repair at the time, and that such want of repair caused the injury. The respondents are husband and wife, and the only claim made by them on the trial of the action was for the personal injuries sustained by the wife. The first error assigned by the learned counsel for the appellants is that the circuit judge permitted the husband to testify in behalf of the plaintiffs on the trial, against the objection of the defendants. It is urged by the learned counsel that the husband is a nominal party only, and that he is, therefore, excluded under the rule which holds that a husband cannot testify either for or against his wife in an action to which he is not a party. Farrell v. Ledwell, 21 Wis. 183; Yager v. Larsen, 22 Wis. 184; Mountain v. Fisher, 22 Wis. 93. If it were admitted that in an action in which the husband has joined as a mere nominal party, having no pecuniary interest whatever in the result of the action, as in an action by the wife concerning her own property, or to recover money or property which belonged to her and in which the husband had no interest, he would not be a competent witness, such admission would not exclude the husband in this case. The husband had a direct interest in the result of the action. He was, in fact, the real party in interest, and the judgment, if any were recovered, and the money collected thereon, would belong to him. Shaddock v. Clifton, 22 Wis. 114; 94 Am. Dec. 588. In that case it was held that an admission made by the husband was evidence in the case against him and his wife. It was so held upon the ground that he was the real party in interest. There can be no doubt that under this decision the husband was a competent witness for himself and wife in this case, and that no error was committed in permitting him to testify."

In Maverick v. Eighth Ave. R. Co., 36 N. Y. 378, which was an action by husband and wife to recover damages for a personal injury sustained by the wife while a passenger on the defendant's car, the court said: "The testimony of the plaintiff, Augustus Maverick, was properly received. The question such action is brought, the widow may testify in her own behalf, because she can then recover damages for such injuries only as she has herself received.¹ So, also, where husband and wife are opposing parties to an action, each may testify in his or her own behalf.² The rule is otherwise, however, in suits for divorce, where the husband offers himself as a witness to prove the adultery of his wife.³ Nor, indeed, is either party to such suits competent to testify unless the statute plainly authorizes them to do so.⁴

(2) Under Statutes Expressly Removing the Disability.—In

is not whether he can be a witness for his wife, but whether, being a party, he must be debarred from testifying in his own behalf because his wife is also a party to the action. If the result of the action could only affect his wife or her separate property, and he was merely a nominal plaintiff, having no pecuniary interest whatever in the result, and he should be offered as a witness, the question as to his admissibility on account of his marital relation to the real plaintiff in interest would be presented; as, having no interest in the result of the action, he could not be considered as a party offering to testify in his own behalf or in any other character than as a witness for or against his wife. But in cases like this before us, the husband has a direct pecuniary interest in the result. The action was commenced and the judgment rendered before the passage of the act of 1861 giving to the married woman the right to maintain an action in her own name, the same as if she were a feme sole, for injuries to her person, and declaring that the moneys recovered on a judgment in such action shall be her sole and separate property. As the law stood at the time of the injury on account of which this action was brought, and of the judgment, the husband was entitled to the money which should be recovered in his lifetime for injuries to the person of his wife, and the necessity for making the wife a party to such actions arose from the fact that the damages would survive to the wife if the husband died before they were recovered. The interest of the husband in the recovery was direct and immediate, while that of the wife was uncertain and contingent. He had the right, as a real party in interest, to be examined as a witness in his own behalf, and the circumstance that the wife might be benefited by his testimony if he should die before recovery, is merely incidental and would not justify the exclusion of his testimony."

England, the common-law rule excluding husband and wife as witnesses has, in its application to civil actions, been swept away by a series of statutes, though it is still applicable in criminal prosecutions, subject to the exceptions arising from necessity which have already been considered.¹ So, also, in the United States, great innovations have been made, ranging from slight modifications of the common-law rule to statutes making husband and wife competent witnesses for or against each other in all judicial proceedings, whether civil or criminal, subject to the restriction that they are not to be permitted to testify to matters which came to their knowledge in the confidence of the marital relation, if objection be made.²

In many jurisdictions it has been thought that an intermediate rule is more consistent with public policy, and better calculated to subserve the ends of justice, than either the common-law rule or the complete removal of incompetency. It is accordingly provided, in substance, that husband and wife may be witnesses for each other, but, if objection be made, they may not testify against each other, except in cases where they might have done so at common law.³

IV. DETERMINING THE QUESTION OF COMPETENCY—1. The Objection—a. TIME OF MAKING.—Owing to the preliminary nature of an objection to the competency of a witness, it must be made before the examination in chief, if the fact of incompetency is at that time known to the objecting party.⁴ And, indeed, this

As examples where the legislature has gone to the extreme length of permitting one spouse to testify against the other, even in criminal prosecutions, see Kansas Crim. Code, § 215; *State v. It may be added that these statutes do not authorize the court to compel one spouse to testify against the other in criminal cases.

In Indiana, husband and wife are witnesses for or against each other in all cases, civil or criminal, except as to communications made to each other during the marriage, and, in an action for criminal conversation, the plaintiff's wife is not competent for him. Brown v. Norton, 67 Ind. 424; Hutchason v. State, 67 Ind. 449.

In Tennessee, the objection to husband and wife is confined to facts, the knowledge of which was acquired

rule was formerly so strictly adhered to that an objection made after the witness had been sworn in chief, came too late to be considered.¹ This rule, however, has been greatly relaxed, and objections of this sort made at various stages of the examination have frequently been sustained when, of course, the testimony of the witness previously given in the case should be stricken out, or the jury should be instructed to disregard it.² And in cases where the adverse party was not previously aware of the incompetency of the witness, it has long been the practice to consider the objection whenever, in the course of the examination, cause for excluding him is made to appear, provided the objection is made as soon as the disability of the witness becomes apparent.³ This rule applies as well to criminal prosecutions as to civil

Bunn*, 4 Burr. 2252, the witness was examined and cross-examined, and, after he had given his whole evidence, he was objected to as incompetent upon what he had himself said as to his interest in the event of the suit. Lord Mansfield said: "In strictness, the objection came too late, after he had been sworn in chief, examined, and cross-examined. The strictness of law in this respect is very wise and ought to be more adhered to, for the relaxation may be abused, and must always occasion waste of time."

actions;¹ and it has always been the rule in equity where there is no examination on the voire dire.² But it is too late to make the objection after the conclusion of the trial,³ unless the party who introduced the incompetent witness has intentionally taken advantage of his adversary by sharp practice.⁴

In Dewdney v. Palmer, 4 M. & W. 664, the plaintiff put a witness on the stand whom he called James Dewdney. Notwithstanding this fraud upon the defendant, the court said he should have made his objection on the voire dire. This case is not supported by reason, and, indeed, it must be considered as overruled in Jacobs v. Layborn, 11 M. & W. 685.

In Turner v. Pearte, 1 T. R. 719, Buller, J., said: "There has been no instance of this court's granting a new trial on an allegation that some of the witnesses examined were interested; and I should be very sorry to make the first precedent. Anciently, no doubt, the rule was that if there were any objection to the competency of the witness, he should be examined on the voire dire, and it was too late after he was sworn in chief. In later times, that rule has been a little relaxed, but the reason of doing so must be remembered. It is not that the rule is done away, or that it lets in objections which would otherwise have been shut out. It has been done principally for the convenience of the court, and it is for the furtherance of justice.

The examination of a witness to discover whether he be interested or not, is frequently to the same effect as his examination in chief; so that it saves time and is more convenient to let him be sworn in chief in the first instance, and, in case it should turn out that he is interested, it is then time enough to take the objection. But there never has yet been a case in which the party has been permitted after trial to avail himself of any objection which was not made at the time of the examination."

4. In Wade v. Simeon, 2 C. B. 342; 52 E. C. L. 342, it appeared that the plaintiff's attorney was examined as a witness for the plaintiff, and it was afterwards discovered that his client had previously assigned to him all his interest in the event of the suit. Upon motion for a new trial, the court set the verdict aside, without entering into the probable effect of the evidence so given upon the minds of the jury. Tindal, C. J., said: "The case of Turner v. Pearte, 1 T. R. 719, only decides that the mere incompetency of a witness is not of itself a sufficient ground for granting a new trial. That, however, is not the ground upon which we mean to proceed here. We decide this upon the ground of mala praxis. The witness, the attorney upon the record, was the real plaintiff."

In Niles v. Brackett, 15 Mass. 378, it appeared that a witness was examined who was known to the party producing him to be interested, and this circumstance was not known to the other party at the time of the trial, and, in fact, was concealed from him. The court granted a new trial, saying: "A new trial is granted, it appearing that the interest of the witness was not known to the plaintiff until after the trial, and that it was known to the defendant, who produced him. In a cause so nearly balanced as this appears to have been, a little evidence is sufficient to turn the scale."

witness. If he, with full knowledge of the incompetency of the witness, cross-examines him without objection, the court will not permit him to raise the objection at the hearing.¹ To permit such a course would be to give the objecting party an undue advantage, since in many cases the incompetency may be removed by release or otherwise, or the party in whose behalf the witness is examined may be able to procure other evidence.² But the objection may be made at the time of the reading of the deposition, if the facts constituting it were not known to the objecting party when the witness was examined.³

In Hudson v. Crow, 26 Ala. 521, Chilton, C. J., said: "The court below did not err in refusing to exclude the deposition of Williams, conceding that he was an interested witness. For it is not permitted to a party knowing of a witness's interest to allow his adversary to go on and examine him by deposition, raising no objection on the ground of interest, thus enabling himself to read the deposition, if it should prove beneficial to his side of the case, but, in the event it should prove detrimental to him, then for the first time to spring the objection at the trial and exclude it. The rule which usually obtains of not allowing questions to be asked upon cross-examination which properly belong only to an examination on the voire dire is founded upon a similar reason—the objecting party ought not to be allowed to speculate upon the testimony of a witness whose interest is known to him. The true rule requires the party against whom an interested witness is offered to elect whether he will permit him to be examined or not, as soon as the opportunity to make such election is offered, and if he does not do so he is presumed to waive it forever."

ting objections to be made at the hearing when none were made at the examination of the witness. In that case, the witness, who was about to depart on a voyage, was examined under a rule subject to all legal exceptions at the trial.

In Town v. Needham, 3 Paige (N. Y.) 551, Chancellor Walworth said: "The question of interest in respect to these witnesses, even if there had been no release, could not be raised for the first time at the hearing. When the testimony in this court was taken in secret, as was formerly the practice, if it appeared from the deposition of a witness that he was interested in the event of the suit, his testimony might be objected to and suppressed after the order to pass publication or at the hearing. This mode of proceeding was then necessary, as the adverse party had no opportunity to object to the competency of the witness until the testimony in chief in the cause was closed. But after the statute authorizing and directing an open examination of the witnesses a different practice was adopted, in analogy to the practice pursued in courts of law, and the party must now object to the testimony of the witness at the time of his examination, if his interest is then known, so as to enable the adverse party to show a release or discharge of the interest; or, at least, the objection should be made before the testimony in the cause is finally closed. Where the interest is of such a nature that it can be released, and the party suffers the witness to be examined without objection and waits until after the rule to close the proofs has been entered, it will then be too late for him to make the objection."

b. SPECIFYING GROUND OF OBJECTION.—In many cases a witness may be competent to testify concerning some of the facts in issue, though incompetent as to others. In such cases, he should Paine (U. S.) 400; Talbot v. Clark, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 51.

In U. S. v. One Case Hair Pencils, 1 Paine (U. S.) 400, which was a libel filed for the forfeiture of the merchandise therein set forth, on account of an alleged false entry of the goods at the customhouse, the deposition of a witness, whose name appeared on the bond as one of the sureties for the appraised value of the goods in question, was admitted in evidence without objection, but it appeared that the attorney for the United States did not know this fact, which would have rendered the witness incompetent had his testimony been objected to on that ground. It was held that the objection might be made at the hearing, as there was no opportunity to make it sooner. Thompson, J., said: "It is not pretended that the district attorney had any personal knowledge or actual notice that Cornell was security in the bond, or that any objection would be made to his testimony when he attended the examination, and I cannot think that the United States are to be concluded by any presumed knowledge of the fact by the district attorney. . . . There can be no presumption of a waiver where the party is ignorant of the fact from which it is to be presumed, and where the law does not cast upon him any such knowledge. Good faith and fair dealing require the objection to be made at the time of the examination of the witness, when known, in order to give the party an opportunity of removing the objection. . . . In the case of Bland v. Armagh, 3 Bro. P. C. 620, the evidence was voluntary affidavits taken at the commencement of the suit by the consent of parties. The objection was not on the ground of interest, but bias or partiality, growing out of circumstances well known to the party at the time the affidavits were taken, and he had also consented to a hearing in the cause after publication without taking an objection to the evidence. If the objection would, therefore, at any time have gone to the competency of the testimony, it was a strong case of waiver with full knowledge of the circumstances. So, also, in the case of Corporation de Sutton Coldfield v. Wilson,

1 Vern. 254, the objection was that the witness was a member of the corporation, and he had been cross-examined, not only as to his being a member of the corporation but on the merits. Here, then, was full knowledge of the interest when the cross-examination was gone into, and when the court, therefore, say the cross-examination makes a witness competent, though otherwise liable to exception, it must be taken in reference to the circumstances appearing in that case, and which brings the case within the rule I have laid down. The same remarks are applicable to the case of Ogle v. Paleski, Holt 485; 3 E. C. L. 193, which was much relied upon on the argument. The action was against the defendant as owner of a ship, which by negligence in the management had injured the plaintiff's brig. The cause had been put off on a former occasion at the instance of the defendant, with liberty reserved to the plaintiff to examine witnesses on interrogatories, and the evidence offered was the answers of the captain of the plaintiff's ship; and the first answer disclosed the fact that the witness was on board of the ship at the time of the accident. The objection was that his examination could not be read without showing a release before it was taken. The answer was that the objection was apparent on the examination and should then have been made before cross-examining the witness, that the objection might be waived, and that it had been waived, by not taking it at the time when it might have been disposed of by a release. And Chief Justice Gibbs said the objection ought to have been made in a former stage of the cause, and not having been thus made when it might have been cured, it ought not to prevail. This was a decision in perfect harmony with the rule which governed the other cases I have referred to, and to which I yield my full assent. But the present case does not fall within it. There is an essential, and I think a controlling, fact which distinguishes it: the want of either actual or constructive notice of the interest of the witness, when the deposition was taken."

not be excluded from the stand upon a general objection to his competency. It, therefore, follows that the objection should be sufficiently specific to enable the court to pass upon the competency of the witness as regards the particular facts which he is called to prove.¹

2. Evidence Upon the Question of Competency—a. EXAMINATION UPON THE VOIRE DIRE.—A witness is said to be examined on the voire dire when he is sworn and examined in regard to facts touching his competency to testify as a witness in the cause upon trial.² And upon such examination the strict rules of evidence are somewhat relaxed, and the witness may, if necessary, testify to the contents of written documents which are not in court, so far as they contain matters affecting his competency to testify in the cause,³ though if such documents be in court they should be

The substantial ground of objection must be explicitly stated at the trial, or it will not be considered upon a review of the case. Bunker v. Gilmore, 40 Me. 90. Compare *Jackson v. If it be shown by the preliminary examination of a witness that he has been convicted of felony, it may also be shown by him that he has been pardoned. It is not necessary to produce the pardon. Howser v. Com., 51 Pa. St. 332.

In Miller v. Mariner's Church, 7 Me. 54, the court said: "The examination of the witness to ascertain his interest was in effect upon the voire dire. It was a preliminary inquiry, not a part of the issue on trial, which is to be proved by the best evidence; a rule well known, and with which every party is or ought to be prepared to comply. But an objection to a witness upon the ground of interest is often unexpectedly made. Neither the witness, therefore, nor the party producing him, can be reasonably required to have with them written papers and documents which may happen to be referred to upon such an inquiry. The witness is to make true answers to such questions as may be put to him, and his mouth is not to be stopped as to any fact within his knowledge, by a technical rule which is altogether just and proper with respect to facts involved in the issue. Has he given a note? Has he given a deed? Is he a member of a certain corporation? Doubtless, the production of the note, the deed, and the books of the corporation, would be the best evidence of these facts. But they are within the knowledge of the witness, and the party objecting has a right to appeal to him upon the voire dire. A different rule would not only be unnecessary, but exceedingly inconvenient in practice, as it would occasion the delay or the continuance of the cause from time to time, as objections produced for inspection and would themselves be the best evidence of their contents.¹

And where the disqualification of the witness appears from his own testimony, it may be removed by his further examination, even though there be documentary evidence of the restoration of his competency.² According to the practice as it has long been established, the objecting party may either have the witness sworn and examined on the voire dire, or permit him to be sworn in chief and make his objection when, in the course of the examination, any ground therefor first appears, in which case, if the objection is sustained, the court will order the evidence already given by the witness to be stricken out.³ The exercise of this option should not be restrained by the court, because, as we have seen, the disqualification of the witness is frequently evidenced by written instruments which the objecting party cannot produce at the trial, and to compel him to forego the examination on the voire dire, and rely on his bringing to light the disqualifying facts after the witness has been sworn in chief, might, under the rules of evidence, deprive him of his only means of getting rid of an incompetent hostile witness.⁴

First, whether the defendant was entitled to go into a preliminary inquiry to ascertain whether the witness, Mrs. Seeley, was competent to testify for the plaintiff upon the issue before she was sworn in chief; and secondly, whether the defendant was entitled, under the pleadings, to go into evidence to show that the note of $90.39 was given under a mistake of fact. On both points the referee ruled against the defendant, and in both instances he was, in my opinion, wrong. First, the point upon which the defendant objected against

b. PROOF FROM OTHER SOURCES.—A party who objects to a witness on the ground that he is incompetent may, as we have seen, examine him on the voire dire, but he is not confined to this mode of proof. He may introduce other evidence, either written or verbal, of the facts upon which he relies to sustain his objection.¹ In some early English cases, it was ruled that both of these modes of proving incompetency could not be pursued upon the same objection; that the election of one conclusively barred any subsequent recourse to the other.² But this rule has been

Mrs. Seeley, as a witness, was that she was the wife of Nehemiah Seeley, and that the said Nehemiah was the party for whose immediate benefit the suit was prosecuted. The objection was not put in these precise words, but that was the effect of it. The case states that the defendant insisted that she was the wife of the real plaintiff in interest. The defendant asked that she might be sworn on her voire dire. This was refused, and after it had appeared by her examination in chief that she was Nehemiah Seeley's wife, the defendant offered to prove that Nehemiah Seeley was the real owner of the note and that the suit was brought for his sole benefit. This the referee refused, and he persisted in allowing the plaintiff to examine Mrs. Seeley in chief before the question was determined whether she was a competent witness or not. If the defendant's position had been limited to the allegation that the witness was N. Seeley's wife, then, inasmuch as she admitted that fact on the plaintiff's examination immediately after being sworn in chief, and the defendant was allowed an opportunity of objecting to her further examination, and did object, and the question arising upon that objection was correctly determined as the case then stood, no prejudice would have arisen out of the refusal to administer the preliminary oath, and the judgment should not be disturbed for that reason. But it was a part of the defendant's objection that N. Seeley was the real plaintiff, and this the defendant offered to prove, first, by the preliminary examination of the witness on the voire dire, and, when that was refused, by other witnesses. This request in both forms was denied to him. The referee ruled in effect that she should be examined in the first instance by the plaintiff, on the merits, after which she might be examined by the defendant's counsel as to her competency. This was inverting the regular order of proceeding, and was obviously incorrect. Previous to the witness being sworn, it is competent for the counsel for the party against whom he is called to have him examined on the voire dire, in order to ascertain whether he is competent to testify. (Stephens' N. P. 1731, 1769; Cowen & Hill's Notes 257.) This well settled rule has not been departed from, as the opinion of the supreme court intimates, in modern cases. The principle in respect to which the rigor of the ancient practice has been relaxed, is the one which precluded the party who had suffered an adverse witness to be sworn in chief from afterward objecting to his competency on the ground of interest, though such interest should appear in the course of the examination in chief. At present, if it appear at any time during the examination of the witness that he is incompetent, the objection may be taken and the testimony will be expunged. (1 Phil. Ev. 267; Jacobs v. Layborn, 11 M. & W. 685.) But there are still cases in which it may be expedient for a party to put an adverse witness on the voire dire. For instance, if the interest arises upon written documents with which the witness is cognizant, but which are not present, their contents may be shown by parol upon the preliminary examination, but not after the witness has been sworn in chief."

discarded as having no substantial foundation in reason.¹ In the United States, however, the early English rule has been strictly followed in most cases.² A failure to prove one set of facts relied on to exclude the witness, will not, however, preclude the objecting party from examining the witness on the voire dire in regard to other facts upon which an objection is made;³ and an objection based upon the opposing party's own evidence already in the case, is not such an attempt to prove the incompetency of the witness by evidence aliunde as will preclude a resort to an examination on the voire dire.⁴ Though, after an examination on the voire dire, other evidence may not be introduced to contradict the witness, yet if it afterwards appears in the course of the examination, upon the facts at issue and on trial, that the witness is incompetent, the court may sustain a motion to expunge his testimony.⁵

The unsworn declarations of the witness touching his interest

In Florida, the modern English rule is adopted. Thus, in Hooker v. Johnson, 6 Fla. 730, a witness for the plaintiff was examined by the defendant on the voire dire, and denied his interest in the suit. The defendant then offered to prove by other witnesses that the witness objected to was in fact a partner of the plaintiff. The trial court refused to permit him to do so, and for this error the judgment was reversed.

A witness having denied his interest on the voire dire may be further interrogated as to his situation for the purpose of discovering his interest. Reid v. Dodson, 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 396; Blackwell v. Hagerman, 3 N. J. L. 585.

A contrary ruling was sustained in Moore v. Sheridine, 2 Har. & M. (Md.) 453.

3. In Stebbins v. Sackett, 5 Conn. 258, the court said: "The rule is not that, in the same case, the interest of the witness on one set of facts may not be proved by disinterested testimony, and that, afterwards, his interest on a different set of facts may not be proved under the voire dire; but it is that, 'at the same time,' or, more correctly, on the same ground, these distinct modes may not be resorted to. When a party has proof of the witness's interest, which, for the moment, he thinks proper to suppress, he shall not be permitted to inquire of him under the voire dire, and thus 'sport with his conscience' (Butler v. Butler, 3 Day. (Conn.) 218), with a view of contradicting him by other evidence; or, if he has made the inquiry, by other testimony, he is equally precluded from interrogating the witness under the voire dire. But where, as in the present case, the inquiry of interest arises at different times, and on distinct grounds, I can see no possible objection to the establishment of it by different modes of testimony."

In Hamblett v. Hamblett, 6 N. H. 351, the court remarked that the rule confining the party to an election in the first place was no longer of much value. And in Butler v. Tufts, 13 Me. 302, it in the matter in controversy are merely hearsay and are not admissible in evidence on the question of his competency; ¹ though is said that where a party has attempted to exclude a witness by introducing evidence of his interest and has failed, the judge may, in his discretion, permit him to examine the witness on the voire dire.

In Chatfield v. Lathrop, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 417, the witness upon whose testimony the verdict was found, denied on the voire dire that he had any interest in the case. Upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial, the court admitted newly discovered evidence of his interest, as well as evidence of admissions by the witness and the party who had called him that his testimony on the voire dire was untrue; and upon this evidence it was held that a new trial was properly granted.

In Le Barron v. Redman, 30 Me. 537, the court said: "The interest of a witness may be proved by his own examination, or by evidence aliunde, but the adoption of either mode of proof by the party objecting to the competency of the witness precludes a resort to the other for a like purpose upon the same ground. This doctrine, though not clearly settled by the authorities, has been a rule of practice in our own courts, and it is believed to be consistent with a due observance of other settled principles of evidence and practice. A party is not permitted to trifle with the conscience of a witness when he has other proof that will exclude him, or after having resorted to evidence to impeach or disqualify him, nor can he raise collateral issues for that purpose. The examination of a witness, in respect to his interest, may be either upon the voire dire, or after he has been sworn in chief. But after an unsuccessful attempt to exclude the witness on this account, his testimony in chief may be stricken out of the case upon a discovery of his interest."

In Young v. Garland, 18 Me. 412, the court said: "One matter of exception against the decision of the court of common pleas is the exclusion of evidence as to the declarations of a proposed witness as to his interest. If a witness is sought to be excluded by proof of his declarations, the attempt will be unavailing. It will go only to his credibility. Were it otherwise, anyone might deprive a party of the benefit of his testimony by a simple declaration that he was interested. In North Carolina, it has been ruled that a witness conceiving himself interested when, in fact, he is not, will not render him incompetent. Harrison v. Harrison, 2 Hayw. (N. Car.) 355. As to proof of admissions of declarations of witnesses respecting matters of religious opinion, in order for the court to determine whether the excepted witness be an atheist, it is adopted from the necessity of the case, as a man's mind can only be known from his declarations in conversation or writing. Yet it is considered as an entirely different affair in regard to the declaration by a proposed witness as to his pecuniary interest."

In Doe v. Watkins, 1 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 445, Gaston, J., said: "The fact of interest might have been established by the witness's own oath, or by the testimony of other witnesses, or by the admission of the plaintiff, but it could be rightfully shown only in the mode in which other controverted facts between the litigant parties are allowed to be shown. The declarations of a third person, whether a witness or not a witness, made not on oath nor in the presence of the party against whom they are offered, cannot be brought forward, by either plaintiff or defendant, as evidence of the truth of the matter so declared. The first great safeguard which the law provides for the ascertainment of truth consists in requiring all the evidence of facts to be given in under the sanction of an oath. We find no exception when the fact to be shown is the interest of a witness in the subject of dispute."

the statements of the party who introduces him, being in the nature of admissions against interest, may be proved in order to exclude the witness.¹

When the competency of a witness has been successfully attacked, the party offering him may introduce evidence to sustain his competency.² But if it is made to appear, by evidence other than the testimony of the witness himself, that he is incompetent, he may not be examined for the purpose of removing the objection.³

In Stimmel v. Underwood, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 282, it was proposed to prove that a witness offered for the plaintiff had been heard to say, some months before the trial, that he felt himself bound to pay the plaintiff the amount in controversy if he should fail to recover. It was held, however, that such evidence was inadmissible. The court said: "The case before the court is not one in which the witness, when called to the stand, swears he believes he has an interest in the event of the suit, or that he is under an honorary obligation to pay, unless there should be a recovery against the party against whom he is called to testify. But evidence is adduced to show that the witness attempted to be excluded had, four months before the trial of the cause, been heard to say that he felt himself bound to pay the plaintiff the amount in litigation in that suit, if the plaintiff did not recover. It is clear he had no interest in the event of the suit, and if he had, it had been formally released. This case then presents the question whether the mere declaration of a witness, as to his obligations, can render him incompetent to testify, although the witness shall palpably have mistaken his legal obligations, or, viewing the declarations of the witness as referring to a mere honorary obligation, whether such declarations will exclude him from testifying. Now, if these declarations when made by the witness on the stand under oath would not and ought not to exclude him, a fortiori his statements and declarations not under oath ought not to exclude him; and even if at the trial his belief of his legal or honorary obligations rendered him incompetent, it would not follow that his declarations of such obligations, anterior to the trial, would or ought to have the same effect; for his notions of obligations may have undergone a change between the time of making such declarations and the trial, and at the time of the trial his mind might be free from all bias which such belief might be calculated to produce; besides, the establishment of such a principle would seem to lead to consequences subversive of justice in many cases, for the doctrine assumes, as has been well observed, the truth of unsworn statements, and enables an unwilling witness ad libitum to deprive a party of his testimony."

The contrary was held in Den v. Jones, 1 N. J. L. 56, and also in Colston v. Nicols, 1 Har. & J. (Md.) 105. But the latter case was expressly overruled in Stimmel v. Underwood, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 282.

If, after the examination on the voire dire, the witness is prima facie interested, the party calling him should satisfy the court that his competency is free from legal exception. If he fails to do so, he has no right to complain if the court excludes the witness. Story v. Saunders, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 665.

"The party objecting to a witness may examine him on his voire dire, or resort to other evidence to establish the objection; but after electing one of

It may be added that there is always a presumption in favor of the competency of a witness who is neither a party to the action nor the husband or wife of a party, and the burden of establishing the facts which render him incompetent rests on the party who makes the objection.¹

3. Competency a Question for the Court.—In trying the competency of a witness, the court is not only the judge of the law but also of the preliminary questions of fact necessary to be decided in order to determine the question of competency.² And this these courses he cannot resort to the other. Nor can the witness himself be received at the instance of the party offering him, to repel the objections, on the ground of interest established by other evidence." Lewis, J., in Anderson v. Young, 21 Pa. St. 447.

In Hiscox v. Hendree, 27 Ala. 221, Chilton, C. J., said: "It appears upon the face of the papers sued on that G. D. Hiscox is the indorser, through whom the plaintiff derives his title, and he is, prima facie, an interested witness. When interrogatories were filed by the plaintiff to take his deposition, the defendant's counsel promptly objected to his examination, on the ground of his interest, and examined him on cross-interrogatories, subject to that objection; and a notice was then filed that he should move to suppress the deposition, for that reason, on the hearing of the cause. The plaintiff then proceeded to propound a question to him to prove his interest, and that he was released. The witness testified to his interest formerly, but stated that the plaintiff had released him, and that he then had no interest. He produced what he called the release, which exempts him from all liability on two notes of $325 each, payable by J. Hendree, Selma, Alabama, six and twelve months after date. The interest of the witness appearing, and being duly presented by the objection on the part of the counsel for the defendant, the witness was no more competent to disprove his interest or to prove his release, than any other fact in the case. The case of Dent v. Portwood, 17 Ala. 242, shows very clearly that the court properly excluded the testimony."

In Fay v. Green, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 71, Boyce, J., said: "The court consider that the evidence of Lucinda Stone and her husband, William Stone, by which the defense was principally supported, was improperly admitted. The interest of these witnesses appears upon the mere statement of the case, and there was no evidence before the auditors to remove that interest but the testimony of the witnesses themselves. This was but the testimony of interested witnesses and should have been rejected. It is, therefore, the duty of the court to interfere and set aside the report and judgment produced by that evidence."

V. INCOMPETENCY REMOVED BY STATUTE—1. In Civil Cases.—The injustice and hardship which frequently resulted from the rigid enforcement of the common-law rules governing the competency of witnesses were long felt and deplored by eminent jurists and legal writers before legislatures could be induced to make any material changes in this branch of the law.² In England, the first considerable measure of relief came in the year 1833, when a statute was passed making competent, persons who were incompetent on the ground that the record might be used as evidence for or against them in a subsequent action, and providing that in the event of their examination their names should be indorsed on the record, which should not, thereafter, be used as evidence for or against them.³ Ten years later a much more sweeping change was effected by the enactment of the statute since known as Lord Denman's Act,⁴ which, with a few exceptions, rendered competent, persons who had theretofore been incapable of testifying on account of their interest in the event of the action.⁵ In 1846, it was enacted that all parties to actions, their wives, and all other persons, might be examined either on behalf of the plaintiff or defendant,⁶ and, by a series of amendments following this act, the common-law incompetency of parties and persons interested in the event of civil actions has been swept away; the former grounds of incompetency going now only to the credibility of the witness.⁷

So, too, in the United States, the common law has been superseded by statutes more consistent with reason and justice. In July, 1864, it was provided by act of Congress that in the courts

5. The persons whose competency was not restored by this act were as follows: First, any party to any suit, action or proceeding individually named in the record; second, any lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment; third, any tenant of the premises sought to be recovered in ejectment; fourth, the landlord or other person in whose right any defendant in replevin may make cognizance; fifth, any person in whose immediate and individual behalf any action may be brought or defended, either wholly or in part; sixth, the husband or wife of any such persons respectively. Of this act, Mr. Phillips remarks: "It may be truly said that of all the acts in our statute book, it contains in the smallest compass the greatest amount of good. It settles the law upon an intelligible, reasonable and satisfactory basis, puts an end to some of the most intricate perplexities of the law, and rejects a principle which was unsound in theory, and in practice often led to results most unfavorable to the due administration of justice."

of the United States no witness shall be excluded in any action on account of color, or in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried, provided that in actions by or against executors, administrators or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other or to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party or required to testify thereto by the court.¹ This act applies to the courts of the District of Columbia,² but does not apply to territorial courts, as they are not courts of the United States within the meaning of the statute.³ In the various states and territories, substantially similar statutes have been enacted which are too numerous to find a place in this article.⁴ These statutes control all trials which take place after they go into effect. Being laws which change the rules of evidence only, their retrospective operation does not affect the vested rights of litigants in such manner as to be open to constitutional objection.⁵ According to the weight of authority, the statutory removal of the disability of parties to testify in their own behalf does not, by implication, render husband and wife competent to testify for each other,⁶ though there is authority to the contrary,

Under the act approved February 14, 1867 (Pamph. Acts, p. 435), they were competent to testify at the trial. In this case, though the witness and guardian were incompetent to testify about the transactions mentioned in their evidence prior to the act of 1867, yet it is no violation of any legal or constitutional right of the appellants for the legislature to remove the disability then existing. Such an act is not an ex post facto law. It operates only as a removal of a present disability and does not affect any vested right of appellants or impair the obligation of any contract. It has been decided that a law is ex post facto which authorizes less evidence to convict on a criminal prosecution than was required by law at the time of the commission of the offense. But I know of no decision or principle of law which would exclude a witness from testifying, even in a criminal case, because he was incompetent from some disability existing at the commission of the offense, but which, before the trial, has been removed by law or by a pardon."

We believe that the true reason why a wife should not be allowed to testify either for or against her husband at based on the ground that the purpose and object of the statute were to remove all incompetency resulting from interest.¹

Under the act of Congress above referred to, it has been held that the term "civil action" includes suits in chancery as well as actions at law;² and also includes proceedings in admiralty and all other judicial controversies in which the rights of property are common law has always been a sort of compound reason, founded partly in interest, to be sure, and the identity of the persons, but partly also upon considerations of public policy, and that where the disqualification of interest has been removed by statute, as in this state, there still remains a good and sufficient objection to the husband or wife (not being the party to the suit) as a witness for as well as against the other who is the party. We think that considerations of public policy—the fear of sowing dissensions between man and wife and of occasioning perjury, which Starkie alludes to as the reasons why a wife may not testify against her husband, and vice versa—are equally satisfactory reasons why they should not be allowed to testify in each other's favor."

In Lucas v. Brooks, 18 Wall. (U. S.) 436, the court said: "The court refused to admit in evidence the deposition of Catharine Lucas, the wife of the defendant. That it is a rule of common law, a wife cannot be received as a witness for or against her husband, except in suits between them or in criminal cases where he is prosecuted for wrong done to her, is not controverted. But it is argued, because Congress has enacted that in civil actions in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried, the wife is competent to testify for her husband. Undoubtedly, the act of Congress has cut up by the roots all objections to the competency of a witness on account of interest. But the objection to a wife's testifying on behalf of her husband is not and never has been that she has any interest in the issue to which he is a party. It rests solely upon public policy. To that the statute has no application."

1. In Merriam v. Hartford, etc., R. Co., 20 Conn. 362; 52 Am. Dec. 344, the court said: "We are of opinion that by a just construction of the 141st section of the act for the regulation of civil actions (Stat. 86) the wife of the plaintiff was a competent witness in his behalf. It was the express object of that section to remove the common-law disqualification of persons as witnesses in all civil suits by reason of their having an interest in the event of the same. In legal contemplation, the husband and wife are one person. Their interests are, therefore, identical. This is the ground of their exclusion by the common law as witnesses for each other. The reason given by Blackstone why they are not to be admitted to be witnesses for each other is that it would contradict the maxim of law nemo in propria causa testis esse debet.

1 Bl. Com. 443. And Phillips says they cannot be witnesses for each other because their interests are absolutely the same. It is said, however, that the reason for this exclusion is not founded wholly upon their identity of interest, but partly on a principle of public policy which deems it necessary to guard the confidence of married life, and that the statute by its terms applies only to cases where the interest of the party was the sole ground of exclusion. This argument, however, entirely fails, because that reason applies only where the husband and wife are called to testify against each other. And in such cases, we admit that it has very great weight. But were it otherwise, we think that this would be too narrow a view of the statute and of the intention of the legislature in making it. Its language is substantially like that of the statute making all interested persons competent as witnesses in the action of book debt, and its object, although broader, is the same. The latter statute has been in existence since the earliest settlement of the state. Under it, the wife in that action has always been admitted as a witness for the husband, and this construction of that law was sanctioned by the case of Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day (Conn.) 37; 3 Am. Dec. 255. The law now in question should receive a similar construction. Compare Lucas v. State, 23 Conn. 19; Fortune v. Buck, 23 Conn. 2.

involved, though the government be a party thereto; the term being used in contradistinction to criminal proceedings.¹

2. In Criminal Cases—a. IN GENERAL.—A statute rendering parties to civil actions competent witnesses in their own behalf does not, by implication, make defendants in criminal prosecutions competent.² So, also, a statute permitting defendants to testify in prosecutions for misdemeanors, does not open the door to the testimony of persons prosecuted for crimes of a higher degree.³ Nor do the enabling acts in the several states apply to prosecutions in the federal courts for crimes against the United States. It is only in civil actions or proceedings that the laws of evidence of the states are applied by the federal courts sitting therein.⁴

It is provided by act of Congress that "in the trial of all indictments, informations, complaints and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offenses and misdemeanors in the United States courts, territorial courts, and courts-martial and courts of inquiry in any state or territory, including the District of Columbia, the person so charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness, and his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him."⁵ Under this statute it has been held that the competency of the defendant is to be determined by the same rules as in the case of other witnesses. Therefore, where it appeared that the defendant had previously been under sentence of conviction for the commission of a crime which rendered him legally infamous, the court refused to permit him to testify in his own behalf.¹ But under similar statutes, it is held in the state courts that the prisoner may testify notwithstanding he has previously been convicted of an infamous crime and served his time in the state prison without receiving a pardon.²

In U. S. v. Hawthorne, 1 Dill. (U. S.) 422, the court said: "Crimes against the United States are wholly withdrawn from the domain of state legislation. They are created solely by Congress, and Congress has provided for their prosecution and the mode of procedure. Under section 34 of the Judiciary Act as construed by the supreme court (U. S. v. Reid, 12 How. (U. S.) 361), and under the act of July 6, 1862 (12 Stat. at L. 588), and of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 351), it is clear that the right of a defendant, in a criminal case, to testify in his own favor, does not exist. On the contrary, the language used manifests an evident intention on the part of Congress to exclude such evidence."

1. In U. S. v. Hollis, 43 Fed. Rep. 248, Simonton, J., said: "The act of 16th of March, 1878 (20 Stat. at L. 30), provides that a defendant charged with crime shall at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness; that is to say, he shall not labor under disability because he is a party in interest, and, notwithstanding this, may testify. But when a party offers himself as a witness in his own behalf, he must be treated as any other witness and is subject to any exception which would apply to any other witness; in other words, the act frees him from a disability. It does not confer on him any peculiar exemption. So when a defendant is put on the stand as a witness, his general character for truth may be attacked, and if he, by his conduct, has lost the privilege of testifying in courts of justice, by the commission of an infamous crime, this will attach to him and prevent him from testifying in his own behalf."

2. Morgan v. State, 86 Tenn. 472. In Delamater v. People, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 333, the court said: "The Revised Statutes provide that no person sentenced upon a conviction for felony shall be competent to testify in any cause, matter or proceeding, civil or criminal, unless he be pardoned by the governor or by the legislature, except in the cases specially provided by law." And after quoting the statute which renders prisoners on trial for criminal offenses competent witnesses in their own behalf, the court continued: "This statute is broad and comprehensive in its terms, and its phraseology embraces any person charged with the commission of a criminal offense, which includes those who are disqualified by the provision of the Revised Statutes before referred to, as well as all others on trial who may request to be examined as witnesses. It makes another exception in favor of the criminal, from the effect of the disqualification which the Revised Statutes imposed. It specially provides for an examination in all cases of trial by indictment, etc., against persons charged with any criminal offense, and its manifest intention was that the person thus charged, no matter how infamous or to what extent branded by a judgment of conviction, should be permitted to testify and to speak on his own behalf. We think that the legislature intended to remove all disabilities in such cases and to permit the alleged offender to present such a statement as he could make on his own behalf, and in exoneration of the crime with the commission of which he was charged. If he had been convicted previously of a felony, of course it might seriously detract from the truthfulness of his story before the court and jury, but the credit to which he would be entitled under such circumstances was a matter affecting the credibility of the witness and not the right to be sworn as such. So long as criminals are permitted to testify, no evil could result from extending the privilege to all who might be charged with crime, and the scope and object of the act evidently was to open wide the door to all this class of persons who might desire to avail themselves of the privilege or the right which it conferred. Since the adoption of the Code of Procedure in this state, great innovations have been made upon the rules of the common law in regard to the admission of parties as witnesses. And in conformity with this progressive spirit, the act of 1869, which admits a felon to testify, on a trial for his life or liberty, on his own behalf, was adopted. It was designed to remove all disabilities in such cases, and it would be doing violence to its plain import and intention to circumscribe or restrict its operation."

Again, in Newman v. People, 6 Lans. (N. Y.) 460, more fully reported in 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 630, the court said: "On the trial of this case in the court of general sessions, the prisoner was put on the stand and examined as a witness in his own behalf, under the provisions of act of May 7, 1869, Laws of 1869, ch. 678, which provides that a party accused of crime shall, at his own request, and not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness in his own behalf. He was examined at

In nearly all American jurisdictions, the prisoner is now permitted to take the stand and testify in his own behalf if he choose to do so, though he is nowhere compelled to do so. In a few states, however, he has only the privilege of going upon the witness stand and making a statement to the court and jury which, though not technically evidence, is, nevertheless, in the nature of evidence and is to be considered by the jury and given such weight as, in their judgment, it merits.¹ When the defendant takes the witness stand in his own behalf, he has the right to make any statement he can in explanation or mitigation of the offense with which he stands charged, and it is reversible error to refuse him the privilege of doing so.² One of the most valuable features of these statutes is that innocent parties may frequently break the chain of circumstantial evidence with which they are fettered by an ingenious prosecution, by giving a rational and reasonable account of their acts and motives. It is, therefore, error to exclude a defendant's testimony concerning his motives in doing a particular act in cases where the question of intent is material.³

length by the counsel for the prisoner and by the district attorney. On the cross-examination, he was asked if he had been in the state prison. He said he had and served out his term. On this proof, the district attorney asked the court to charge the jury to disregard his testimony, on the ground that having served as a felon, being civilly dead in law, he was not competent as a witness. The court instructed the jury to wholly disregard the testimony of the prisoner. We think this was an error. The law intended to allow a prisoner the benefit and privilege of stating to the jury any matter which was calculated to explain the charge against him. This privilege was to be enjoyed irrespective of any matter which could disqualify a witness under ordinary circumstances. The degree of credit to which he was entitled was to be decided by the jury, and not the court. And yet the court refused him the privilege given to him by the law, because he was not worthy of belief."

In People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 583, the court, after reviewing the old law and changes therein made by statute, said: "The object of the recent changes, as we conceive, was not merely to enable parties to disclose facts wholly within their own knowledge, but to do in addition what theretofore had been impossible, explain their acts and the motives with which they were performed, and to explain, if need be, what they meant, or intended to be understood as meaning, by what they may have said in regard to any material fact. It is presumed that there are but few members of the legal profession who have not, at one time or another, felt the harshness, if not the injustice, of the rule which excluded parties from the witness stand and closed the door to explanations which otherwise could have been made and would have given a very different color to the transaction. Actions and words are liable to misconstruction, as all human experience proves. Actions apparently suspicious become innocent when the

on, the defendant may state to the jury whether, at the moment of the killing, he did or did not believe that he was in danger of losing his own life, or of receiving great bodily harm.¹ And where the offense charged is assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, the prisoner may state for what purpose the weapon was in his possession at the time of the commission of the alleged offense.² So, also, in a prosecution for criminal libel, where the defense is that the statements in the alleged libelous publication motive with which they were performed is understood; words are of a very different import when spoken in earnest and when spoken in jest, when imperfectly understood and when fully explained. If, under the new rule, parties are to be kept in harness and not allowed to explain their actions and words when they admit of explanation and when explanation is needed in order to exhibit the whole truth, but half the evil which was felt under the old rule has been removed. It is no answer to say that this enables a party to substitute a false motive for the true one or to convert words spoken in one sense into another. If the argument proves anything, it proves too much, and shows that the radical change which has been made is, in all respects, founded in folly rather than wisdom. For the truthfulness of parties when upon the witness stand, we must depend, as in the case of other witnesses, upon the obligations of their oath and their reputation for truth and veracity. If these can be relied upon for the truth of statements made in reference to acts and words of which the eye and ear may take notice, they may, for the same reason, be accepted as guaranties for the truth of statements made in respect to motives and intents of which the mind or inner man alone can take cognizance. Nor is there, in our judgment, any well grounded reason for apprehending that this rule will obstruct rather than advance the ends of justice. There is no more danger of imposing upon the jury falsehood or pretense in respect to motives and intents than there is of doing the like in respect to visible or external circumstances. The jury can as readily distinguish between the false and true in respect to the former as the latter. If the motive or intent assigned is inconsistent with the external circumstances, it must be discarded as false. If, on the contrary, they are consistent, there is no reason why they may not be true."

In Alabama, a different rule obtains. In Stewart v. State, 78 Ala. 436, the court said: "It is well settled in this state, whatever the rule may be elsewhere, that witnesses are not permitted to testify to their motive, belief, intention, or state of mind, when secret and uncommunicated. Such mental status, when relevant, is a matter of inference to be determined by the jury from the facts in evidence, both in civil and criminal cases." Citing McCormick v. Joseph, 77 Ala. 236; Burke v. State, 71 Ala. 383.

1. State v. Harrington, 12 Nev. 125.

2. In Kerrains v. People, 60 N. Y. 228; 19 Am. Rep. 158, Church, C. J., said: "It appears that the prisoner was absent at work when the prosecutor went with his men to the house to remove the furniture, etc., but soon returned and went to the woodhouse and came back with the ax in his hand with which afterward the blow was inflicted. When the prisoner was upon the stand as a witness, his counsel asked him the question, 'What was your intention in taking the ax from the shed to the house?' to which there was an objection which was sustained, and an exception taken. The general term sustained this ruling upon the ground that it was too remote, and that the prisoner could only speak as to his intent at the time of striking the blow. I cannot concur with this view as applied to the question involved. The intent to kill was indispensable to be established by the prosecution. It constituted the vital element of the offense, and, although it is true that the time when that intent must exist was when the blow was struck, yet it was competent for the defendant to testify to any fact tending to disprove such intent. It is a fact to be established, and, of course, may be repelled. The prisoner having inflicted the injury with the ax, his previously going to the shed after it was a circumstance bearing upon his intent in striking the blow, and from are true, the defendant's interpretation of the publication is material and admissible in evidence on the question of actual malice.¹

b. EXAMINATION OF THE DEFENDANT—(1) Direct Examination.—When a defendant takes the stand as a witness in his own behalf, he has the right to the advantage of being interrogated by his counsel, as in the case of other witnesses² and the same rules which an inference that he procured it for that purpose might be claimed to result. It was a legitimate circumstance to prove the fact of intent. If his taking the ax was not for that purpose, but for an innocent purpose, while it would not conclusively disprove the intent at the time of striking the blow, it would tend to destroy a material circumstance bearing upon that question against him. If he could disprove the intent at the time of the act by a general denial, it follows that he might disprove any fact tending to establish it. His going to the shed for the ax would be immaterial, except for the purpose of showing that he brought it to be used as it was used, and if that purpose is disproved it renders the circumstance of no moment." Compare Burdick v. People, 58 Barb. (N. Y.) 51.

In State v. Montgomery, 65 Iowa 486, it was held that the defendant might not testify as to his purpose in putting a revolver into his pocket before he left home, the assault having been made some time afterward. The court said: "The defendant testified that he had no intention of using the revolver to assail the prosecuting witness, unless it became necessary. He was then asked what intention he had in taking the revolver with him other than to defend himself. He was not permitted to answer the question. We think the court ruled rightly in rejecting the evidence. Whatever may have been defendant's intentions in arming himself, if they did not relate to the assault they were irrelevant. If the defendant had the weapon in his hand for a proper and innocent purpose, this would not excuse him in pointing it in a threatening manner at the prosecuting witness."

In Bolen v. State, 26 Ohio St. 371, it was held that it was not error to refuse to permit the prisoner to testify with what intent he made the assault charged, unless it were shown that the expected answer was material and that the defendant was prejudiced by such refusal. The court said: "This was an indictment for assault with intent to murder.

The prisoner offered himself as a witness in his own behalf, and on his examination was asked by his counsel to state with what intent he made the assault in question. On objection by the prosecuting attorney, the court held the question to be incompetent and refused to permit it to be answered by the prisoner. But the record does not show what answer to this question was expected by the defense, or that the prisoner was prejudiced by excluding the evidence. The case falls within the principle established in Gandolfo v. State, 11 Ohio St. 114; Hollister v. Reznor, 9 Ohio St. 6, and Scovern v. State, 6 Ohio St. 294. There is no error shown to the prejudice of the prisoner."

1. In Com. v. Damon, 136 Mass. 449, the court said: "The questions put to the defendant, who offered himself as a witness, if put to any other witness might, perhaps, be held incompetent as calling for an opinion upon the character of articles published in a newspaper, when, so far as appears, the articles themselves could be obtained and were the best evidence of what they contained. But the intention or state of mind of the defendant towards Hart, in making the publication with which he was charged, was material; and for this purpose his opinion or understanding of the articles published by him in his newspaper as friendly or unfriendly towards Hart, would be relevant upon the question of good or ill will towards Hart with which he made the publication."

2. In Clark v. State, 50 Ind. 514, it appeared that the trial court denied the prisoner the right of being interrogated by his counsel. The court said: "On the trial of the cause, the defendant went upon the witness stand to testify in his own behalf, and, after answering a few preliminary questions asked by his counsel, was interrupted by the judge and instructed to give a general statement of the whole affair; the judge stating that he would not permit the witness to be questioned by his attorneys. The counsel for the

(2) Cross-Examination.—In view of the fact that it is provided by the constitution of the United States, and by the constitutions of the states, that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to give evidence against himself, the question frequently arises as to what is the constitutional limit of the cross-examination of the prisoner by counsel for the prosecution.² It may be stated as a general rule that when the accused takes the stand in his own behalf, he voluntarily changes his status from that of defendant to that of a witness, and is subject to examination and cross-examination within the limits of the rules governing the examination of other witnesses, consequently he waives his privilege of refusing to give evidence against himself concerning all matters touched upon in his direct examination, and upon such other matters as are so related to his direct testimony as to bring them within the scope of proper cross-examination of witnesses generally.³ The extent, however, to which cross-examination may be permitted is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and appellate courts will rarely disturb a verdict on this ground unless there has been a manifest abuse of discretion.⁴

Where the accused, on his direct examination, has undertaken to give a full account of his doings during a certain period of time, prisoner then inquired of the court if that would exclude them from asking such questions of the defendant as might be necessary to bring out any important points which he might omit to state, to which the court replied that he could not permit the attorneys for the defendant to ask the defendant any questions. Thereupon, the prisoner left the stand and did not further testify. Exception was taken, and this was one of the causes stated in the motion for a new trial. The state has not furnished us any brief, and we cannot imagine on what ground this ruling was made. By the statute the defendant is allowed, at his option, to testify in his own behalf. Acts 1873, p. 228. We think he must be allowed to testify as other witnesses, and that his counsel should be allowed to interrogate him as in case of other witnesses." *Citing Fletcher v. he may be cross-examined as to any of his acts done within such period, though they have not been inquired of on the direct examination. In such case the true scope of the direct examination within the meaning of the rule is the prisoner's whole conduct between the two points of time designated, so far as it is pertinent to the issue.¹

as it respected the evidence of both Scallon and Genet. In both cases, it was searching and severe, and extended over a wide area of subjects and circumstances, and is claimed to have wandered far away from the precise issues involved, and to have seriously and unjustly prejudiced the case of the defendant. Our control over such an alleged error is not absolute. As a general rule, the range and extent of such an examination is within the discretion of the trial judge, subject, however, to the limitation that it must relate to matters pertinent to the issue or to specific facts which tend to discredit the witness or impeach his moral character. People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 571; 28 Am. Rep. 183; Ryan v. People, 79 N. Y. 594; People v. Crapo, 76 N. Y. 290; 32 Am. Rep. 302. People*, 34 N. Y. 230; People v. Casey, 72 N. Y. 393. Our only inquiry, therefore, in the present case, is whether the cross-examinations, especially of Genet, went beyond the prescribed limit, or, if not, were pushed so far as to amount to an abuse of discretion." To the same effect are Hanoff v. State, 37 Ohio St. 178; 41 Am. Rep. 496; Wroe v. State, 20 Ohio St. 460; People v. Tice, 131 N. Y. 651.

1. In People v. Russell, 46 Cal. 123, the court said: "On the trial the defendant testified as a witness on his own behalf, and on his examination in chief stated that he left the saloon, where the homicide subsequently occurred, about six o'clock in the evening, and returned about nine o'clock, when the killing took place. He also detailed what he did and how he was occupied during the interval between the time when he left and when he returned to the saloon; but no reference was made to the time or manner of procuring the pistol with which the homicide was committed. On his cross-examination he was asked where he got the pistol, and the question was objected to as not pertinent to anything brought out on the examination in chief; but the court overruled the objection, and the witness answered, 'I cannot say where I did get it.' This ruling was excepted to and is assigned as error. It further appears that in his argument to the jury the district attorney commented on the fact that the defendant failed to remember where he got the pistol, as a circumstance tending to impeach his credibility. But we think there was no error in the ruling of the court. The inquiry made in the first instance of the prisoner, as to where he got the pistol, may well be considered as limited to something occurring between the time of his departure from the saloon and his subsequent return to it. The ground upon which the objection was overruled, that the matter inquired of was part of the res gestæ, was in effect a determination by the court that the inquiry was to be confined to the period of time covered by the evidence in chief. It is apparent that the court would have so instructed the witness had it been called upon to do so by the counsel for the defense. The subsequent and more specific questions as to how the pistol was obtained, each refer to some place which the witness had already, upon his examination in chief, represented that he visited between the time of his first struggle with the deceased in the saloon and his subsequent return to the same place. On his cross-examination, it was certainly competent to inquire of the witness concerning any matter which was embraced in his examination in chief. The witness, undertaking in his own behalf to state all that had transpired within two given points of time, may be properly asked on cross-examination if he has omitted anything pertinent to the case, and his attention may be directed to the precise point of inquiry by asking him if some specified thing did not occur during the interval, as, for instance, whether or not he had procured a pistol." Compare People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466.

There is eminent authority to the effect that the accused may, in his direct examination, stop at any point he chooses, and that his constitutional privilege protects him from cross-examination on any point not touched upon in his examination in chief.¹ And in a number of jurisdictions, it has been provided by statute, or settled by judicial determination, that the cross-examination of the accused shall be confined to the matters concerning which he testified in his direct examination.²

In Boyle v. State, 105 Ind. 475; 55 Am. Rep. 218, the court said: "The cross-examination of a witness must be confined to the subject opened by direct examination. This settled rule does not, however, restrict the cross-examination to the specific facts developed by the direct examination, but does confine it to the subject of that examination. Where a subject is opened by the direct examination, the cross-examining counsel may go fully into the details of the subject, and is not confined to the particular part of it embraced within the questions asked upon the direct examination. A subject cannot be so partitioned by a direct examination as to cut down the cross-examination to the specific matters developed by the questions of the counsel who conducts the examination in chief, for, once a subject is entered upon, it is opened to a full and detailed investigation on cross-examination. Bessette v. State, 101 Ind. 85; Wachstetter v. State, 99 Ind. 290; 50 Am. Rep. 94; Hyland v. Milner, 99 Ind. 308; De Haven v. De Haven, 77 Ind. 236. In this instance, the accused, when on the witness stand, had given an account of his movements upon a day named, and it was proper to go fully into the subject upon cross-examination, and the state was not confined to the particular period of time designated in the questions asked on direct examination."

1. Judge Cooley says: "If he does testify, he is at liberty to stop at any point he chooses, and it must be left to the jury to give a statement which he declines to make a full one such weight as under the circumstances they think it entitled to, otherwise the statute must have set aside and overruled the constitutional maxim which protects an accused party against being compelled to testify against himself, and the statutory privilege becomes a snare and a danger." But if the defendant be cross-examined as to trivial and unimportant matters which were not embraced in his direct testimony, it is harmless error and affords no ground for reversing the judgment. State v. Beaucleigh, 92 Mo. 490.

In State v. Brooks, 92 Mo. 581, the court said: "It is provided by statute (Rev. Stats., § 1918), when a defendant in a criminal case offers himself as a witness, that he shall be liable to cross-examination as to any matter referred to in his examination in chief and may be contradicted and impeached as any other witness. In the case of State v. Palmer, 88 Mo. 568, it is held that, while a defendant can only be cross-examined as to the matters referred to in his examination in chief, the same rules and tests, with that exception, applicable to the contradiction and impeachment of other witnesses, also apply to him. And in the case of State v. Beaucleigh, 92 Mo. 490, it is held that even though a defendant may be cross-examined as to a matter not referred to in his examination in chief, if such cross-examination relates to matters of no importance and which could not affect the verdict, such error affords no ground for reversing the judgment. Guided by these rules, we have reached the conclusion that they have not been violated in the cross-examination of the defendant, inasmuch as he had either

In some jurisdictions, the defendant's cross-examination is not confined to matters inquired of in his direct examination. Where this rule obtains, it is held that the defendant, by taking the witness stand and testifying in his own behalf, completely waives his constitutional privilege of refusing to give evidence against himself and that he may be cross-examined concerning any matter pertinent to the issue on trial, regardless of the extent of the direct examination.¹

referred to the matter inquired about in his examination in chief, or the matter inquired about was contradictory of what he had stated in his examination in chief, or the matter inquired about was trivial and unimportant and having no prejudicial bearing on the case."

The California cases heretofore cited give the common-law rule as it existed in that state. This rule has been somewhat modified by section 1323 of the Penal Code, for the construction of which, see People v. Johnson, 57 Cal. 571; People v. Beck, 58 Cal. 212; People v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 602; People v. Brown, 76 Cal. 573; People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84; People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 475; People v. Mullings, 83 Cal. 138.

In People v. Crowley, 100 Cal. 481, the court said: "The proper construction of section 1323, as it now stands, has not been definitely settled. In People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84, there is some general language in the opinion of the majority of the court to the effect that the same rule applies to a defendant as to other witnesses, but that language is immediately qualified in the next sentence. The only thing decided there was that, after a defendant, as a witness, had denied in general terms that he aided, abetted, counseled or encouraged the commission of the offense charged, he might be asked on cross-examination if he had written a certain letter showing that he had so aided, etc. Of the cases cited in the opinion, People v. McGungill, 41 Cal. 431; People v. Dennis, 39 Cal. 634; People v. Reinhart, 39 Cal. 449, and People v. Russell, 46 Cal. 121, were all decided before section 1323 was enacted, and, therefore, afford no aid in its construction. In People v. Beck, 58 Cal. 212, there was no question as to the cross-examination of a defendant; the only thing there decided being that he could be impeached as a witness by showing his bad character for truth. People v.

Johnson, 57 Cal. 571, which will be noticed hereafter, is in point as to one phase of the question. We have been referred to no case, decided since the present condition of the statutory law on the subject, which holds that the cross-examination of a defendant may be as wide as that of any other witness. On the other hand, in People v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 602, Morrison, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, after quoting section 1323 as it now stands, says of a defendant in a criminal action, that when he is called on his own behalf and examined respecting a particular fact or matter in the case, the right of cross-examination is confined to the fact or matter testified to on the examination in chief, and that such is the express language of the statute. It is not correct to say that section 1323 merely states the common-law rule as to the cross-examination of witnesses generally, for witnesses, under the general rule, can, for various purposes, be asked concerning matters about which they had not been examined in chief. 2 Phil. Ev., p. 895 et seq. And in People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, the court say that, so far as the defendant is concerned, the court is not allowed that discretion as to the extent of the scope of the cross-examination which it is permitted to exercise in the examination of the other witnesses."

In People v. Wong Ah Leong, 99 Cal. 440, the defendant took the stand and testified as to what happened at the time of the assault for which he was on trial and to his arrest therefor. It was held that he should not be cross-examined as to what occurred after his arrest.

In Com. v. Nichols, 114 Mass. 287; 19 Am. Rep. 346, the court said: "The 12th article of the declaration of rights prefixed to the constitution of the commonwealth declares that no subject shall be compelled to answer or furnish evidence against himself. The recent statutes allowing a person accused of crime to testify upon his trial, which he could not do at common law, provide, in order to secure this constitutional privilege, that he shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness, and that his neglect or refusal to testify shall not create any presumption against him. Stats. 1866, ch. 260; 1870, ch. 393, § 1, cl. 3. The object of these statutes is not to protect or assist criminals, but to promote the discovery of truth so far as can be done without infringing the constitutional rights of the subject. If the accused chooses not to be a witness, he cannot be compelled to testify, and no inference prejudicial to him is to be drawn from his silence. Com. v. Harlow, 110 Mass. 411. But if he puts himself on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, and testifies that he did not commit the crime imputed to him, he thereby waives his constitutional privilege and renders himself liable to be cross-examined upon all facts relevant and material to that issue, and cannot refuse to testify to any facts which would be competent evidence in the case if proved by other witnesses."

In State v. Wentworth, 65 Me. 240; 20 Am. Rep. 688, the court said: "The defendant might go on the stand as a witness or not. By the constitution he could not be compelled to furnish or give evidence against himself. The privilege of exemption from criminative interrogation or cross-interrogation was guaranteed to him, but this privilege may be waived. By Rev. Stats., ch. 134, § 19, in all criminal trials the accused shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness. The defendant, at his own request, became a competent witness, and thereby waived his constitutional privilege. He then subjected himself to the peril consequent upon a cross-examination as to all matters pertinent to the issue. State v. Ober, 52 N. H. 459; 13 Am. Rep. 88; Com. v. Bonner, 97 Mass. 587; Com. v. Morgan, 107 Mass. 199; Connors v. People, 50 N. Y. 240. Claiming to be a witness in his own behalf at his own request, he cannot have the privilege of self-exonerative testimony without incurring the dangers incident to discreditive or criminative cross-interrogation."

In Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 235, the court said: "It is also objected that the cross-examination of those of the defendants who took the stand compelled them to give evidence against themselves. After a careful examination of the testimony of these defendants as set out in the record, we cannot see that they were cross-examined upon any subject not connected with the direct examination. If a defendant offers himself as a witness to disprove a criminal charge, he cannot excuse himself from answering on the ground that by so doing he may criminate himself."

In New York, the rule, as stated by the court, is that an accused person who becomes a witness in his own behalf, thereby places himself in the attitude of any other witness in respect to the right of cross-examination, and, according to the court's own construction of the rule, the extent of such examination is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial judge, subject to the limitation that it must relate to matters pertinent to the issue, or to matters which tend to impair the credibility of the witness. Brandon v. People, 42 N. Y. 265; Connors v. People, 50 N. Y. 240; Stover v. People, 56 N. Y. 315; People v. Casey, 72 N. Y. 394; People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 571; 28 Am. Rep. 183; People v. Crapo, 76 N. The case last above cited approves Com. v. Mullen, 97 Mass. 545; State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531; State v. Ober, 52 N. H. 459; 13 Am. Rep. 88, and declares the rule laid down by Judge Cooley to be out of harmony with the decisions of that state and unsound upon principle.

(3) Impeachment of the Witness.—The prisoner's general character may not be attacked by the prosecution unless he first opens the line of inquiry by giving evidence of good character.² When, however, the defendant becomes a witness in his own behalf, he thereby puts in issue his reputation for truth and veracity and is subject to impeachment the same as any other witness.³

The accused should not be compelled, on cross-examination, to admit that he has committed other crimes. Saylor v. Com. (Ky. 1895), 30 S. W. Rep. 390.

In State v. White, 19 Kan. 446; 27 Am. Rep. 137, the court said: "The statute provides that an attorney shall be incompetent to testify concerning communications made to him by his client in that relation, or his advice thereon, without the client's consent. This statute would be of no utility or benefit if the client could be compelled against his consent to make such disclosures. It would be absurd to protect by legislative enactment professional communications, and to leave them unprotected at the examination of the client. In such an event in all civil actions the confidential statements of client and counsel would be exposed, and likewise the same would occur in all criminal actions where the defendant should testify. The authorities are otherwise. The true view seems to be that communications which the lawyer is precluded from disclosing, the client cannot be compelled to disclose. This privilege is essential to public justice, for, did it not exist, no man would dare to consult a professional adviser with a view to his defense or to the enforcement of his rights."

But in Woburn v. Henshaw, 101 Mass. 193; 3 Am. Rep. 333, a civil case, it was held that a party who takes the stand in his own behalf may be cross-examined in relation to communications between himself and his counsel. And there is a dictum in Com. v. Nichols, 114 Mass. 286; 19 Am. Rep. 346, to the effect that the same rule applies to the defendant in a criminal prosecution.

The general rule is that a party to a civil action may not be cross-examined concerning his consultations with his

In Burdick v. People, 58 Barb. (N. Y.) 58, the court said: "While the common law, in its humanity and high regard for the rights of life and liberty, gives every person on trial for crime the benefit of the presumption of previous good character, and does not in the first instance allow an inquiry into his previous character, yet, if the prisoner himself brings his character into question on the trial and undertakes to show as matter of fact that his previous

The proper limit to the inquiry into the defendant's general reputation, for the purpose of discrediting his testimony, is a matter upon which the authorities are not in harmony.¹ In some jurisdictions, his general moral character is subject to attack.² It is, however, difficult to conceive of any good reason why the defendant who avails himself of the statutory privilege of being a witness for himself should thus be compelled to run the gauntlet of his whole life, and have dragged to light every immorality, vice or crime of which he may have been guilty, or suspected of being guilty. As the result of such a rule a defendant who is so unfortunate as to have a bad reputation may be convicted on evidence a large part of which is entirely irrelevant to the main character has been good, the people may then attack it in reply and show, if they can, that it has been bad. Whenever the prisoner on trial puts his general character in issue by his own act, he takes the risk of its being proved bad and of every presumption which such proof legitimately raises against him. And so, where a prisoner upon trial on an indictment for a felony avails himself of the privilege granted by the recent statute of testifying as a witness in his own favor, he necessarily puts his general character and credibility as a witness in issue and makes it the proper subject of evidence on that question. When he makes himself a witness, he becomes subject to all the rules applicable to other witnesses, notwithstanding his other character of a party on trial for felony. The statute which allows a prisoner upon trial for crime to become a witness in his own behalf at his own election, does not protect him from being impeached the same as any other witness. If it did it would be most dangerous and pernicious in its tendency, opening a ready and inviting door to the escape of everyone charged with the commission of crime. It is not for the courts to question the policy of this statute, but only to see that it is fairly interpreted and faithfully administered. We cannot fail to see, however, that it must and will inevitably tend to make the previous character of the accused on trial a subject of inquiry and evidence much more than formerly and more in accordance with the rule and practice of the civil than of the common law. The temptation to the accused to become a witness in his own behalf, in order to ward off inculpatory testimony or to mitigate its force, must almost always be very great if not absolutely irresistible, and his becoming a witness must necessarily bring his previous character in question as a witness if not as a party. If he is so unfortunate as to have a bad character, even as a witness, it will be exceedingly difficult to prevent its telling against him in the scale as a party, in the minds of the jury, notwithstanding the most careful caution by the court that it is not to be regarded as evidence in chief."

issue upon trial. Upon principle, the inquiry should be confined to such matters as fairly tend to impair the defendant's credibility as a witness.¹

Conviction of an infamous crime was an absolute disqualification at common law, and it is generally provided by the statutes removing this disability that such conviction may be proved and left to the consideration of the jury in determining the credibility of the witness.² It is accordingly proper, on the cross-examination of the defendant in a criminal case, to ask him if he has ever been in prison or convicted of a crime, unless it is objected that the record is the best evidence.³ It is also permissible to cross-examine the

In Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 157, the foundation principles seem to be fairly stated. The court said: "With many, telling the truth is a habit and a principle which they adhere to always, though they may indulge in drinking, swearing, gambling, roystering, or making close bargains. With others, lying is the habit or principle, and if elevated to be senators or legislators, or made church members or deacons, it does not always reform them. The object of the law is to show the character of the witness as to telling the truth. General reputation in the community where he is known is the test and the only test which the law allows as to character. If a man is a common liar, he is not to be believed when under oath."

In U. S. v. Vansickle, 2 McLean (U. S.) 219, the court said: "The witness must be impeached, not by proving particular facts, for these he is not supposed to be prepared to meet, but by showing his general character in the public estimation. Facts are not to be proved from which the jury may infer a bad character, but it is the inference drawn by the public which is evidence. An inference already drawn and embodied in the public opinion and which as a fact is susceptible of proof. Now what is the fact thus to be proved? Is it as to the bad character of the witness generally, or his bad character as to veracity? The object of the examination would seem to be a sufficient answer to this inquiry. It is to shake and overthrow the credit of the witness. Now this is effectually done by showing that in the neighborhood in which he lives, and where his character is best known, he is not considered worthy of credit. Shall a public opinion which does not reach his credibility be proved as a fact from which the jury may infer a want of credibility? This would be an inference from public opinion which had not been drawn by the public. And would it not be a most dangerous species of evidence? It would be a conclusion inferred not from original facts but from an opinion formed on those facts by the public. It would be an inference on an inference. This would be a new rule not yet incorporated, it is believed, into the law of evidence."

4. People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 571; 28 Am. Dec. 183; State v. Huff, 11 Nev. 26.

In People v. Crapo, 76 N. Y. 288; 32 Am. Rep. 302, the prisoner was on trial for breaking into an outbuilding and stealing wheat. The prosecuting attorney was permitted to ask the defendant if he had been arrested for wanting, however, that such questions are permissible in the face of other forms of objection.¹

In the absence of statutory restriction, a defendant may be cross-examined concerning any material fact, or a previous statement of his own which is inconsistent with his testimony at the trial, for the purpose of laying a foundation for impeaching him bigamy, and the defendant was compelled to answer over his objection. This was held error on the ground that the matter inquired of did not tend to discredit the witness. The court said: "It did not legitimately tend to impair the credibility of the prisoner as a witness and was not competent for any purpose. The discretion which courts possess to permit questions of particular acts to be put to witnesses, for the purpose of impairing credibility, should be exercised with great caution when an accused person is a witness on his own trial. He goes upon the stand under a cloud; he stands charged with a criminal offense not only, but is under the strongest possible temptation to give evidence favorable to himself. His evidence is, therefore, looked upon with suspicion and distrust, and if, in addition to this, he may be subjected to a cross-examination upon every incident of his life and every charge of vice or crime which may have been made against him, and which have no bearing upon the charge for which he is being tried, he may be so prejudiced in the minds of the jury as frequently to induce them to convict upon evidence which otherwise would be deemed insufficient. It is not legitimate to bolster up a weak case by probabilities based upon other transactions. An accused person is required to meet the specific charge made against him and is not called upon to defend himself against every act of his life. Neither in Brandon v. People, 42 N. Y. 265, nor in People v. Connors, 50 N. Y. 240, was the point of relevancy upon the question of credibility presented. In each case, the ground of objection was specific and did not involve that point."

In People v. McCauley, 45 Cal. 146, the objection was that an arrest for a former offense did not prove the prisoner guilty of the offense for which she was then being tried, and the court overruled the objection made on this ground. This decision was affirmed by the supreme court, saying: "The nature of the objection taken does not present the question of the latitude allowed in cross-examination of a witness, in order to show the degree of credit to which such a witness is entitled, and it is not necessary to consider that point here." But when the question did come before the court, upon the objection that it did not tend to discredit the witness, it was held that the objection should be sustained. People v. Elster (Cal. 1884), 3 Pac. Rep. 888.

In People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 103, the court said: "In the case at bar, there was no effort whatever made to show that the defendant, the witness, had ever been convicted of a felony. The object of the questions seems to have been to make evident that on divers occasions he had been arrested for shooting at individuals. There the effort to discredit him stopped. The effect of this may have been to create a prejudice in the minds of the jury against the defendant, as a man ready with a pistol to shoot at those who had incurred his displeasure. Hence, to allow the questions to be asked and to compel their answer was error prejudicial to the defendant."

Hanoff v. State, 37 Ohio St. 178; 41 Am. Rep. 496, appears to be an authority to the contrary, though it does not appear upon what ground the objection to the question in that case was based. See also State v. Bacon, 13 Oregon 143; 57 Am. Rep. 8.

And in Taylor v. Com. (Ky. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 852, the witness voluntarily said to the jury that he was a peaceable man and did not intend to shoot the prosecuting witness, whereupon the prosecuting attorney asked him if he had not had similar difficulties with a number of his neighbors. This, the court said, was not proper cross-examination; but refused to reverse the judgment as he had put his own character as a peaceable and inoffensive man in issue. See also State v. Merriman, 34 S. Car. 16.

by giving proof of such fact or statement.¹ But here the rule is the same as in the impeachment of other witnesses, and the prosecution is bound by his answer to any question which is not material to the issue on trial and will not be permitted to call other witnesses to contradict him as to such matter.² In such case, if the question, were it put to a witness for the prosecution on his direct examination, would be objectionable as being no part of the state's case, it is collateral and the prosecution is bound by the defendant's answer.³

c. INSTRUCTIONS ON CREDIBILITY OF THE DEFENDANT.—It is proper for the court to instruct the jury that they may consider the fact that the defendant is a witness testifying in his own behalf, and the interest which he has at stake in the event of the trial, when they are determining the credibility of his testimony.⁴

He is concluded by the answer of the witness."

But it is error to instruct the jury that they are not bound to believe him or treat his testimony the same as that of other witnesses.¹ It is error for the court to tell the jury, or even intimate to them, that they are at liberty to disregard the defendant's testimony. He has a right to have his testimony go before the jury without any suggestion from the bench that they may disregard it.² Thus, an instruction that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf, and his evidence should not be disregarded by the jury for the reason alone that he is the defendant on trial, is erroneous in that it tells the jury, by implication, to discard the defendant's testimony on some ground.³ So, also, it is improper to instruct the jury that they may believe the testimony of the defendant if it is corroborated, and disbelieve it if it is contradicted.⁴

An instruction that the jury should regard the defendant as every other witness is regarded, taking into consideration his appearance, his manner, the reasonableness of his story, and, above all, the fact that he is the accused, is not erroneous, as the accused is not entitled to have his testimony considered as that of a disinterested witness. *State v. In Purdy v. People, 140 Ill. 46, the trial judge instructed the jury that they had a right to consider the conduct of the defendant during the trial as well as when he was on the witness stand. For this error the judgment was reversed. The supreme court said: "A person charged with crime can be examined as a witness only at his own request, and so when he voluntarily assumes the character of a witness, it is proper to apply to him the rules which apply to other witnesses. But we are not advised that it has ever been adjudicated or held that the conduct and demeanor of a defendant during his trial for crime when he is not examined as a witness, or while he is not being examined as a witness, is to be regarded in the light of evidence, or that it can be taken into consideration by the jury in arriving at a verdict. In two instances within the knowledge and recollection of the writer of this opinion, men on trial for grave crimes have made assaults upon witnesses who testified against them, and this during the trials and in the presence of the jury. Assuming that in such cases the defendants were examined as witnesses in their own behalf, it would have been unjust, and highly detrimental to the rights of said defendants, if the trial judge had instructed that in determining the degree of credibility that should be accorded to the testimony of such defendants, the jury had the right to take into consideration the demeanor and conduct of said defendants during their trials. We think that it is improper to authorize a jury to consider, in arriving at a verdict, anything that is other than the law or the evidence in the case."

In Hicks v. U. S., 150 U. S. 450, the defendant went on the stand and testified as a witness in his own behalf. The trial court gave the following instruction concerning his credibility: "The defendant has gone upon the stand in this case and made his statement. You are to weigh its reasonableness, its probability, its consistency, and, above all, you consider it in the light of the other evidence, in the light of the other facts. If he is contradicted by other reliable facts, that goes against him, goes against his evidence. You

d. COMMENT ON DEFENDANT'S FAILURE TO TESTIFY—(1) By the Court.—Statutes making defendants in criminal cases competent to testify in their own behalf, very generally provide that the fact that the prisoner prefers not to go upon the witness stand shall raise no presumption against him, and many of them forbid all allusion to the fact by the court or counsel. In the absence of the latter provision, the court may instruct the jury that the accused may be a witness if he chooses to do so, but that the fact that he does not testify creates no presumption against him and should not be considered by them.¹ The court, however, is may explain it, perhaps, on the theory of an honest mistake or a case of forgetfulness. But if there is a conflict as to material facts between his statements and the statements of the other witnesses, who are telling the truth, then you would have a contradiction that would weigh against the statements of the defendant as coming from such witnesses. You are to consider his interest in this case; you are to consider his consequent motive growing out of that interest, in passing upon the truthfulness or falsity of his statement. He is in an attitude, of course, where any of us, if so situated, would have a large interest in the result of the case, the largest, perhaps, we could have under any circumstances in life, and such an interest, consequently, as might cause us to make statements to influence a jury in passing upon our case that would not be governed by the truth. We might be led away from the truth because of our desire. Therefore, it is but right and it is your duty to view the statements of such a witness in the light of his attitude, and in the light of other evidence." This charge was held erroneous. The Supreme Court of the United States said: "The learned judge therein suggests to the jury that there was or might be a conflict as to material facts between the statements of the accused and the statements of the other witnesses, who are telling the truth, and that then you would have a contradiction that would weigh against the statements of the defendant as coming from such witnesses. The obvious objection to this suggestion is in its assumption that the other witnesses, whose statements contradicted those of the accused, were telling the truth. The learned judge further, in his instruction, argued to the jury that in considering the personal testimony of the accused they should consider his interest in this case." And after quoting that part of the charge which bears on this subject, the court continued: "It is not easy to say what effect this instruction had upon the jury. If this were the only objectionable language contained in the charge, we might hesitate in saying that it amounted to reversible error. It is not unusual to warn juries that they should be careful in giving effect to the testimony of accomplices, and, perhaps, a judge cannot be considered as going out of his province in giving a similar caution as to the testimony of the accused person. Still it must be remembered that men may testify truthfully, although their lives hang in the balance, and that the law, in its wisdom, has provided that the accused shall have the right to testify in his own behalf. Such a privilege would be a vain one if the judge, to whose lightest word the jury properly enough give a great weight, should intimate that the dreadful condition in which the accused finds himself should deprive his testimony of probability. The wise and humane provision of the law is that the person charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness. The policy of this enactment should not be defeated by hostile comments of the trial judge, whose duty it is to give reasonable effect and force to the law."

1. Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 213; State v. Cameron, 40 Vt. 555.

In People v. Hayes, 140 N. Y. 496, the trial court instructed the jury that the defendant was not bound to go on the stand, that he could say to the prosecution, "Prove your case against me. It is my judgment that the situation is such that I am not bound to take the witness stand, and the law gives me that right and the law gives me that privilege," and, further, charged that the law says there is no presumption to be taken against a defendant by reason not bound to give this instruction in the absence of a request from the defendant.¹ In giving the instruction, the court should be careful to use no language which may suggest to the minds of the jurors that they are at liberty to consider the defendant's failure to take the witness stand. Thus, it is reversible error to instruct the jury that nothing is to be presumed against the defendant himself for not testifying in his own behalf, but that the failure of the defendant to produce evidence which it is in his power to produce is a proper matter for their consideration,² unless it be made plain to the minds of the jurors that the latter statement refers to the defendant's failure to produce other witnesses and does not impliedly authorize them to consider his own failure to testify.³ Where the statute expressly forbids any allusion to the defendant's silence by the court or counsel, the court of the fact that he does not take the witness stand. The charge was criticised on the ground that the language which the judge put into the mouth of the defendant amounted to a covert insinuation that the situation was such that it would be disastrous to the defendant if he took the stand. Peckham, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I think the criticism ill-founded. The jury were plainly instructed as to the law and the rights of the defendant. The insinuation suggested would be unwarranted from the language used. On the contrary, the natural interpretation would be that the defendant regarded the situation as one wholly lacking in proof of guilt, and he was under no obligation to go on the stand and explain what as yet required no explanation. The case of Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 222, is authority for the correctness of the course pursued by the learned judge."

1. In State v. Stevens, 67 Iowa 559, the court said: "The defendant did not testify in his own behalf. His counsel now urge that the court erred in not instructing the jury that this fact was not to be considered to his prejudice. Had such instruction been requested, it doubtless would have been given. In the absence of this request, we do not think it was the duty of the court to allude to the matter. It cannot be presumed that defendant's case was prejudiced by his silence, in the absence of any allusion thereto by the state, the court, or any person connected with the case."

2. In Com. v. Harlow, 110 Mass. 411, the court said: "The Statute of 1870, ch. 393, § 1, which makes defendants who are charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses, provides that their neglect or refusal to testify shall not create any presumption against them. This provision conforms to article 12 of the declaration of rights, which declares that no subject shall be compelled to furnish evidence against himself. Since this class of defendants are allowed to testify, if they will, there is some danger that if one exercises his right of silence, a jury will look upon it as a proper matter to weigh against him in considering the question of his guilt. It is important that courts should carefully guard his constitutional right. There is reason to apprehend that it was not guarded as it should have been in this case. For though the jury were told that nothing was to be presumed against the defendant herself for not testifying in her own behalf, they were also told that the failure of a defendant to produce evidence which it was in his power to produce to meet the evidence adduced by the commonwealth, was a competent and proper matter for them to weigh in considering the question of his guilt. They were not told that this last remark did not apply to his own testimony, but merely to his failure to produce other witnesses; nor was it otherwise qualified. The omission of every qualification might lead the jury to understand that though his neglect to testify did not raise a presumption against him, yet they might weigh the fact, and allow it to have such influence as they thought it deserved. The instruction was at least equivocal in a matter where it ought to have been clear, and we fear it operated unfavorably to the defendant."

3. In State v. O'Grady, 65 Vt. 69, the trial court instructed the jury as is not authorized to instruct the jury on this subject even when requested to do so by the defendant himself.¹ And, under such a statute, it is, of course, reversible error for the court, sua sponte to call the attention of the jury to the defendant's silence.²

(2) By Counsel for the Prosecution.—As it is the defendant's constitutional privilege to remain silent, if he prefers to do so, it is highly improper, and, indeed, unprofessional, for the prosecuting attorney to comment on his failure to testify; and it is fatal error for the court to permit such comments in the face of the defendant's objection,³ and the fact that the prisoner's own counsel alludes to the matter and enlarges on the defendant's legal follows: "The evidence of the state is uncontradicted by any evidence introduced on the part of the respondent. The respondent has not testified. The mere fact that he has not testified is not to be taken against him. You have no right to consider that fact, but you have a right to consider the fact that the evidence introduced by the state has not been contradicted only so far as it may be contradicted in and of itself." This instruction was excepted to on the ground that it impliedly authorized the jury to consider the defendant's silence, but it was held that the exception was not well taken. The appellate court said: "The court pointedly told the jury they had no right to consider the fact of his neglect or refusal to testify against him. In coupling the right to consider the fact that the evidence introduced by the state had not been contradicted with this announcement, the court did not commit any legal error. If it impliedly told the jury that they might consider the fact that the respondent had not called other witnesses who were present, to contradict the witnesses of the state as bearing upon the credibility of the latter, this was only adapting its charge to the facts and circumstances of the case. The court should always adapt its charge to the facts and testimony of the case. We do not think the jury could thereby have obtained the impression that they could consider the fact that the respondent had not testified as any evidence against him."

1. In Gen. Stats. of Minnesota, tit. 1, ch. 73, § 7, it is provided that on the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offenses, the person so charged shall, at his request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; nor shall the neglect or refusal to testify create any presumption against the defendant; nor shall such neglect be alluded to or commented upon by the prosecuting attorney or by the court. Under this section it has been held that the court has no authority to instruct the jury concerning the prisoner's silence, even when expressly requested to do so by the defendant himself. State v. Pearce, 56 Minn. 226.

In State v. Robinson, 117 Mo. 663, the court said: "Another instruction it is said the court ought to have given, and that was to the effect that if a party accused fail to testify, such failure shall not create any presumption against him. There was no error in refusing such an instruction. Section 4219, Rev. Stats. 1889, is the one relied on to sustain this view, but the concluding words of that section provide that such failure to testify shall not be referred to by any attorney in the case, nor be considered by the court or jury before whom the trial takes place. If the court had given such an instruction, it would have disobeyed the spirit if not the letter of the law."

right to refrain from testifying, does not change the rule so far as the prosecution is concerned.¹ In jurisdictions where the statute merely provides that the defendant's silence shall raise no presumption against him, the court may repair the injury by rebuking the prosecuting attorney, advising the jury of the defendant's legal rights, and promptly instructing them to disregard the objectionable remarks.² But in other jurisdictions, where all comment on the silence of the accused is forbidden by statute, it is held that prejudicial comments on the defendant's failure to testify cannot be cured by the interposition of the trial court.³

And where the defendant has testified, it is error to permit the prosecuting attorney to comment on the fact that he did not testify at a former trial of the same case. Richardson v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 139.

In Maine, it was formerly held that the defendant's failure to testify was a proper subject for comment by the prosecuting attorney. State v. Lawrence, 57 Me. 574; State v. Bartlett, 55 Me. 220; State v. Cleaves, 59 Me. 299; 8 Am. Rep. 422. But it is held that the Statute of 1879, ch. 92, § 1; Rev. Stats., ch. 134, § 19, now prohibits such comment in that state. State v. Banks, 78 Me. 490.

1. In Com. v. Scott, 123 Mass. 241; 25 Am. Rep. 87, Gray, C. J., said: "As there is danger that the jury, knowing that the law now permits a defendant to testify, may draw inferences against him from his omission so to do, his counsel may properly, in addressing the jury, insist and enlarge upon his constitutional and legal right in this respect. . . . The course of the closing argument for the prosecution tended to persuade the jury that the omission of the defendants to testify implied an admission or a consciousness of the crime charged, and the presiding judge, in permitting such a course of argument against the objection of the defendants, and in ruling that the prosecuting attorney had a right to comment on the reasons which the defendants' counsel gave for their not going upon the stand and testifying in their behalf, and, also, to give the reasons which the government contended really existed for their not testifying, committed an error which was manifestly prejudicial to the defendants, and which obliges this court to set aside the verdict and order a new trial."

It is error for the court to refuse a proper instruction on this subject, even though the prosecuting attorney admitted in the presence of the jury that he had transgressed the bounds of propriety in commenting on the defendant's failure to testify. People v. Rose (Supreme Ct.), 4 N. Y. Supp. 787; Staples v. State, 89 Tenn. 231; Wilson v. U. S., 149 U. S. 65.

It seems that an incidental allusion to the defendant's right to testify, made in good faith by counsel for the prosecution, in his argument to the court on the admissibility of evidence, and not intended to be heard by the jury, is not a fatal violation of the statute.¹ But if it is evident that the attorney adopts this course as an adroit method of doing indirectly what the law prohibits his doing directly, it is as much a violation of the rights of the accused as if the remarks had been addressed directly to the jury.²

In Brazell v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 723, counsel for the state referred to evidence adduced by the prosecution concerning the prisoner's whereabouts at the time the offense was committed, and then, facing the defendant, said: "Now where does he say he was if he was not there?" Upon objection being made, the court admonished the counsel to refrain from remarks on that subject, and instructed the jury not to consider them. The judgment of conviction was, nevertheless, reversed, the court saying that the interposition of the trial court did not cure the vice.

1. State v. Mosley, 31 Kan. 355; Diebel v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1893), 24 S. W. Rep. 26.

Remark Addressed to the Prisoner's Counsel.—Where counsel for the prisoner was cross-examining a witness for the state, and the prosecuting attorney suggested to him that he could prove a certain matter by his own parties when he put them on the stand, it was held that this suggestion, though made in the hearing of the jury, could not be considered as a comment on the defendant's failure to testify, or as coming within the inhibition of the statute. State v. Ice, 34 W. Va. 244.

2. In State v. Ryan, 70 Iowa 156, the court said: "Counsel for the defendant insists that the reference made by the district attorney to the fact that defendant had not testified as a witness in his own behalf entitles the defendant to a new trial. If the remark had been made by the attorney for the state in an argument to the jury, we think it is perfectly clear that the defendant would have been entitled to a new trial. But does this make any difference? It was made to the court during the trial and in the presence of the jury. The statute prohibits such remarks during the trial in the presence of either the court or jury. Under the statute, we are not permitted to inquire whether the defendant was prejudiced. This must be conclusively presumed. The attorney general insists that the statute should be so construed as to apply to a case where the attention of the jury is directly called to such a fact, or that such a direct reference thereto is made as in all probability would create a prejudice in the minds of the persons composing the jury. It seems to us that if such had been the legislative thought, apt words would have been used to express it. If reference can be made to the fact that the defendant has not testified in his own behalf in arguments to the court, then such a reference may be made in every case and thereby the statute will be nullified. It is clearly implied, if not expressly stated, in the statute, that the attention of either the court or jury shall not be called to the fact that the defendant has failed to testify in his own behalf, and if the attorney for the state does so, the defendant is entitled to a new trial."

In State v. Baldoser, 88 Iowa 55, the prosecuting attorney, in his argument to the court, alluded to the defendant's right to testify before the time had arrived for him to take the stand if he chose to do so, and it was held that this was improper. The court said: "Now it may be conceded that the reference by counsel in the words used could not have been to the fact that defendant had not testified in the case, because up to that time he had no opportunity so to do. The state's case had not been closed. So while the case is technically not within the statutory inhibition, it seems to us it is clearly contrary to the spirit and object of the statute. If the contention of the attorney general is correct, then counsel for the state may, at all times during a trial, prior to the time the defendant has an opportunity to go upon the stand, comment upon the fact that the

It is also improper for the prosecuting attorney, in his opening statement to the jury, to direct their attention to the fact that the defendant has the legal right to testify, and to caution them to observe his conduct in that respect.¹

Where the evidence of the defendant's guilt is so overwhelming that the court is able to say affirmatively that the jury could not have returned a verdict in his favor without a willful disregard of their duty, unwarranted remarks of counsel which might otherwise be fatal to the verdict may be deemed harmless error.²

It is not of itself a good answer to this objection to the comments of counsel that the jury were not invited in terms to consider the defendant's failure to testify, as a circumstance against him. A cunningly devised insinuation is often as well understood as plain positive language and is frequently more damaging. It follows that the court should carefully protect the accused from damaging insinuations of this sort, and if indirect and covert allusion be made to the defendant's silence, the judgment should be law permits him to testify in his own behalf; and draw inferences as to the effect of his failing to do so. Such a construction of the statute would deprive the defendant of every benefit which the legislature, by its enactment, intended to confer upon him. The law-makers certainly never intended that counsel for the state might comment on and refer to the fact that defendant might testify in his own behalf at all times prior to the closing of the state's case in chief, but must not afterwards refer to the fact that he had failed to take advantage of his privilege to testify. The mischief is done by directing the minds of the jurors to the fact that a defendant may testify, in advance of the time when he may be called as a witness as well as if the comment be made after he has elected not to testify."

1. In Coleman v. State, 111 Ind. 563, the prosecuting attorney, in his opening statement to the jury, said: "You should watch the evidence closely. We do not know that the defendant will go upon the stand. He has not been sworn; I noticed that. If he should go upon the stand, you should watch him." Upon the propriety of this language, the court said: "The objectionable remarks of the prosecuting attorney, although made in his opening statement to the jury, and, therefore, not directly controlled by the rulings in Long v. State, 56 Ind. 182; 26 Am. Rep. 19, and Showalter v. State, 84 Ind. 562, and although not within the literal prohibition of the statute, were, nevertheless, in palpable violation of its spirit and purpose. Surely, if the failure of the defendant to testify is not to be a subject of comment, or may not be referred to in the argument of the cause, nor commented upon or referred to or considered by the jury, the prosecutor may not evade the statute by ingeniously injecting into his opening statement remarks which do all the mischief which the prohibitory part of the statute was intended to prevent. The effect of the remarks must have been either to coerce the defendant to testify, as has been said, with a halter about his neck, or to induce him to remain silent with knowledge that the jury had been challenged in the outset to observe whether or not he would go upon the stand under the goad of the prosecutor's statement."

2. State v. Ahern, 54 Minn. 195; Nicholls v. State, 68 Wis. 416.

In Austin v. People, 102 Ill. 264, the court said: "We do not see that this statute can well be completely enforced, unless it be adopted as a rule of practice that such improper and forbidden reference by counsel for the prosecution shall be regarded good ground for a new trial in all cases where the proofs of guilt are not so clear and conclusive that the court can say affirmatively the accused could not have been harmed from that cause."

But in Iowa, it is held that under the strict terms of the statute of that state, the court cannot inquire whether the defendant was prejudiced or not. It is set aside and a new trial awarded.¹ An incidental allusion to the statute, however, which is neither intended nor calculated to draw conclusively presumed that he was prejudiced. State v. Ryan, 70 Iowa 154.

1. Where counsel for the state rehearsed a conversation which it was claimed had taken place between the defendant and a witness who had testified thereto for the prosecution, and then exclaimed, "Who has denied it?" the judgment was reversed on the ground that this was an allusion to the defendant's failure to testify, since he was the only person who could deny it. Dawson v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1893), 24 S. W. Rep. 414.

But the prosecuting attorney may comment on the fact that material evidence for the prosecution has not been contradicted, where it does not appear that the defendant is the only person who can contradict it. State v. Weddington, 103 N. Car. 372.

In Austin v. People, 102 Ill. 261, a conviction for rape was reversed because the prosecuting attorney was permitted, over the defendant's objection, to say to the jury: "Since the legislature passed a statute giving the defendant in criminal cases the right to testify in his own behalf, it can no longer be said, as a maxim of law, that rape is a crime hard to be defended."

In Wilson v. U. S., 149 U. S. 66, the court, after quoting the statute which makes accused persons competent witnesses in their own behalf, said: "In this case, this provision of the statute was plainly disregarded. When the district attorney, referring to the fact that the defendant did not ask to be a witness, said to the jury, 'I want to say to you that if I am ever charged with crime, I will not stop by putting witnesses on the stand to testify to my good character, but I will go upon the stand and hold up my hand before high heaven and testify to my innocence of the crime,' he intimated to them, as plainly as if he had said in so many words, that it was a circumstance against the innocence of the defendant that he did not go on the stand and testify. Nothing could have been more effective with the jury to induce them to disregard entirely the presumption of innocence to which, by the law, he was entitled, and which, by the statute, he could not lose by a failure to offer himself as a witness. And when counsel for defendant called the attention of the court to this language of the district attorney, it was not met by any direct prohibition or emphatic condemnation of the court, which only said, 'I suppose the counsel should not comment upon the defendant not taking the stand.' It should have said that the counsel is forbidden by the statute to make any comment which would create, or tend to create, a presumption against the defendant from his failure to testify. Instead of stating, after mentioning that the United States court is not governed by the states' statutes, 'I do not know that it ought to be the subject of comment by counsel,' the court should have said that any such comment would tend necessarily to defeat the very prohibition of the statute. And the reply of the district attorney to the mild observation of the court only intensified the fact to which he had already called the attention of the jury: 'I did not mean to refer to it in that light, and I do not intend to refer in a single word to the fact that he did not testify in his own behalf,' which was equivalent to saying, 'You, gentlemen of the jury, know full well that an innocent man would have gone on the stand and have testified to his innocence, but I do not mean to refer to the fact that he did not, for it is a circumstance which you will take into consideration without it.' By this action of the court in refusing to condemn the language of the district attorney, and to express to the jury in emphatic terms that they should not attach to the failure any importance whatever as a presumption against the defendant, the impression was left on the minds of the jury that if he were an innocent man he would have gone on the stand as the district attorney stated he himself would have done. This language of the district attorney, and this action, or rather want of action, of the court, are set forth in the bill of exceptions, and although exceptions are generally taken to some ruling or want of ruling by the court, in the progress of the trial, in the admission or rejection of evidence or the interpretation of instruments, yet they can be taken to its action or want of proper action upon any proceeding in the progress of the trial, from its commencement to its conclusion, and when properly presented the attention of the jury to the defendant's failure to testify, is not necessarily fatal to the judgment,¹ and the rule does not prohibit the prosecuting attorney's making reasonable comment on the absence of evidence for the defense, provided he makes no allusion to the defendant's privilege of testifying.²

As a general rule, if the defendant avails himself of his privilege of testifying, his attitude on the witness stand is open to the comments of counsel the same as that of any other witness, and the prosecuting attorney may animadvert upon his failure to explain matters peculiarly within his knowledge or to deny or explain criminating facts proved against him by other witnesses.³

can be considered by the court on writ of error. The refusal of the court to condemn the reference of the district attorney and to prohibit any subsequent reference to the failure of the defendant to appear as a witness, tended to his prejudice before the jury, and this effect should be corrected by setting the verdict aside and awarding a new trial."

In Hunt v. State, 28 Tex. App. 149, the district attorney exclaimed: "It is the same old story—defendant's mouth is closed;" and then took up the acts of the legislature and commenced to read the act allowing a defendant to testify. The court rebuked him and compelled him to cease reading the statute. The judgment was reversed on account of the district attorney's violation of the law.

1. In Watt v. People, 126 Ill. 31, the court said: "Indirect and covert references to the neglect of the defendant to go upon the witness stand may be as prejudicial to his rights as a direct comment upon such neglect. But it does not necessarily follow that every reference to the law on that subject is prohibited. The true test would seem to be, was the reference intended or calculated to direct the attention of the jury to the defendant's neglect to avail himself of his legal right to testify?"

In Bradshaw v. People, 153 Ill. 156, which was a prosecution for abduction, the state's attorney remarked that the enticing and taking away of the prosecuting witness was not denied by the defendant. The court promptly rebuked him, saying, in the presence of the jury, "that the defendant had, by his plea of not guilty, denied everything." It was held that the language of the attorney was not such a comment on the defendant's silence as would vitiate the verdict.

So, where the prosecuting attorney said, though he had no right to swear any man accused of crime, he had the right to prove his statements, it was held that the statute had not been violated. Sawyers v. Com., 88 Va. 356.

In Frazier v. State, 135 Ind. 38, the prosecuting attorney said, in his closing address: "Not a particle of evidence has come to you from the defendant, from his side of the case." It was held that this remark was not obnoxious as being a comment on the defendant's failure to testify.

In Jordan v. State, 29 Tex. App. 595, the prosecuting attorney remarked: "The law allows the defendant to testify for himself; but, if he fails to do so, the law says that I shall not comment on his failure to testify in his own behalf; but it does not preclude me from commenting upon the failure of the defendant to put Florence Hamilton on the stand as a witness." For this allusion to the defendant, the judgment was reversed.

In State v. Tatman, 59 Iowa 474, the court said: "Upon the final trial on

It has been held, however, that where, by statute, the cross-examination of the accused is restricted to matters referred to in the examination in chief, the same rule of limitation should be applied to the prosecutor's comments upon his testimony.¹

the plea of not guilty, the defendant offered himself as a witness, and was examined as to certain matters material to his defense. The district attorney, in his argument to the jury, commented upon the fact that the defendant testified to a part only of his defense, and omitted to testify upon other material facts in the case within his knowledge, and urged that such omission should be considered by the jury. It is contended that because of this conduct of the district attorney, the judgment should be reversed. Section 3636 of Miller's Code provides that defendants in criminal proceedings shall be competent witnesses in their own behalf, but if a defendant should elect not to become a witness, that fact shall not have any weight against him on the trial, and shall not be referred to by counsel for the state, and if counsel should do so, defendant shall be entitled to a new trial. It is conceded that it was the right of the district attorney to comment on such testimony as the defendant gave, but it is urged that he had no right to comment upon the defendant's failure to testify as to matters regarding which he preferred to keep his mouth closed. The exemption from unfavorable comment extends only to such defendants as choose not to avail themselves of the privilege of testifying in their own behalf. Here the defendant put himself upon the stand as a witness, and we can see no reason why the counsel for the state should not comment on his testimony as fully as on that of any other witness."

In Brashears v. State, 58 Md. 567, the court, after quoting the provisions of the statute allowing defendants to testify in their own behalf, said: "Here the traverser did not neglect or refuse to testify. On the contrary, he voluntarily became a witness on his own behalf. His testimony thus given was open to observation by the attorney for the state and by the jury. He knew that he was upon trial for uttering a forged note, and he certainly knew whether he had or had not uttered it, and, if he had done so, whether he had so uttered it with intent to defraud. But he confined himself in testifying to the simple statement that he could not write, though he must have known that this circumstance was entirely consistent with the guilty uttering by him of the note in question. His conduct on the witness stand, and his silence, when testifying, as to matters involved in the pending inquiry, which were certainly within his knowledge, were circumstances which the jury had a right to consider in deciding upon the credit due to the witness in connection with the other facts proved in the case, and they were, therefore, necessarily circumstances upon which the state's attorney had a right to comment in addressing the jury."

1. In State v. Graves, 95 Mo. 514, the court said: "The statute having conferred the right upon such a defendant when he takes the stand to testify only in regard to such matters as he may choose, this right of choice would, in effect, be taken away by a ruling which would justify comments to be made, and unfavorable inferences to be drawn from what he might have testified about but about which he did not testify. Under this statute, the defendant has two options, the first of which is, that he may elect either to go on the stand or not, as a witness; and, second, when he elects to go on the stand, he may testify only to such matters as he may choose. It is clear that under the statute, if he elects not to go on the stand, the fact that he did not testify at all could neither be construed to affect his innocence nor guilt, nor be referred to by any attorney in the case. If the statute forbids comment upon what he might have sworn to when he elects not to go on the stand, why does it not, in its essence and spirit, when he elects to testify, also forbid comment upon what he might have sworn to while on the stand and which he elected, as under the statute he had a right to do, not to testify about? . . . If it is reversible error to inquire on cross-examination about a matter not referred to in the examination in chief, why is it not reversible error if the prosecuting attorney comment upon a matter concerning which if the defendant had been required to testify the

In order to bring the matter before the appellate court for review a defendant should make his objection to the remarks of the prosecuting attorney at the time of their utterance.¹ The objection comes too late after verdict, if the court can see that under all the circumstances a proper verdict has been rendered.² In jurisdictions where the mischief may be cured by the interposition of the trial court, the proper course to pursue is to make prompt objection to the obnoxious comments and ask the judge to instruct the jury not to consider them to the prejudice of the defendant.³

3. Effect of Death or Disability of Opposing Party—a. IN GENERAL.—While the common-law disability of parties and persons interested in the event of the suit has been almost entirely swept away by modern statutes, yet it has been considered wise to except from their operation parties to contracts and causes of action judgment would be reversed? Any other ruling or construction of the statute would necessarily have the effect of compelling a defendant in a criminal case either to elect not to go on the stand at all as a witness, or, if he elected to go on the stand, to compel him to testify fully in regard to all matters connected with the charge, even though he might thereby criminate himself."

In State v. Elmer, 115 Mo. 404, the doctrine of State v. Graves, 95 Mo. 510, was restated and followed, and State v. Jackson, 95 Mo. 623; State v. Anderson, 89 Mo. 312, so far as they decide to the contrary, were overruled. The rule, however, does not prevent the prosecuting attorney from commenting upon the testimony actually given by the defendant and drawing all proper inferences therefrom. State v. Walker, 98 Mo. 95.

1. Com. v. Worcester, 141 Mass. 58; Price v. Com., 77 Va. 393.

In Martin v. State, 79 Wis. 176, the court, though admitting that the remarks made by the prosecuting attorney were grossly improper and erroneous, said: "There is nothing in the bill of exceptions, or even in the affidavit of the counsel for the defendant upon which he asked to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, which shows that such remarks were objected to by the defendant, or that the attention of the court was drawn to the fact that such remarks were being made to the jury, or any ruling of the court in regard to the propriety or impropriety of the same. Upon this state of the record, the question as to the propriety of the attorney's remarks is in no way in the case for the consideration of this court."

In State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 180, the court said: "Exception was taken to a part of the closing argument made by Mr. Ide for the prosecution. No objection was made to it at the time of its delivery, and we think, judging from the length and nature of the statements claimed to have been illegal and the well-known vigilant character of the respondent's counsel, that none was intended. Where counsel sit still during an argument which they claim is illegal and make no objection thereto, an objection afterwards is too late. The exception is waived by their silence. This court sits in revision of errors made in the ruling, and the refusal to rule, of the court below. Upon this question, the court made no ruling, did not refuse to make one, and therefore there is nothing for us to revise."

2. Price v. Com., 77 Va. 395.

3. In Com. v. Worcester, 141 Mass. 60, the defendant's counsel objected to the remarks of the prosecuting attorney, and at the close of the argument requested the judge to take the case from the jury on account of the objectionable remarks, which request was refused. The supreme judicial court said: "The court was not required, as matter of law, to take the case from the jury because the district attorney, in closing for the government, commented upon the fact that the defendant did not testify as a witness. If any objectionable comments of this character were made, the defendant's remedy was to object to them at the time and to ask the judge to instruct the jury where other parties thereto have since died or have become incompetent to testify. These provisions, being merely exceptions to enabling statutes, create no new disabilities and render no one incompetent to testify as to matters concerning which he would have been competent before their enactment.¹ The purpose of these exceptions is to protect the estates of deceased and insane persons from the apprehended danger of permitting the surviving or sane party to a contract or transaction to testify in respect to it after the lips of the other party have been closed by death or insanity.²

To state the rule in general terms, a party to an action who is interested in the event thereof may not, on his own motion, testify to personal transactions or conversations with a person since deceased to whose interest the opposing party has succeeded.³

that they should not be considered by them to his prejudice. The judge was not required to treat the whole trial as a nullity by taking the case from the jury."

A man over seventy years old who, through softening of the brain, has so far lost his mental faculties as to be entirely incapable of giving testimony in court, or any coherent statement of past events, is insane within the meaning of the statute. Whitney v. Traynor, 74 Wis. 289.

Thus a grantor of land, who took a lease back from the grantee, and subsequently assigned all his interest therein and was released from liability to pay rent, was held competent for his assignee in an action to have the transaction adjudged a mortgage, after the death of the grantee. Grand United Order, etc. v. Merklin, 65 Md. 579.

In an action by a mortgagee against the widow of the deceased mortgagor, payment of the mortgage debt being pleaded, it was held that the plaintiff's son, who was in his employment as a clerk when the mortgage was given, and held himself out to the public as a partner, though he had no interest in the business, might testify to transactions with the deceased mortgagor in reference to the mortgage debt, not being within the statutory disqualification either as a party or as an interested person. Huckaba v. Abbott, 87 Ala. 409.

In Connelly v. O'Connor, 117 N. Y. 93, the court, speaking of section 829 of the Code of Civil Procedure, said: "In construing that section it has been held that the test of interest, where the witness is not a party, is that the witness

And interested parties are competent when they are called to testify against interest,¹ or when their interest is not opposed to that of the representative of the deceased person concerning whose doings or sayings they are called to testify.² To exclude will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation of the judgment, or that the record will be legal evidence for or against him in some other action. It must be a present, certain and vested interest, and not an interest uncertain, remote or contingent." Citing Hobart v. Hobart, 62 N. Y. 81; Wallace v. Straus, 113 N. Y. 238. Compare Williams v. Johnston, 82 N. Car. 288.

Where a husband in his own right sues the representative of a deceased person for the wages of his wife, she is competent to prove the contract of hire, since the husband is merely asserting his common-law right in which the wife has personally no beneficial interest. Porter v. Dunn, 131 N. Y. 315.

The payee of a check is competent to prove that the maker, since deceased, made it payable to the witness, in order to enable him to collect the money and pay it to a third person to whom the maker intended to present it as a gift. Taylor's Estate, 154 Pa. St. 183.

On a bill by the devisee of a deceased testator, to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey the land devised, against the husband and infant child of the other party to the contract, after her death, a child of the testator, who is not entitled to the land under the will, is a competent witness for the complainant to prove the contract under which relief is sought. *McClure v. Under section 399 of the New York Code of Procedure, it was held otherwise by the supreme court of that state. See Gifford v. Sackett, 15 Hun (N. Y.) 79, citing LeClare v. Stewart, 8 Hun (N. Y.) 127; Howell v. Taylor, 11 Hun (N. Y.) 214; Cornell v. Cornell, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 312.

But under section 829 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the law is as stated in the text. Pursell v. Fry, 19 Hun (N. Y.) 595; Brown v. Brown, 29 Hun (N. Y.) 498; Davis v. Gallagher, 55 Hun (N. Y.) 593; Carpenter v. Soule, 88 N. Y. 251; 42 Am. Rep. 248.

Thus a residuary legatee is competent to prove declarations of the testator tending to sustain a gift made by him. Carpenter v. Soule, 88 N. Y. 251; 42 Am. Rep. 248.

But it has been held that he is not competent, though called to testify against interest, if his testimony will injuriously affect the rights of other parties to the action. Weinstein v. Patrick, 75 N. Car. 344.

In New Ebenezer Assoc. v. Gress Lumber Co., 89 Ga. 125, it was held that one sued jointly with the representative of a deceased person was competent as a witness for the plaintiff, though he might have an interest in charging the personal representative.

To exclude the witness, it should be made to appear that there is a direct immediate conflict between his rights and those of the estate of the deceased person with whom it is proposed to prove a transaction. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Sledge, 62 Ala. 566; Hill v. Helton, 80 Ala. 532; Campbell v. Campbell, 130 Ill. 466; Snell v. Fewell, 64 Miss. 655. See also Dismukes v. Tolson, 67 Ala. 386; *Howle v. Thus, where a life estate in land was conveyed with remainder over in fee to certain of the life tenant's grandchildren by name, and a bill to establish a resulting trust was brought after the death of the life tenant by one who claimed to have advanced the purchase-money, it was held that the plaintiff might testify to communications between the deceased and himself, the witness, it must appear that his testimony will tend to benefit him pecuniarily,¹ and his interest must be present, certain, and fixed.² It is not sufficient that he has an interest in the question or thing in controversy; to disqualify him, he must have an interest in the event of the action or proceeding,³ or the record because the defendants claimed under the deed and not as heirs of the deceased. Bibb v. Hunter, 79 Ala. 351.

When his interest is opposed to that of the estate, he will be excluded, although the representative of the deceased is a party on the same side of the suit with the witness. Apperson v. Gogin, 3 Ill. App. 48.

Thus, when he is a defendant in form, but his interests are identified with those of the plaintiff, he will not be allowed to testify against defendants entitled to the protection of the statute against the plaintiff's testimony. *Weinstein v. The fact that the husband of a devisee will be tenant by the curtesy of the land devised, in case his wife dies intestate before his death, does not disqualify him on the ground of interest; such interest is too remote and contingent. Bowen v. Sweeney (Supreme Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 752; Matter of Clark's Will, 40 Hun (N. Y.) 233; Cooper v. Monroe, 77 Hun (N. Y.) 1.

Ward*, 30 Hun (N. Y.) 555; Matter of Clark's Will, 40 Hun (N. Y.) 237; although it was held in Scherrer v. Kaufman, 1 Dem. (N. Where one heir at law brings an action to have a deed made by his ancestor set aside as to him, on account of the mental incapacity of the grantor, must be competent evidence for or against him in another action or proceeding.¹

A party who has no interest in the transaction proposed to be proved is competent to prove it;² and a witness whose interest is balanced between the parties is competent, notwithstanding the death of one of them.³ But if his interest is opposed, even in a slight degree, to that of the party entitled to the protection of the statute, his testimony should be excluded.⁴ And it has been other heirs, who are not parties, are competent generally, because, if the plaintiff succeeds, the deed will stand as to them, and their interest is only in the question and not in the event of the suit. Hobart v. Hobart, 62 N. Y. 80.

Where the plaintiff's father had deeded him certain real estate, and delivered the deed in escrow to be delivered to the plaintiff after the grantor's death, the grantee brought an action, after the death of the grantor, to compel the delivery of the deed to him, and it was held that the plaintiff's brother, who was similarly interested in another deed, was competent for the plaintiff to prove declarations of the grantor. Lyon v. Dwinell, 89 Ga. 532; Allen v. Davis, 65 Ga. 179. See also Smith v. Rishel, 164 Pa. St. 181; In re Kuhns' Estate (Pa. 1894), 30 Atl. Rep. 215.

4. Thus, a surety on the bond of a non-resident executor has such an interest in the account of his principal as will disqualify him to testify to personal transactions or conversations with the testator. Miller v. Montgomery, 78 N. Y. 282.

An assignor of a lease, remaining liable on his covenants, is not competent in an action by the executor of his lessor against his assignee for a breach of the covenants. Whitney v. Shippen, 89 Pa. St. 22.

In Williams v. Johnston, 82 N. Car. 288, it appeared that a father deeded land to his son, who in turn deeded it to the plaintiff, who was to pay the son a certain amount therefor in case he succeeded in an action to recover possession of the land; the defendant claimed under a purchaser at an execution sale against the father, who was dead at the time of the trial. It was held that the plaintiff's grantor was not competent for the plaintiff.

Costs.—Where the opposing party is an executor or administrator, a party liable for costs only is incompetent. Ransom v. Schmela, 13 Neb. 73; Mason v. McCormick, 75 N. Car. 263; Poucher v. Scott, 33 Hun (N. Y.) 230; affirmed 98 N. Y. 422.

But a contingent liability for costs as a nominal plaintiff is not such a claim against an estate as will exclude the witness. Hedges v. Aydelott, 46 Miss. 99.

In an action by an administrator against a sheriff, for selling the property of the estate under an execution against another person, a surety on the sheriff's held that his testimony should be excluded if he ever had such an interest, even though he may be disinterested at the time of the trial.¹

To exclude transactions and declarations of a deceased person, those who have succeeded to his rights must also be interested in the event of the suit.²

c. PERSONS EXCLUDED—(1) Parties to the Issue.—The rule in the United States courts is that "in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with, or statement by, the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court."³ This section excludes only parties to the action.⁴

An original party to a contract cannot, the other party being dead, render himself competent by transferring his interest to another. Drew v. Simmons, 58 Ala. 463.

But in Rothschild v. Hatch, 54 Miss. 555, it was held that a witness who had before suit transferred his interest by deed of gift, the action being brought by the grantee, was competent.

In a contest among the creditors of an estate, as to the priority of their respective claims, the parties thereto may testify, as the rights of the estate are not involved in the issues. Gordon v. Kennedy, 36 Iowa 167.

3. Rev. Stats. of United States, § 858.

Under this section an "opposite party" is construed to be one against whose interests the evidence is sought to be used. And an ex parte order obtained by a complainant before process issued for his own examination will not qualify him as a witness on the ground that he is required by the court to testify. Eslava v. Mazange, 1 Woods (U. S.) 623.

This section applies to the courts of the District of Columbia as fully as to the courts of the United States. Page v. Burnstine, 102 U. S. 664; Meguire v. Corwine, 3 McArthur (D. C.) 81.

And the same is true of similar statutes in a number of the states.¹

In other jurisdictions, the term "party to the action" is construed to include a party to the issue on trial or the real party in interest, whether he is a party of record or not.² In a few cases, it has been held that parties to the record should be excluded

And it is then confined to proceedings in which a judgment or decree may be rendered. Monongahela Nat. Bank v. Jacobus, 109 U. S. 275. See Briggs v. Spaulding, 141 U. S. 153.

The maker of a note for the accommodation of the deceased indorser is not incompetent in an action thereon against the administrator of the latter, to which the maker is not a party. Morris v. Birmingham Nat. Bank, 93 Ala. 511.

The Tennessee statute is said to be strictly construed, being applied only to parties to the action and not to persons interested. Grange Warehouse Assoc. v. Owen, 86 Tenn. 355; Fuqua v. Dinwiddie, 6 Lea (Tenn.) 645.

But neither party to the record may testify as to transactions or communications with the deceased. McDonald v. Allen, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 446; Taylor v. Mayhew, 11 Heisk. (Tenn.) 596.

One jointly bound with the decedent may testify against the latter's representative, in an action to which the witness is not a party, although the effect of his testimony is to throw the whole liability on the estate. Gilmer v. Baker, 24 W. Va. 72.

In an action affecting the title to land, one claiming under a deed from a defendant which was not recorded when the notice of lis pendens was filed, being bound by the judgment, is a party within the meaning of the statute and is incompetent as to personal transactions and communications with a deceased person under whom the plaintiff claims title. Wright v. Jackson, 59 Wis. 569.

In California, the exception is strictly construed, and, as the code provides that parties in whose favor an action is prosecuted against an estate may not be witnesses in their own behalf, it is held not to exclude the testimony of a person against whom an action is prosecuted by the personal representative. Sedgwick v. Sedgwick, 52 Cal. 336; McPherson v. Weston, 85 Cal. 97; Moore v. Schofield, 96 Cal. 488.

even though they have no interest in the event of the suit,¹ but this does not appear to be within the spirit and reason of such statutes, and it would seem that only parties to the issue and persons interested in the event of the action or proceeding should be excluded.²

(2) Parties to Contracts—(a) In General.—Where one party to a contract or transaction, out of which the cause of action arose, is dead and his rights have passed to another, who represents his interests in the matter in controversy, a surviving party to such contract or transaction may not, on his own motion, testify to

Thus a cestui que trust for whose benefit an action is brought in the name of the trustee, is excluded. Gabbett v. Sparks, 60 Ga. 582.

Introvers by an administrator to recover the value of notes alleged to have been the property of the intestate, it was held that the maker, though not a party to the action, was incompetent for the defendant, where his liability over for certain payments of interest made since the alleged conversion of the notes, depended on the event of the action. Morrison First Nat. Bank v. Bressler, 38 Ill. App. 499.

And if the real party in interest, for whose benefit an action is brought in the name of another, be dead at the time of the trial, the opposing party may not testify as to transactions with him. Boynton v. Phelps, 52 Ill. 210.

In Illinois, it is held that the statute does not abolish the rule of chancery courts making a defendant competent to testify on behalf of a co-defendant on any question in the decision of which he has no interest, even if the adverse party does sue as the personal representative of a deceased person. White v. Ross, 147 Ill. 427.

2. In Bowers v. Schuler, 54 Minn. 103, Mitchell, J., said: "The principal point is whether the term 'any party to an action' is meant to include everyone who is a party to the record, or only those who are parties to the issue to which the testimony relates. In view of the last clause of the section, limiting the incompetency of the witness to matters relative to the issue between the parties, we are of opinion that the statute refers only to those who are parties to the issue. The word 'parties,' as there used, we think, evidently refers to the party prohibited from testifying, and the party against whom the testimony would operate if admitted. This construction is in harmony with the spirit and purpose of the statute, for no good reason can be suggested for excluding the testimony of one who, although a party to the action for some other purpose, is not a party to or interested in the issue to which his testimony relates." To the same effect are Upton v. Adams, 27 Ind. 432; Starret v. Burkhalter, 86 Ind. 439; Spencer v. Robbins, 106 Ind. 580; Scherer v. Ingerman, 110 Ind. 443.

But it has been held that a primary liability of the next friend for the costs of the action renders him incompetent. Mason v. McCormick, 75 N. Car. 263.

Persons interested in the event of the action or proceeding should be excluded, although not parties to the action. Earle v. Harrison, 18 S. Car. 329.

The children of the surviving party are not excluded. Anderson v. Hance, 49 Mo. 159.

Where one party to a contract is dead, the other, being a party to the suit and liable for costs, is not competent to testify, though a discharged bankrupt. Tunstall v. Withers, 86 Va. 892.

Where a grantee sues the estate of his deceased grantor for a breach of covenant, he is not competent to prove that he served notice on the grantor of the pendency of the action in which he was adjudged to have no title, and requested him to defend. Finton v. Egelston, 61 Hun (N. Y.) 246.

In Granger v. Bassett, 98 Mass. 462, the court said: "The statute admits parties to testify, except where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial is dead, etc. Gen. Stats., ch. 131, § 14. The test of competency is the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial, not the fact to which the party is called to testify. If the cause of action was a matter transacted with a person who has deceased, the other party to that transaction, being also a party to the suit, is not admitted as a witness at all, and cannot testify to any fact in the case. Otherwise he is admitted as a witness, and being so admitted, the statute contains no restriction nor limitation as to the facts to which his testimony may or may not be directed. His competency must be determined in advance, by the nature of the controversy and the questions in issue. If, upon that test, he is admitted as a witness in the case, his testimony is competent for all purposes, although it may relate to transactions with a person since deceased, which prove to be involved in or to affect the matter in dispute."

The above interpretation of the law is approved in Angell v. Hester, 64 Mo. 144; Ring v. Jamison, 66 Mo. 429; Ashbrook v. Letcher, 41 Mo. App. 374.

In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien on the property of a deceased person, the lienor is not competent to prove his contract with the decedent. Gunther v. Bennett, 72 Md. 384; Ca-hill v. Elliott, 54 Mo. App. 387. And where the lienor is dead, the contractor who employed him, and who is a party defendant, is not competent for the owner of the property. Hommel v. Lewis, 104 Pa. St. 465.

In an action upon a bond against an executor, where the defense was the alteration of the instrument after its execution, it was held that the plaintiff might not testify that he saw it in the hands of his attorney shortly before its execution by the deceased, and that it then contained the clause claimed to have been interpolated. Pease v. Barnett, 30 Hun (N. Y.) 525.

In an action against the sureties in a bond, the principal obligor being dead, the plaintiff is not competent as to any conversation with the deceased, in the absence of the sureties. Henry v. Tiffany, 5 Ill. App. 548.

Where a grantor has conveyed the

In an action by an executor or administrator, an intervenor who bases his claim to the fund or property in controversy upon a contract with the deceased, is not competent to prove it, as he is in effect seeking a judgment against the decedent's estate.¹ But in a contest between a judgment creditor of a deceased person and the claimant of property sought to be taken on execution against the estate, both plaintiff and the claimant are competent witnesses because the issue is between them.²

Where a contract or transaction, one of the parties to which is same land twice to different grantees, and the former of his grantees is dead, he is not a competent witness for the other in an action against the heirs of the deceased grantee to avoid the prior conveyance. McCann v. Atherton, 106 Ill. 31.

In an action by a widow against her deceased husband's administrator, to recover the proceeds of her property disposed of by the deceased, she is not competent to prove the agreement between her and her husband under which she brings her action. Palmer v. Hanna, 6 Colo. 55.

In a suit against executors and devisees, to set aside a deed alleged to have been procured by the testator, by fraud, the plaintiff is not a competent witness for himself. Montgomery v. Simpson, 31 N. J. Eq. 1.

In Virginia, a witness who is interested in the event of the action is not disqualified if he was not a party to the contract or other transaction which is the subject of investigation, though one of the original parties thereto be dead, insane, or otherwise rendered incompetent. Simmons v. Simmons, 33 Gratt. (Va.) 461; Wager v. Barbour, 84 Va. 419; Hall v. Rixey, 84 Va. 790; Knick v. Knick, 75 Va. 12. Compare Boyd v. Jennings, 46 Ill. App. 290.

In Carter v. Hale, 32 Gratt. (Va.) 115, which was an action by the obligee in a bond against the obligor and one of his sureties, the other being dead, it was held that the obligor was incompetent to prove that he had himself paid it. The court rested its decision on the ground that the plaintiff was disqualified in his own behalf by reason of the death of one of the sureties, and, that being true, no party to the contract should be permitted to testify in the case. If this is a correct interpretation of the statute, it is difficult to understand the reason for its enactment.

The transaction proposed to be proved was strictly between parties who were living at the time of the trial, and the deceased surety had taken no part in it; and, besides, it is difficult to see why the plaintiff should be prohibited from testifying in rebuttal of the obligor's testimony, even if he were incompetent in his own behalf in the first instance. The case is cited as law in Hall v. Rixey, 84 Va. 792. Compare Grigsby v. Simpson, 28 Gratt. (Va.) 348.

The assignee of the contract or other cause of action is, after the death of his assignor, protected from the testimony of the other party thereto as to transactions and conversations with the deceased. Hollister v. Young, 41 Vt. 156; DeCoursey v. Johnston, 134 Pa. St. 328.

A party to a contract is not competent for himself in a contest with the representative of a deceased assignee thereof. Gamble v. Hepburn, 90 Pa. St. 439.

But in Parker v. Maxwell, 45 Minn. 1, it was held that, in an action by or against the personal representative of the deceased assignee of a contract, the opposing party is competent to prove that the contract was tainted with usury in its inception.

In New Jersey, it is held that, where neither party to an action represents a deceased person, though one of the parties to the transaction, out of which the suit grows, is dead, the living party is competent to speak as a witness as to what was said and done by the other. Lehigh Coal, etc., Co. v. Central R. Co., 41 N. J. Eq. 186; Palmateer v. Tilton, 40 N. J. Eq. 555. Compare Hodge v. Coriell, 44 N. J. L. 456.

In trespass quare clausum fregit, the plaintiff is competent to prove that her husband purchased the land upon which the trespass is alleged to have been committed from her father, although both of them are dead. The issue on trial is the commission of the alleged trespass. Scott v. Mathis, 72 Ga. 119.

Thus, in an action by the administrator of A, the defendant is competent to prove, in defense, a contract with B made after the death of A, although B himself was dead at the time of the trial, as it is not B's estate which is represented in the action. Weaver v. Roth, 105 Pa. St. 408.

So, a party to an action may testify concerning a contract to which he is not a party, though one of the parties to such contract is dead. Knick v. Knick, 75 Va. 12.

A party is not disqualified to testify to a transaction with a third person who is dead, when the opposing party in no way represents the estates of the deceased. Severn v. National State Bank, 18 Hun (N. Y.) 228; Love v. Stone, 56 Miss. 449; Downs v. Belden, 46 Vt. 674.

Where a person agrees to work for a devisee on the same terms as he has worked for the deviser, he is competent to prove what those terms were. Titus v. O'Connor, 18 Hun (N. Y.) 373.

In trover for property which the plaintiff had purchased from a person since deceased, the defendant claiming by subsequent purchase from the same vendor, it was held that the plaintiff was competent to prove the contract between the deceased and himself, as the contract was collateral to the cause of action in which the decedent's estate was not interested; the real cause of action being the unlawful conversion of the property by the defendant. Downs v. Belden, 46 Vt. 674. Compare Banister v. Oviatt, 64 Vt. 580.

Where the defendant, an administrator, traverses the plaintiff's affidavit on which an attachment was granted, the plaintiff is competent on the trial of that issue, although the contract sued on was made with the defendant's intestate. Ouzts v. Seabrook, 47 Ga. 359.

On the trial of a will contest, one who had made a contract with the testator to support him for life, in consideration of certain property conveyed to him, is competent to prove such contract, though it is recited and confirmed by the will, since it is not in issue and on trial. Holman v. Boyce, 65 Vt. 318.

In Missouri, the witness is not excluded unless he is both a party to the contract sued on and a party to the issue on trial. Looker v. Davis, 47 Mo. 140; Pritchett v. Reynolds, 21 Mo. App. 674.

But it is not absolutely necessary that the witness be a party to the record where the other original party to the contract is dead. The testimony of the survivor will be excluded, whether he is a party to the record or not, where the result of his testimony will be equally beneficial to him in either case. Meier v. Thieman, 90 Mo. 433.

Where both the original parties to the contract are dead, the heirs of one may testify concerning it against the estate of the other. Martin v. Jones, 72 Mo. 24.

But if the witness is both a party to the suit and to the contract sued on, his mouth is closed as to transactions with the deceased party to the contract. Hughes v. Israel, 73 Mo. 538; Chapman v. Where the plaintiff claims property through a sale by A, and the defendant through a sale by the administrator of A, the alleged contract of sale to the plaintiff comes directly and not collaterally in issue, and the plaintiff is not competent to prove it. Hall v. Hamblett, 51 Vt. 589.

In ejectment by one claiming title under a deceased person against one claiming by adverse possession, where the issue was as to whether the defendant held under the deceased and had recognized his title, it was held that the defendant was not competent in his own behalf, as his transactions with the decedent relating to the title were directly in issue. Hollister v. Young, 41 Vt. 156.

2. Mosher v. Butler, 31 Ohio St. 190.

In Goodlett v. Kelly, 74 Ala. 218, the court said: "The complainant, Goodlett, is clearly not a competent witness, in the present suit, as to the trade or exchange of lands alleged to have taken place between himself and Mrs. Hansell during her lifetime. He is excluded by the provisions of section 3058 of the code of 1876 as it has been repeatedly construed by the past decisions of this court. This land trade, for the specific performance of which the bill is filed, was a transaction with the deceased involving many statements made by her as to its terms and conditions. If the suit were one directly against the estate of Mrs. Hansell, the complainant's testimony would be excluded by the very letter of the statute. Code, § 3058. It would be prejudicial to the rights of the decedent, whose estate might be liable to diminution by reason of it. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Sledge, 62 Ala. 566. The statute has been uniformly construed to embrace many cases within its spirit and purpose which do not fall within its letter. Beneficiaries, who are not directly parties of record, have been held to be excluded for incompetency. Drew v. Simmons, 58 Ala. 463; McCrary v. Rash, 60 Ala. 374; Keel v. Larkin, 72 Ala. 493. In a suit by a transferee, the transferor, though not a party to the action, has been excluded. Louis v. Easton, 50 Ala. 470. And, generally, the statute is construed to protect not only the estate of a decedent, where the purpose or result of the evidence would be to diminish it, but also the rights of heirs or others who claim in succession under the decedent. Boykin v. Smith, 65 Ala. 294; Key v. Jones, 52 Ala. 238."

Where the purchaser of land seeks a specific performance of a contract of sale made by an executor under a testamentary power, such executor having died, the purchaser is not competent to prove the contract. Palmateer v. Tilton, 39 N. J. Eq. 40.

But in Campbell v. Mayes, 38 Iowa 9, the administrator of the deceased grantor was made a party defendant along with the heirs, but, as he was not a necessary party, the action was dismissed as to him and prosecuted against the heirs. It was held that the plaintiff and his wife were both competent to prove the contract, on the ground that the defendants were not parties entitled to the protection of the statute of that state. The court said: "Since the administrator was not a necessary party, the action as against him might properly be dismissed without prejudice as against the others. When it was dismissed as to the administrator he was no longer an adverse party, and that fact then ceased to operate as a reason for excluding the depositions. Nor is this action, in any ordinary legal or practicable sense, a proceeding 'in relation to the settlement of estates of deceased persons,' and, hence, for this reason, the depositions could not be excluded. The depositions, when taken, were competent as against all the present defendants, and hence they are competent now. In this respect they are different from a deposition of an interested witness under

In an action by a third person, for whose benefit an agreement was made to enforce it against the obligor, the plaintiff is competent in his own behalf, although the person who made the agreement for his benefit is dead.¹ But, in such case, the defendant is not a competent witness as to the transaction between himself and the deceased.²

(b) Parties to Commercial Paper.—The maker of a promissory note is not, after the death of the payee, competent to testify to any transaction or conversation with the deceased which may tend to extinguish or diminish his own liability on the note.³ Neither is a maker competent for a co-maker,⁴ though no summons was served on him and he is not technically a party to the record.⁵

the common-law rule when interest would disqualify; for then the subsequent removal of interest by release or otherwise would not make the deposition competent; it being incompetent when taken, it would remain so. At the common law, the incompetence inhered in the witness, and he must first be made competent and then testify. Under our statute the witness is competent, and the incompetence of the deposition attaches by reason of the party, and when the party is dismissed, the incompetence is removed. It is true, as argued by appellee's counsel, that the reason underlying the statute applies with equal force when the heirs of a deceased person are defendants, as where the executor is a defendant. But courts do not apply a statute to all cases embraced within the reason of it, but only to those within the language of it."

Thus, where a third person had agreed with the maker of a note that he would pay it at maturity, and the payee sued such person to collect the same, it was held that the plaintiff was competent in his own behalf, notwithstanding the previous death of the maker of the note. *Amonett v. 5. Jenks v. Opp, 43 Ind. 108.

In Church v. Howard, 79 N. Y. 420, where it appeared that one of the defendants did not answer, it was held that he was, nevertheless, an incompetent witness for his co-defendant. The court said: "The question whether the witness was not a party within this provision, and hence incompetent, is not free from difficulty, but however that may be, we think that he was a person interested in the event, and, therefore, incompetent to testify as to any personal transaction between himself and the intestate, and his testimony was improperly received. He was interested in avoiding a judgment against the defendant Howard, the surety, which would entitle such surety to prosecute and obtain a judgment against the defendant Fargo, which he might be compelled to pay. He would be affected by the legal operation and effect of the judgment, and the record would be legal evidence in an action by the surety to recover the amount paid for his principal."

The maker is not competent in his own behalf in an action on the note by an assignee thereof; the original payee being dead at the time of the trial.¹

1. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Wells, 53 Vt. 14; Angell v. Hester, 64 Mo. 142; Ashbrook v. Letcher, 41 Mo. App. 369; Byrne v. McDonald, 1 Allen (Mass.) 293.

In Hurry v. Kline, 93 Ky. 358, the court said: "If Irvin had died owner of the note, and this was an action by his personal representative to recover judgment thereon, or even if appellant had, by reason of the assignment to him, recourse on decedent's estate, the testimony in question would, we think, be certainly incompetent. But it seems to be conceded that if appellant ever had such recourse, it has been lost; and so the estate of the deceased assignor will not be affected by determination of this action one way or another. Nevertheless, we think there can be, according to the plain language used, no question of cases like this being comprehended by the exceptions to, and modifications of, section 605, that are contained in subsection 2, section 606, for it is there provided, in explicit terms, that no person shall testify for himself concerning any verbal statement of, transaction with, or act done or omitted to be done by, one who is dead when the testimony is offered to be given, except under circumstances and conditions recited, none of which exist in this case. Yet, that is precisely what appellee did do on trial of this action in the lower court, for the statements of, and transactions with, the deceased Irvin, concerning which he was permitted to testify, had a direct and, without doubt, decisive bearing in his favor upon the only issue involved. Before thus disregarding or restricting the natural and obvious meaning of the words of a statute, the court should be convinced an imperative reason for doing so exists. We do not now perceive any reason for excluding such testimony in an action by the personal representative of one who is dead, that does not exist in full force in a case like this. The issue here presented is one of fact, involving an inquiry for the simple truth, not at all changed or affected by death, but to be sought for according to rules of evidence intended to operate justly, equally, and mutually between the parties, no matter who they may be. It does not, therefore, make any difference whether the personal representative of a deceased payee or the assignee of a note be party plaintiff in an action to recover on it; to permit the defendant to testify for himself concerning what was said or done by the decedent, thereby affecting the issue involved, without the presence or power of anyone to speak for the dead man, would give him an unjust and unfair advantage in one case just as much as, no more than, the other, which the legislature did not intend for him to have, but carefully and particularly framed subsection 2, section 606, to prevent."

The same rule obtains as to the obligor in a bond which has been assigned; the original obligee being dead. Grigsby v. Simpson, 28 Gratt. (Va.) 348.

Neither is the original obligee in a bond competent for his assignee, the obligor being dead. Woodhouse v. Simmons, 73 N. Car. 30.

The maker of a note is not competent to prove payment to the payee since deceased, the latter having transferred the note to the plaintiff before his death. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Wells, 53 Vt. 14. Compare Barnes v. Dow, 59 Vt. 530. Neither is he competent in a suit on a note which has been lawfully sold by the administrator of the deceased payee. Reynolds v. Linard, 95 Ind. 48. Nor in a suit brought on a note by a legatee of the deceased payee. Peacock v. Albin, 39 Ind. 25.

In an action upon a promissory note, by the indorsee against the maker, the plaintiff is competent to testify to the fact and circumstances of the indorsement, though the indorser is dead, since the defense is not made in the interest of the decedent's estate.¹ And in action by an indorser against a prior indorser, the plaintiff may testify in his own behalf, notwithstanding the death of the maker.² One claiming to be a surety in a note may not, after the death of the principal, testify to transactions with him which show the witness to be a surety and not a principal obligor.³ The survivor of two joint makers may not testify that his deceased co-maker signed the note sued on, in the absence of a showing that the deceased was a surety and that the witness is liable to reimburse the estate in case of a judgment against such surety.⁴

Where the defense to an action on a note was that it was forged, the alleged maker was permitted to testify that the signature was not his, notwithstanding the note had been transferred and the original payee was dead. Saratoga County Bank v. Leach, 37 Hun (N. Y.) 336.

When the maker is sued by the administrator of a deceased assignee of a note, he is not competent to prove a want of consideration. Weatherbee v. Roots (Miss. 1895), 16 So. Rep. 902.

In Mississippi, it has been held that in an action against the maker by an assignee of the deceased payee, the defendant is a competent witness to prove payment to the payee before the transfer. Cole v. Gardner, 67 Miss. 670. And the same has been held in Georgia, where the note was transferred after maturity. Woodson v. Jones, 92 Ga. 662.

But where one partner sold his interest in a note payable to the firm to his co-partner and subsequently died, it was held that the maker was not competent to testify that he had paid the note to the deceased partner. McWhorter v. Sell, 66 Ga. 139.

In Wilcox v. Corwin, 117 N. Y. 500, reversing 50 Hun (N. Y.) 425, the court said: "The note was an original and direct promise moving from the maker to the payee, and its first inception was when, for a consideration, it reached her hands. There never was a time when Wheeler could have maintained an action upon it, nor had it any validity until the makers passed it over to the payee. Bullard v. Bell, 1 Mason (U. S.) 243; Thompson v. Perrine, 106 U. S. 589. To the same effect is Kitchell v. Schenck, 29 N. Y. 515; and later, Comstock v. Hier, 73 N. Y. 269; 29 Am. Rep. 142, where it was held that the maker of a note negotiating his own paper or procuring the same to be discounted, is not an assignor of the note, but by the transaction assumes the ordinary obligation of a party to negotiable paper as maker of a note, and that the transaction is an original transaction with the party taking the note. It was, therefore, decided, under section 399 of the code then in force (corresponding to the present section 829), that the indorser was a competent witness to show the transaction between himself and the makers of the note,

The principal obligor in a note is not competent for his surety to testify to transactions and communications between himself and the payee, who has since died, because the record in the action against the surety would be legal evidence in the surety's action against the witness for reimbursement.¹ In Illinois, the distinction between the strict rule of law and the more liberal rule in equity relating to the examination of parties as witnesses is preserved in this class of cases. Accordingly, in assumpsit on a promissory note by the personal representative of the deceased payee, the principal obligor is not a competent witness for his surety, to prove a valid contract for the extension of the time of payment whereby the surety is relieved from liability.² But in a suit in equity by the surety, to enjoin the prosecution of an action at law against him on such note by the personal representative of the deceased payee, the principal debtor is competent to although one of those makers had in the meantime died. To the same effect, and perhaps more exactly in point, is Converse v. Cook, 31 Hun (N. Y.) 417. So far, we agree with the court below, but there is another aspect in which the objection before us is to be viewed. It does not appear that Corwin was a surety for Wheeler, nor but that, as between themselves, each was liable to contribute to the payment of the note. It was, therefore, as the case is now presented, the interest of Wheeler to render his co-defendant liable as well as himself, and his testimony, if admissible, proved that fact, namely, the joint liability of the defendants and consequently the duty of contribution between Corwin and himself. Under these circumstances he was incompetent under the provisions of the code which excludes a person so situated from being examined in his own behalf or interest."

In Alcorn v. Cook, 101 Pa. St. 213, the court said: "The admissibility of the evidence of Branthoover for the plaintiff below is the only matter in this case which involves serious debate. The note in question purported to have been executed by Alcorn and Branthoover jointly. The suit was brought against the latter and John G. McCauley, the executor of Alcorn's estate. This case, then, falls within the proviso to the act of 1869, and must be determined by those rules of evidence which were of force previously to the approval of that act. But, under these rules, Branthoover's testimony ought to have been excluded, first, because his oath, as proposed in the offer, would have the effect to relieve him of one-half of the obligation in suit by casting that much of it upon the estate which he represented. He was thus personally interested against that estate, hence, not competent for the purpose proposed. Bellas v. Fagely, 19 Pa. St. 276; Hogebloom v. Gibbs, 88 Pa. St. 235. Admitting, however, that Alcorn was but surety in the note, and that, because of that fact, Branthoover had nothing to gain by charging the estate, yet, as he was personally a party to the record, he could not be made a witness against the estate without the consent of its representative. Wolf v. Fink, 1 Pa. St. 435; 44 Am. Dec. 141; Swanzy v. Parker, 50 Pa. St. 441; 88 Am. Dec. 549."

In Indiana, if an action is brought against the representative of the deceased maker and a surviving maker, and they set up separate defenses, it is within the discretion of the trial court to permit the survivor to testify. Meyer v. Morris, 78 Ind. 558.

prove a contract with the deceased for an extension of the time of payment.¹

In an action by a surety who has paid a promissory note to recover the amount so paid from the estate of a deceased surety, the maker of the note is without interest in the event of the action, and is, therefore, competent to prove that the plaintiff was not a co-surety, but a surety of the deceased.² But in an action by the personal representative of a surety who has paid the debt against the principal debtor and the co-sureties, the latter are not competent witnesses.³ And where the action is against the maker and an indorser, then neither defendant is competent for the other.⁴ In a contest between the estate of the deceased payee and an indorser, which can in no way affect the maker's liability on the note, he may be a witness.⁵

1. Bradshaw v. Combs, 102 Ill. 428, affirming 6 Ill. App. 115. See White v. Ross, 147 Ill. 435.

In Dodgson v. Henderson, 113 Ill. 363, the court said: "It is apparent from the allegations of the bill, as well as from the evidence introduced in support of the bill, that complainant could not make a defense to the action at law, for the reason that Allen, who was the only person who knew that an agreement had been made to extend the time of payment of the note, was not a competent witness in the action at law. Section 2, ch. 51, of the Rev. Stats. of 1874, p. 488, expressly excludes a defendant from testifying in an action brought by an executor, like the one brought against Allen and Henderson. Resort to a court of equity was, therefore, a necessity—the only tribunal where relief could be obtained. In Bradshaw v. Combs, 102 Ill. 428, we held that a bill in equity was an appropriate remedy in a case of this character, and that the principal on the promissory note, on a bill filed against an administrator or executor by the surety, was a competent witness. As to complainant's right to file the bill, and upon the question of the competency of Allen as a witness, the case cited is conclusive, and no further notice need be taken of that question."

the plaintiff's intestate, and that the note was given by the purchaser in part payment therefor, being made payable to him instead of the deceased in order to show that he had properly discharged the trust; but it was held that he was not competent to give such evidence. Sallade v. Gerlach, 132 N. Y. 548.

In an action by the representative of a deceased indorsee against an indorser, the latter is not competent to prove that he received no notice of protest. Louis v. Weisenham, 1 Mo. App. 222.

5. Guery v. Kinsler, 3 S. Car. 423; Hayden v. McKnight, 45 Ga. 147.

In Freeman v. Bigham, 65 Ga. 587, the court said: "Sterling was no party to the indorsement. Essentially, it is a separate contract from his own as the maker of the note, and he was competent to testify in regard to all that transpired between Neal and Bigham. He has no interest in the issue. Before and since the Evidence Act, he would be competent; before, because he has no interest, having the note to pay, if ever he is able, either to Neal or to Bigham, and to Neal sooner than to Bigham, because Neal has already a judgment against him, and Bigham has none; and since the Evidence Act, because he is no party to the contract or cause of action, which is the indorsement. And every indorsement is a new contract."

In Fuller v. Lendrum, 58 Iowa 356, the court said: "It is objected that Lyon is not a competent witness to transactions between himself and Hall, because of his interest in the event of this suit. We think he has no disqualifying interest. It is not claimed

So where the maker of a note is dead the payee is not competent to testify as to transactions with the deceased which may affect his liability on the note.¹

(3) Creditors.—A creditor is not a competent witness to support his claim against the estate of his deceased debtor.² And where a voluntary payment of a claim is made by the personal representative, the person to whom it is made is not competent to support the claim when the item is contested in the settlement of the representative's accounts.³ A creditor of an insolvent estate is not competent for the personal representative in an action prosecuted against the government for the benefit of the creditors.⁴

by anyone that Lyon has paid the judgment. It is still in full force as to him, and he neither gains nor loses anything by the result, whatever it may be. If the judgment is held to be valid against Fuller, Lyon's rights are in no manner affected, and if Fuller be held to be discharged, the judgment is still in force against Lyon."

In some jurisdictions, a surviving party to a series of transactions constituting a running account, may verify his books of account by his own suppletory oath that they are his books of original entry of the contemporaneous transactions therein set down.¹ But in other jurisdictions, this is not permitted on the ground that it would be admitting the testimony of the surviving party concerning personal transactions with a person since deceased.²

In Strickland v. Wynn, 51 Ga. 600, the court said: "The allowing the defendant to state under oath that the book which he proposed to offer in evidence was his original book of entry, was not such testimony or evidence in relation to the cause of action in issue or on trial as is contemplated by the act of 1866, embodied in the 3854th section of the code. It was not the intention of that act to restrict the admission of evidence, but to enlarge the rule for its admission. It would have been competent for the defendant to have identified his original book of entry by his own oath before the passage of the act of 1866, as much so as to prove the service of a notice by his own oath. There was no error in allowing the defendant to identify his original book of entry by his own oath at the trial, notwithstanding the complainant was dead."

In Leggett v. Glover, 71 N. Car. 211, the court said: "We are of the opinion that it was no part of the purpose of the late statute, Code of Civ. Proc., § 343, to narrow the competency of parties to be witnesses, but to widen the same, and that it must be read with the old statute, as if they all together provided that a party should be competent as a witness generally, but he should not be permitted to testify of transactions with a person since deceased, whose representative was a party, except as heretofore he was permitted to testify under the book-debt law; the effect of which is that the book-debt law stands unaltered."

But where the entries in such book are not intelligible in themselves, and do not in substance set forth the facts which constitute a right of action in favor of the witness against the deceased, any explanation of the entries therein must come from disinterested witnesses. A party to the transaction may not thus, in effect, make himself a witness generally, merely refreshing his own memory by the entries, instead of verifying the books by his oath. Silver v. Worcester, 72 Me. 322.

The son and heir at law of a deceased person is competent for his father's personal representative to prove that a book produced is one of his father's books of original entry, and that the accounts therein, charged to the opposing party's intestate, are in his father's handwriting. Keener v. Zartman, 144 Pa. St. 179.

2. Davis v. Seaman, 64 Hun (N. Y.) 572.

In Dismukes v. Tolson, 67 Ala. 386, the court, after explaining the purpose of the statute, said: "Applying these principles, we do not think that the defendant Tolson was a competent witness under the statute to prove the various book entries to which he was permitted to testify in the court below. These entries were a mere written declaration of the fact that the defendants had paid for the corn which they purchased from the deceased in his lifetime. They were contemporaneous with the principal fact of payment, and are regarded in the eye of the law as verbal acts, being part and parcel of the res gestæ. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 120. They clearly constituted a part of the transaction with the deceased, and come within the statutory prohibition. To allow a defendant to prove such entries by his own oath, against the estate of the decedent, would be to permit him to accomplish indirectly what he is prohibited from doing directly by the express mandate of the statute."

A party is prohibited from testifying that his account with one now deceased was correct, as such testimony is, in substance and effect, a statement that the services had been rendered under a contract or upon request. Boyd v. Cauthen, 28 S. Car. 72.

and wife is such that, in the absence of a statute expressly removing the disability, where one of them is rendered incompetent to testify by reason of the death of the opposing party, the other is also incompetent.¹ In some jurisdictions, however, incompetency from this cause is removed where the witness has no personal interest in the matter in controversy other than that arising from the marital relation, and the testimony proposed is of such a character as to be no violation of the confidence of such relation.²

In a real action affecting the title to the husband's property, it seems that the wife's inchoate right of dower, if the husband's title is established, is a sufficient interest in the event of the action to exclude her testimony where the opposing party sues or defends as the representative of a deceased person. Erwin v. Erwin, 54 Hun (N. Y.) 166; Baldwin v. Walker, 67 Hun (N. Y.) 651; 23 N. Y. Supp. 1149; Steele v. Ward, 30 Hun (N. Y.) 555. But the husband's right of curtesy initiate is not a sufficient interest to exclude him. Cooper v. Monroe, 77 Hun (N. Y.) 1.

In a suit by a wife against the heirs of the grantee, to set aside a conveyance of land, in which she joined with her husband, on the ground that she was induced to execute it by fraud and duress, neither she nor her husband is a competent witness to support such allegations. Crane v. Crane, 81 Ill. 165; Warrick v. Hull, 102 Ill. 280. It has been held, however, that if she brings a suit to set aside a conveyance of her own land made during coverture, she may testify that she executed it under duress of threats made by her husband since deceased. Washington City First Nat. Bank v. Eccleston, 48 Md. 145.

In Johnson v. Fry, 88 Va. 695, it was held that where parties are disqualified by reason of being husband and wife, the opposing party might not testify. But see Acts of Assembly of Virginia, 1893-1894, ch. 619, approved March 5, 1894.

But where a surviving trustee brought an action against the representatives of a deceased co-trustee, to recover property alleged to have been purchased by the deceased trustee with trust funds, it was held that the husband of a deceased cestui que trust, whose children were entitled to a share of the property if it were recovered, was competent to testify to conversations with the deceased trustee. Conklin v. Snider, 104 N. Y. 641.

A wife is not a competent attesting witness to a will which contains a devise to her husband. Sullivan v. Sullivan, 106 Mass. 474; 8 Am. Rep. 356.

In Iowa, the husband of a devisee is a good subscribing witness to the will. Bates v. Officer, 70 Iowa 343; Hawkins v. Hawkins, 54 Iowa 443.

Where a married woman sues an executor by her husband as next friend, the husband may testify in her behalf. Trahern v. Colburn, 63 Md. 99.

Where a husband sues in his common law right for the wages of his wife, she may testify to the circumstances of her employment, notwithstanding the death of her employer. Porter v. Dunn, 131 N. Y. 314.

(5) Donor and Donee.—In a suit to set aside a gift of property, the donor is not, after the death of the donee, a competent witness in his own behalf as to the facts and circumstances relating to the transaction.¹ One who claims personal property as a gift from a person since deceased is not competent to support his title against the claim of the personal representative of such deceased person.² Neither is one who claims real estate under a deed of gift from a person since deceased, competent to defend his title against the heirs of the grantor.³ The heirs and distributees of the estate of a deceased donor are not competent to defeat a gift made by him, thereby increasing the assets of the estate for their own benefit.⁴

But where the disqualification of the one disqualifies the other, she may not so testify. Ashworth v. Grubbs, 47 Iowa 354.

Where a note given for the purchase-money of land sold by a married woman was made payable to the husband and wife, and the husband handed to his wife, before his death, it was held that this was not a gift within the meaning of the rule, because the note was already the property of the wife. Magee v. Burch, 108 Mo. 336.

But in a contest between the son and the widow of a deceased person, it has been held that the son is competent to prove a gift of personal property to him by his father. White v. White, 71 Ga. 670.

In Durham v. Shannon, 116 Ind. 403, it was held that the plaintiff in an action of replevin, brought to recover personal property purchased by the defendant at an administrator's sale, was competent to prove a

In Keener v. Zartman, 144 Pa. St. 179, it appeared that the defendant's intestate had conveyed certain real estate to his son without a valuable consideration, and that the conveyance was made after the alleged debt to the plaintiff's intestate was contracted. In an action to recover the amount claimed to be due the creditor's estate, it was alleged, and not denied, that defendant's intestate left no personal property; and it was held that, upon the trial of the cause, the son to whom the gift had been made was not competent on behalf of his father's administrator, because, if the plaintiff recovered, the land given to him by his father might be taken in satisfaction of the judgment.

It has been held that heirs at law are competent to prove declarations of the ancestor made at the time when he put them in possession of property with which it is sought to charge them as advancements. O'Neal v. Breecheen, 5 Baxt. (Tenn.) 604.

In Texas, it has been held that a son who claims real estate by parol gift from his father, since deceased, the gift having been followed by possession and improvement, is competent, as against one claiming under a conveyance from his father, to prove the transaction between himself and his deceased father, because he does not claim the land as heir or legal representative of his father. Wootters v. Hale, 83 Tex. 563.

4. Fort v. Davis, 67 Ala. 481.

(6) Heirs, Devisees, etc.—Where the probate of a will is contested by the heirs and next of kin on the ground of fraud, undue influence, or want of testamentary capacity, the contestants are not competent in their own behalf as to personal transactions and communications with the testator.¹ And in such contest, devisees and legatees are not competent to testify to personal transactions and communications with the decedent preceding, attending, or succeeding the execution of the will.²

Where the probate of a codicil is contested, a residuary legatee of the will is not competent for the contestants as to transactions and conversations with the testator. Matter of Dunham's Will, 121 N. Y. 575.

The testimony of the proponent claiming an interest under the will, should not be excluded where the contestant is not the heir, devisee, legatee, or representative of the deceased. Brown v. Bell, 58 Mich. 58.

But they are not competent to testify to the due execution of the will. Miltenberger v. Miltenberger, 78 Mo. 27.

A legatee who has released his legacy is competent to prove personal transactions and conversations with the testator in behalf of the proponent of the will. Matter of Wilson's Will, 103 N. Y. 374; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239; Grimm v. Tittman, 113 Mo. 56.

The widow who is named in the will as executrix, and is also a legatee, is not competent in support of the will when it is contested by the heirs. Lane v. Lane, 95 N. Y. 501.

But she is competent to prove that the will was found among the testator's valuable papers. Such evidence is not of a personal transaction with him. Cornelius v. Brawley, 109 N. Car. 542.

Ernest*, 32 Fla. 18; and Alabama, Henry v. Hall (Ala. 1895), 17 So. Rep. 187.

And in New Jersey, where none but parties to the record are excluded, it was held that a beneficiary under the will was not, as a proponent thereof, a party to an action within the meaning of the statute, and might, therefore, testify in support of the will. Mackin v. Mackin, 37 N. J. Eq. 528.

And it has been held that in a contest over the probate of a will, a devisee is competent as to transactions between

In an action by or against the personal representative of a deceased person, it is generally held that heirs and next of kin whose interest is not opposed to that of the estate are competent witnesses for the representative.¹ But in a contest among the heirs themselves concerning the distribution of the property of the estate, the parties are all incompetent as to transactions and communications with their common ancestor.² And where both

But where the contest is between the representative and a son of the deceased person, concerning the title to personal property, the son may not testify to transactions with his father in support of his own claim. Chambers v. Hill, 34 Mich. 523.

In New York, it seems that those entitled to distributive shares of the estate are not competent witnesses for the representative. LeClare v. Stewart, 8 Hun (N. Y.) 127. And the same is true in Alabama. McCrary v. Rash, 60 Ala. 374. See also Swift v. Martin, 19 Mo. App. 488.

Thus, in an action by an administrator to set aside an assignment of a bond and mortgage by his intestate, on the ground of mental incapacity of the assignor at the time of the assignment, the next of kin are not competent to testify to communications with the deceased tending to show his feebleness of mind. Holcomb v. Holcomb, 95 N. Y. 324. But compare Freeman v. Spalding, 12 N. Y. 373, decided under section 399 of the Code of Procedure.

Where it appeared that the ancestor had, shortly before his death, executed an assignment of all his property, including the claim in action, for the benefit of his creditors, from which it was to be inferred that his estate was insolvent and that there would be nothing to be distributed among the next of kin, it was held that a son of the intestate was competent in behalf of the estate, as his interest was at most uncertain and contingent. Lathrop v. Hopkins, 29 Hun (N. Y.) 608.

Prior to 1866, a plaintiff was not prohibited, by section 399 of the New York Code of Procedure, from testifying to a transaction with a deceased partner as against a surviving partner. Tremper v. Conklin, 44 N. Y. 58.

But in Messimer v. McCray, 113 Mo. 382, it was held that where a wife joins her husband in a conveyance of his land they are not joint contractors within the meaning of the rule, and the grantee, or one claiming under him, is not competent to prove the transaction after the death of the husband, though the wife be living. The court said: "It is contended he is not disqualified under our rulings; that where a contract is entered into by a party with two persons, and only one of the persons is dead, the other party is not disqualified. Fulkerson v. Thornton, 68 Mo. 468; Nugent v. Curran, 77 Mo. 323. A sufficient answer to this contention is that the contract sought to be set up as a defense in this action was not between James L. Orr, senior, and two persons, but between him and one person, Charles C. Birch, the only person who could enter into contract with Orr, senior, by deed, the execution and delivery of which would convey the title to the premises claimed. Husband and wife ordinarily are not two persons in contemplation of law, but one person, and the husband, notwithstanding modern innovations, still remains the one person, at least so far as his own property is concerned. It does not follow because a woman relinquishes her inchoate right of dower in the land of her husband, in a deed by which he purports to have sold and conveyed his land to another, that she is a party to the contract between the vendor and vendee, grantor and grantee; or competent to testify on the subject of such contract, which is only consummated when the deed is delivered by the husband. The ruling in the cases cited is obviously limited not only to cases where there are really two parties to the contract, but where the surviving party to the contract is competent to speak on the subject as a witness, which, Orr, senior, being dead, the plaintiff in this case would not be competent to do for the same reason (Birch being dead) that Orr, junior, is incompetent."

But in such case, the surviving party's examination must be confined to such portion of the transaction as was had personally with the agent. Reherd v. Clem, 86 Va. 374. The presence of an agent of the deceased does not render the opposing party competent to testify to a conversation with the deceased. Hutchinson v. Cleary, 3 N. Dak. 270.

agent is not uniform. In a number of the states, it is held that after the death of an agent through whom a contract was made, the other party thereto may not, of his own motion, testify to any transaction relative to the matter in controversy, had with the agent personally in the absence of the principal.¹ In other jurisdictions, a party is not precluded from testifying to transactions and conversations with the agent of the opposing party, notwithstanding such agent is dead at the time of the trial.² The statutes in some of the states provide that where an officer or agent of a corporation, through whom a contract with the corporation is made or with whom a transaction was had, is dead at the time of the trial, the other party to such contract or transaction may not testify thereto in his own behalf, unless the matters in issue are known to some other officer or agent of such corporation.³ And, conversely, where the other party to the transaction

In *Lemon v. The officers and members of a benefit society, though liable to pay assessments, are competent to testify in behalf of their society, when it is sued on an insurance policy by one who is named as a beneficiary therein. In Hamill v. Supreme Council, 152 Pa. St. 542, in which it was contended that a member of the society was incompetent to testify for the defense on the ground that he was liable to pay assessments, and that the plaintiff represented the interest of the deceased policy holder, the court said: "If this contention were true in fact, the question would come within the operation of the 5th section of the act of May 23d, 1887, and the witnesses, would be incompetent. It is equally true that if that section is inapplicable to the case, the witnesses were clearly competent, for the reason that competency is now the rule, and incompetency only exists by force of the exceptions contained in the statute. It is very plain to us that the exception of the 5th section of the statute is inapplicable, for the very simple reason that no right of the deceased to the subject in controversy has passed, either by his act or by the act of the law, to the plaintiff. The deceased never had any right to the benefit which was to be paid to his wife. It was hers and hers only, payable to her exclusively, and, of course, no one but she could maintain any action for its recovery. She is a living person, and no other person ever had or could have the right to recover this money. As between her and the defendant, there is a clear contention as to whether the funds shall be paid by the defendant to her, and there is no contention, and cannot be, upon that subject, as between the defendant and the legal representatives of the deceased. The plaintiff is not such a representative. She takes, if she takes at all, in her own right alone as the beneficiary of the fund, and she does not represent any right or interest of her deceased husband in the fund. She represents herself and her own rights only in the subject in controversy."

Where one of the original parties to a contract is dead, the agent of the surviving party, who acted for his principal solely and has no personal interest in the transaction, is a competent witness for the survivor.¹ But where an agent has acted in his own name, without disclosing that of his principal, he will not be permitted to testify concerning the transaction after the death of the other party thereto.²

Bones, 75 Ga. 246, it appeared that a lease of certain iron works had been rescinded, and it was claimed that the witness who subsequently had charge thereof contracted the debt sued on as agent of the owners, one of whom was dead at the time of the trial. In reference to the competency of the witness, the court said: "We do not think that this witness was competent to testify in this case, under section 3854 of the code, because he fell within the first exception to that section: 'Where one of the parties to the contract or cause of action in issue or on trial is dead, the other party shall not be permitted to testify in his own favor.' The issue in the case was whether the contract of lease between the plaintiffs in error had been rescinded, and whether the debt sued on by Bones was made by W. E. Jackson, junior, individually or as agent for plaintiffs in error. These are the main issues on trial, and W. E. Jackson's representatives are parties thereto. W. E. Jackson, junior, is also a party to these issues, and he is directly interested in the same so as to relieve himself from liability, and to place it upon the plaintiffs in error. He would not be a competent witness at common law, and he is not relieved by the Evidence Act of 1866, as he falls within the first exceptions to that act."

In Darwin v. Keigher, 45 Minn. 64, the court said: "Our statute extends the rule of the common law as to the competency of witnesses, and in general neither the parties to an action, nor those who may be interested in the event of it, are excluded from being witnesses. This general rule is, however, qualified by the provision that 'it shall not be competent for any party to an action, or interested in the event thereof, to give evidence therein or concerning any conversation with, or admission by, a deceased or insane party or person, relative to any matter at issue between the parties.' Gen. Stats. 1878, ch. 73, § 8. The plaintiff's agent was competent to testify as to the contract, unless he was either a party to this action or was interested in the event of it, and, hence, within the above recited statute. He was not a party but a stranger to the action, nor was he, so far as appears, interested in the event thereof. The meaning of this language used in respect to the competency of persons to testify, was well understood when the rules of the common law were changed by statute, and it bears the same meaning in the statute as when used under the common law with reference to the same subject."

In jurisdictions where agents of corporations are excluded after the death of opposing parties, an exception to this rule must be noted where the surviving party to the contract is a corporation. See Baer v. Pfaff, 44 Mo. App. 35.

In Indiana, it is provided by section 500, Rev. Stats. 1881, that no person who shall have acted as an agent in the making or continuing of a contract with any person who may have died, shall be a competent witness in any suit upon or involving such contract, as to matters occurring prior to the death of such decedent, on behalf of the principal to such contract against the legal representative or heirs of the decedent, unless he shall be called by such heirs or legal representatives. See Piper v. Fosher, 121 Ind. 412; Devol v. Dye, 123 Ind. 321. The rule is the same in Georgia. Thompson v. Ray, 92 Ga. 540.

2. In Standford v. Horwitz, 49 Md.

f. TRANSACTIONS WITH THIRD PERSONS—(1) Between the Witness and a Third Person.—The death of one party to a cause of action does not preclude the other party from testifying to transactions or communications between himself and a third person living at the time of the trial,¹ and, unless the statute expressly prohibits it, either party to an action may testify to a 525, it appeared that the witness had signed a mortgage and certain promissory notes in his own name. It was claimed at the trial, however, that he acted as agent for his son, but it was held that his testimony should be excluded, the other party to the transaction being dead. The court said: "Our evidence laws, as construed by this court, provide that when one party to a contract or cause of action is dead, the other party shall not be allowed, on his own offer, to testify in respect thereto. He cannot, by his own testimony, establish a contract in his favor against a deceased party, nor can he, by such testimony, assail one upon which he is prima facie liable to the deceased. It is too plain for argument that the purpose as well as the effect of the testimony of this witness was to assail, in part at least, the consideration of the note for $1680 in favor of the deceased, which he admitted he signed as maker, and which on its face does not disclose any agency on his part. Upon the face of the note he is undoubtedly liable to the payee therein, and he cannot escape the liability by showing that he in fact signed it as agent for his son. This proposition was fully discussed and settled in the case of Higgins v. Senior, 8 M. & W. 834."

Where the sister of the plaintiff received money from their mother as a gift, one-half of which she was to deliver to the plaintiff on demand, and the defendant induced the sister to deliver the plaintiff's share to him, it was held, in an action to recover it back, that the plaintiff was competent to prove the gift of the money to her by her mother, although the latter was dead at the time of the trial, because the defendant did not derive title from the decedent. Mason v. Prendergast, 120 N. Y. 536.

Where a deceased person had, in his lifetime, assigned a life insurance policy to his brothers, and the assignment was attacked by creditors as fraudulent, it was held that the assignees might testify to what debts they paid for the deceased in support of the consideration for the assignment, such payments being transactions between them and third persons, and not with the decedent. The court said: "The witnesses were not called upon to testify concerning a personal transaction or communication between them and the deceased person, their brother. They were asked to testify as to transactions and communications with persons other than the deceased, and as to which such third persons could testify, if need be. The statute does not, by its terms and purpose, prevent the surviving party from testifying concerning transactions and communications with third persons that may affect adversely the estate of the deceased person, or the rights of persons in and to the same." Watts v. Warren, 108 N. Car. 520.

In Hill v. Truby, 117 Pa. St. 324, the court said: "We think it was error to reject the offer to prove by Hill what occurred between him and the tax collector, on the ground of incompetency of the witness. We held, in Ash v. Guie, 97 Pa. St. 493; 39 Am. Rep. 818, that the spirit of the act of 1878 embraced the survivor of two or more who jointly contracted, and, therefore, the plaintiff could testify as to matters occurring between himself and the surviving defendants. But we did not mean to decide that he could not testify as to relevant matters which occurred between himself and strangers. There would be no propriety and no necessity for such a decision. Such matters were not excluded by any interpretation of the act of 1869, except that which declared the general incompetency of the witness. That incompetency was removed by the act of 1878 in the case of the survivor of joint obligors. It is true the act in terms qualified the witness to testify to matters having oc-transaction or conversation between himself and a third person, other than the agent of the opposing party, who is dead at the time of the trial, provided it is relevant to the matter in issue, and the legal representative of such third person is not a party to the action.¹ Where, however, the statute inhibits testimony by a curréd between the surviving party and the adverse party on the record, but that was because it was that class of matters which were specially excluded by the construction which had been given to the act of 1869, and that was the evil intended to be more particularly remedied by the act of 1878. But there could be no good reason for excluding other matters occurring between the witness and other persons who were not parties. Such exclusion had been, previously to the act of 1878, merely the result of a personal incompetency to testify at all, but when that general incompetency was removed, matters which were otherwise unobjectionable could not be excluded on that account. We are clearly of opinion, therefore, that other and indifferent matters between the witness and a stranger might be proved as well by a surviving obligor or his adversary, providing only that they were relevant to the issue trying."

In Taylor v. Duesterberg, 109 Ind. 171, the court said: "Where the contract or matter involved in the suit or proceeding is such that one of the parties to the contract or transaction is, by death, denied the privilege of testifying in relation to such matter, the policy of the statute is to close the lips of the other also in respect to such matter. Where, however, an administrator assails the title of another, such title having been acquired through a third party, in a transaction to which the decedent was a stranger, the parties to the transaction cannot be prevented from speaking in reference to such matters, even though they occurred during the lifetime of the decedent. A contract or matter in which the decedent in his lifetime never had any concern or interest, cannot be so involved in a suit by his personal representative as to preclude the parties interested in the transaction, although it may come collaterally in question, from upholding it by their own testimony. If it were otherwise, the death of a stranger, who presumably could not have testified concerning the matter if living, would close the mouths of the only persons interested in the contract when it was made."

In North Carolina, it is held that, while a party may not directly testify to a conversation with the deceased, he may nevertheless testify to a rehearsal of the same in a conversation with an agent of the deceased if it is a part of the res gestæ. Tredwell v. Graham, 88 N. Car. 208; Gilmer v. McNairy, 69 N. Car. 335; State v. Morris, 69 N. Car. 444.

But in Georgia, a party may not testify to statements of the deceased, repeated to him by an agent of the deceased, touching a past contract between the witness and the decedent. Freeman v. Bigham, 65 Ga. 580.

1. Thomas v. Kelly, 74 N. Car. 416.

In VanHorne v. Clark, 126 Pa. St. 411, the plaintiff claimed under a sheriff's deed for the land in dispute sold as the property of the defendant's father, then deceased. The defendant claimed under a deed from her father executed prior to the entry of the judgment on which the sheriff's sale to the plaintiff was made. It was held that the defendant was a competent witness, notwithstanding the death of her grantor, to prove the real consideration for the deed. The court said: "We are unable to see any valid objection to the competency of Ruth Clark as a witness. It is true she was the defendant in the ejectment, and her father, from whom she derived title, was dead. She was not called to testify against his title, but in support of it, or, to speak with greater accuracy, to prove the consideration she paid for the land. Neither party to the record is acting in a representative capacity. The plaintiff below was not prejudiced by the death of William J. Clark. If either party was prejudiced, it was the defendant. The case does not come within any of the exceptions of any of the acts of assembly relating to the competency of witnesses, nor do we think it comes within their spirit."

But a party who is incompetent to give in evidence a conversation with a party or a person interested in the event of the action concerning communications between himself and a deceased or insane party or person, it is construed to exclude testimony concerning communications with a person deceased or insane at the time of the trial, though the legal representative of such deceased or insane person is not a party to the issue.¹

(2) Between the Deceased and a Third Person.—In many cases, a distinction has been made between transactions and communications between the witness and the deceased and those exclusively between the deceased and a third person. In these cases, it has generally been held that the witness, though a party to the action and interested in the event thereof, may testify to a transaction or conversation between the deceased and a third person had in the presence of the witness or within his hearing, provided he took no part therein.² But if he took any part in the transaction by deceased person, will not be permitted to give it as rehearsed by him to a third person. Cottrell v. Cottrell, 81 Ind. 87.

1. In Griswold v. Edson, 32 Minn. 436, Gilfillan, C. J., said: "Prior to 1861, a party could testify to any matter pertinent to the issue. In 1861, the statute was changed so as to exclude a party testifying in his own favor, when the other original party to the contract or cause of action was dead or insane. In 1866, it was again changed so as to admit a party to testify in his own favor, though the other party were dead or insane, if the transaction on the other side, that is, the side of the dead or insane party, was had by an agent 'whose testimony is received.' This last phrase was held, in Bigelow v. Ames, 18 Minn. 527, to mean an agent whose testimony can be received, or is receivable. It was again changed in 1877, to read as it now stands in General Statutes 1878. The purpose of these various changes is manifest. Prior to 1861, a party testifying in his own favor to a contract or transaction with the other party, had the opportunity and the temptation to give an uncontradictable false account of it, where the mouth of the other party was closed by death or insanity, so that his version could not be heard. The act of 1861 intended to take away the opportunity, but it went further than was necessary for that purpose; for the opportunity would not exist, notwithstanding the death or insanity of the opposite party, if the transaction to which the surviving or sane party offered to testify were had with an agent alive and sane, and who might be called to contradict him; and yet, even if such were the case, the act excluded him. To correct this, the change in 1866 was made. The language in which that change was made left doubt and uncertainty as to the rule; hence the change in 1877. Appellant contends as to that act that it intends only to exclude a party from testifying to a conversation with or declaration of a party, the latter being dead or insane, and not of any other person, whether an agent or not, and although dead or insane; that the words 'or person' are superfluous, used in the same sense as the preceding word 'party,' merely tautological. In view of the clear purpose of the various changes in the law, beginning with 1861, we do not think so. The danger of allowing a party to testify where he may feel safe to testify falsely, from the fact that the other party to the conversation cannot be produced to contradict him, because dead or insane, is just as great where he offers to testify to conversations or admissions of one not a party to the action or cause of action, as of a party. There was just as much reason for excluding a party's evidence as to a conversation with or admission of any other person who has died or become insane, as for excluding it as to a conversation with or admission of one a party. The only reason for excluding it in either case is the danger of perjury. That exists in one case as fully as in the other. We cannot reject the words 'or person' or construe them as having any but their ordinary meaning."

In Lobdell v. Lobdell, 36 N. Y. 327, the court said: "Now the transaction or communication respecting which he sought to testify was not between himself and the deceased person, or, in the explicit language of the statute, 'had personally by said party with a deceased person,' but between the deceased and a third person. I am unable to see why he was not a competent witness to that transaction, or how, without extending the limitation further than the statute has done, he could be excluded. Although it may be said that a party standing in the relation in which he does ought to have been excluded, for he has the same advantage over the plaintiffs, as a witness, as his father would have had if living and standing as defendant in the suit, still, unless the section as it stood can be construed so as to exclude him, the legislature and not the court must rectify the omission. It will not suffice to say that the case is within the spirit of the enactment, unless a fair construction of the language used will bring it within the enactment itself. The subject of the section is the allowance of parties to be witnesses in their own behalf, and its object is to provide generally for their examination as such witnesses, and the specific exceptions to such examination. The legislature having undertaken to specify the exceptions, the courts cannot allow any that are not specified by the legislature. When the legislature explicitly limited the exclusion of a party, to cases in which he should offer to testify in respect to a transaction or communication had personally by him with the deceased person, it is impossible to construe that exclusion as meaning to cover transactions or communications had by some third person, whoever he may be and however connected with the party offering to testify, with the deceased person. Such construction would ignore the terms 'had personally by him,' which serve to show the precise extent of the exclusion."

The rule has been applied even when such transaction was with the husband or wife of the witness. Lines v. Lines, 54 Iowa 600; Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 S. Car. 49; McLaurin v. Wilson, 16 S. Car. 402.

In Gable v. Hainer, 83 Iowa 457, it appeared that a son, died indebted to the estate of his father, who had died a short time before the son's death. An action was brought by the father's administratrix against the son's executors, to recover the debt, and it was held that the daughter of the plaintiff's intestate, though interested in the event of the action, was competent to testify to such business transactions between her father and her deceased brother as she had acquired a knowledge of otherwise than through personal communications with her brother. The court said: "Special complaint is made of the testimony of said Emma Gable. It appears that she was either a member of the family, or much of the time at the home, of Henry Gable. She was examined as a witness in the case more than once. At the first examination, some of the testimony appears to us to be very close to the line of exclusion prescribed by the statute. But on her last examination, everything appears to have been excluded, except the contents of certain letters and papers sent by her father to her brother, Henry Gable. She stated positively that she acquired a knowledge of the writings without any communication with her brother. This being the testimony, it was as competent as if the communication between father and son had been by conversation with each other, and the witness a mere listener. That testimony of that kind is competent, has word, sign, or act, his testimony concerning it should be excluded;¹ or, if the decedent's remarks were addressed to him as been repeatedly held by this court. Sweezy v. Collins, 40 Iowa 542; Dougherty v. Deeney, 41 Iowa 19; Johnson v. Johnson, 52 Iowa 589; Lines v. Lines, 54 Iowa 600."

In Colvin v. Phillips, 25 S. Car. 228, it was held that in an action against the administrator of a deceased judgment debtor, prosecuted by the assignee of the judgment, the plaintiff might testify to a conversation between his assignor, who was then the owner of the judgment, and the judgment debtor, who was dead at the time of the trial. The court said: "The general rule is that interest does not disqualify, and hence, to render any testimony incompetent under the provisions of that section, it is necessary to bring such testimony under the express terms of some one of the exceptions to such general rule, mentioned in the proviso. Guery v. Kinsler, 3 S. Car. 423; Cantey v. Whitaker, 17 S. Car. 527. Now in this case, this witness whose testimony was objected to, though a party to the action, and though testifying as to a conversation of a deceased person, in proceeding against his administrator was not testifying in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, etc. On the contrary, the transaction or communication to which he was testifying was between Nicholas Colvin, the father of the witness, and the deceased, Phillips. For all that appears, the witness at the time of the conversation was like any other disinterested bystander, testifying as to a conversation between the two original parties to the judgment, both of whom are now dead. It is clear, therefore, that the testimony objected to cannot be brought within the express terms of the exception relied upon, as has been frequently held by this court." Citing Roe v. Harrison, 9 S. Car. 279; Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 S. Car. 36; McLaurin v. Wilson, 16 S. Car. 402.

Where the witness, one of the defendants, had in his possession certain money belonging to the deceased, but handed it to him who afterwards handed it to the wife of the witness, another defendant, it was held that the witness was competent to testify as to what was said and done by the deceased and the wife of the witness, as that was in no sense a transaction between the witness and the deceased. Mayes v. Turley, 60 Iowa 407.

Where a husband conveyed property to a third person, who, after the husband's death, conveyed it to the widow, who brought ejectment against a purchaser of the property at an execution sale thereof against her husband, the property having been sold under the execution on the theory that her husband's conveyance was in fraud of creditors, it was held that she was a competent witness in her own behalf, as she was not a party to the transaction relied on to support the defendant's title, and the representative of her deceased husband was not a party to the action. Willingham v. Smith, 48 Ga. 580. Compare Johnson v. Johnson, 52 Iowa 586.

A party may testify to transactions or conversations between the decedent and the opposing party in which the witness took no part. Crawford v. Haines, 44 Hun (N. Y.) 597; Brice v. Miller, 35 S. Car. 537.

Thus, a defendant sued jointly with the personal representative of a deceased person, may testify to a transaction between the plaintiff and the deceased, though his rights conflict with those of the decedent's estate. New Ebenezer Assoc. v. Gress Lumber Co., 89 Ga. 125.

But a party will not be permitted to testify to a conversation between the deceased and a third person who is an agent of the witness and is acting for him at the time. Head v. Teeter, 10 Hun (N. Y.) 548.

And it has been held that, where the third person was the attorney and agent of the deceased, and was acting for him when such conversation took place, the survivor might not testify thereto. McRae v. Malloy, 90 N. Car. 521.

well as to a third person, he should not be permitted to testify concerning them.¹

In New York, this rule has been greatly modified by recent decisions. In the early cases under the Code of Civil Procedure, the rule established under the Code of Procedure was apparently adopted, but in the more recent cases involving contests over the probate of wills on the ground of fraud, restraint, undue influence or want of testamentary capacity, parties interested in such contests have not been permitted to testify to transactions and communications with the decedents, although they took no active part therein.² And a significant remark dropped by the court in a

In Brague v. Lord, 67 N. Y. 498, it appeared that the deceased had addressed a remark to a third person, at the same time turning toward the witness, and it was held that the witness might not testify thereto. The court said: "Mr. Lord's remark about what he would have to pay his lawyers, turning toward the plaintiff, appears to have been addressed to plaintiff as well as to Mr. Thomas Lord, and may have satisfied the jury that Mr. Lord looked upon plaintiff as his lawyer throughout the transaction, and conceded that he would have to pay him as such. The remark to Mr. Thomas Lord about paying their lawyers did not of itself amount to much. It derived its significance wholly from the alleged turning toward plaintiff, and thus giving him to understand that he was the party referred to. This, we think, was a personal communication within the intent of the 399th section."

2. In Matter of Eysaman's Will, 113 N. Y. 62, a legatee under the will, who was present at its execution and had taken some part in former conversations on the occasion, was permitted in the court below to testify to subsequent conversations between the testator and persons other than the witness. This was held error on the ground that the execution of the will constituted one transaction. The court said: "We think it was error to admit this evidence. The act of executing the will, although consisting of several incidents constituted but one transaction and derived its efficacy as a valid execution from the performance of each requirement of the statute. The transaction was continuing and related to but one subject, namely, the execution of a will. A participation by a person in any of the material acts required to complete its valid execution made the transaction one between the testator and that person. Ware was present from the subscription to the publication and attestation, and it cannot reasonably be held that he did not participate in the execution of the will."

Next came Matter of Dunham's Will, 121 N. Y. 577, in which the probate of a codicil was contested by the beneficiaries under the original will. The question was as to the competency of a specific and residuary legatee under the original will to testify to conversations and transactions between the testator and third persons; the witness having taken no part therein. The court said: "The witness was the nephew, and both a specific and residuary legatee under the will of the testator. The object of the proposed evidence could only have been to show undue influence, or restraint, exerted upon the deceased, or his mental incapacity; for it was offered by the contestant under formal objections, upon these grounds, to the admission to probate of a codicil to the original will, by which there was given from the estate to the proponent of the codicil, respondent here, a legacy relatively large in amount. Therefore, while as to any communications or transactions with the witness, the proposed evidence was plainly enough inhibited by section 829 of the code, his testimony as to the conversations or transactions while he was present in the room, had between the deceased and other persons, was, under the circumstances, inadmissible. In the case of Holcomb v. Holcomb, 95 N. Y. 316, and, more recently, in the Matter of Eysaman's Will, 113 N. Y. 62, this court has given such a construction to this recent case may indicate a disposition to confine the rule within narrower limits in cases other than will contests.¹

In some other jurisdictions, substantially the same language in statutes has been construed so liberally as to prevent an interested provision of the code as would prohibit a person interested in the event from giving such evidence. The ground for the ruling is that communications in the presence of the witness are deemed to be made to him. While the ruling may be said to be stretched to the extremest tension, it has the merit, possibly, of being in furtherance of justice. The evidence is intended to work here against the respondent, who derives her interest under the testator's codicil, and whose lips are sealed by the law, as to the matters; and to permit a witness so much interested as this one was in the amount of the estate ultimately distributable, to testify to things said and done by testator, though with others, but while he was present, with the only supposable purpose of affecting the interests of the respondent, would certainly seem to be giving an undue advantage to the one as against the other." Compare Petrie v. Petrie, 126 N. Y. 683; Matter of Palmtree's Will, 78 Hun (N. Y.) 43.

In Matter of Bernsee's Will, 141 N. Y. 391, Andrews, C. J., said: "Christian D. Bernsee was, under our decisions, an incompetent witness to testify to any conversation or transaction in his presence at the time of the execution and publication of the will. He was one of the chief beneficiaries thereunder and was directly interested in establishing due execution. What occurred at that time was a transaction between the testatrix and the witness, within the meaning of section 829 of the code, although he took no actual part in the conversation and it was wholly between the testatrix and the attesting witnesses. If active participation in the conversation was necessary to exclude an interested witness, and he should, as an observer, be permitted to testify to transactions in form between the deceased and third persons, although such transactions were in his interest, it would furnish an easy and convenient method, in every case, of evading the statute. The decisions have enforced the spirit of the statute by excluding such evidence, and have treated transactions between the deceased and third persons in the presence of interested parties as if the witness actually participated therein." Citing Holcomb v. Holcomb, 95 N. Y. 316; Matter of Eysaman's Will, 113 N. Y. 62; Matter of Dunham's Will, 121 N. Y. 575.

In Eighmie v. Taylor, 68 Hun (N. Y.) 587, the court said: "Having thus examined the principal cases in the court of appeals and the later ones in the other courts of this state, bearing upon the question under consideration, we think they clearly establish the rule that in probate or other cases where a will, other instrument, or act is contested on the ground of undue influence, restraint, mental incapacity, or fraud, a person who is interested in the event of an action or proceeding is disqualified to testify to any transaction or communication which occurred in his presence or hearing, although it was not with or addressed to such person, or one in which he participated. It also seems to be established by these cases that upon other issues an interested witness may be permitted to testify to a conversation or transaction between a decedent and a third person in the presence of the witness, provided he was not referred to by the parties to such conversation and did not participate in it by word, sign, or act, but if there was any such reference or participation, although slight, the witness is incompetent."

1. In Devlin v. Greenwich Sav. Bank, 125 N. Y. 756, which was a contest concerning a gift causa mortis, the court said: "It is doubtful if the witness could be permitted to testify as to a conversation in her presence between her uncle and father Carew relative to the gift she claimed. The cases, Matter of Eysaman's Will, 113 N. Y. 62, and Matter of Dunham's Will, 121 N. Y. 575, have very greatly limited the old rule in regard to such conversation."

But in O'Brien v. Weiler, 140 N. Y. 286, which was a contest between a ward and the executors of her guardian, as to the ownership of money standing to the credit of the guardian in bank, it is said that it was not sufficient to exclude the ward's evidence to show that it related to a transaction between the deceased guardian and another in her party from testifying to transactions or conversations between the deceased and a third person, notwithstanding the witness took no part therein whatever.¹ Again, it has been held that in an action by or against the legal representative of a deceased person, where there are two parties on the opposing side having like interests, neither of them may testify as to a conversation or transaction between the deceased and the other.²

The fact that a third person was present at a transaction or conversation between two parties, one of whom has since died, and may be called to testify thereto, is not sufficient to let in the testimony of the surviving party.³

In Robinson v. James, 29 W. Va. 232, the court adopted the reasoning of Lobdell v. Lobdell, 32 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 1, notwithstanding the fact that that case had been reversed in 36 N. Y. 327, saying, that in its opinion the reasoning of the supreme court is more in accord with the spirit of the decisions in that state than that of the court of appeals.

In Parks v. Caudle, 58 Tex. 221, the court said: "In our opinion, a party is prohibited from testifying not merely as to statements by the deceased to him, or transactions between him and the deceased, but also as to such statements to or transactions between deceased and third persons, and that, too, although occurring when the witness had no interest therein."

2. In Wills v. Wood, 28 Kan. 408, Brewer, J., said: "Rebecca M. Forbes, one of the plaintiffs, a daughter and heir of Willis Wills, was a witness in the case, and testified to being present at a conversation of David E. James with her mother. She was asked to give that conversation, but the testimony was objected to and ruled out. It is not claimed that the mother would be a competent witness as to this conversation, because it would be a communication had personally by her with the deceased person, in the case in which the adverse parties are the administratrix and heirs at law of such deceased person. But it is claimed that though the party carrying on the conversation is incompetent, any party who heard the conversation is a competent witness thereto; and the cases of McKean v. Massey, 9 Kan. 602, and Simmons v. Sisson, 26 N. Y. 264, are cited. As a general proposition, this is correct. The inhibition of the statute is only on the party having the communication or transaction with the deceased; but this case presents peculiar features, which, we think, justifies the ruling of the district court. Mrs. Forbes, as well as Mrs. Maples, was plaintiff, each claiming as heir of Willis Wills, and each seeking to recover from the administratrix and heirs of David E. James. Neither could testify under the statute as to any transaction or communication had personally with David E. James. Can it be possible that when the two are present with James, and a conversation is carried on, that while neither could testify as to what James said to herself personally, she could testify as to what he said to the other? We think not. Such a ruling would be forbidden by the spirit, at least, of the statute. That statute plainly contemplates preventing one party from introducing in evidence conversations had with the ancestor of the adverse party, and this, because the lips of such ancestor, closed by death, cannot be heard to give his version of the conversation. And where there are two persons on the one side, having like interests, they should, for the purpose of giving force to the statute, be considered as one, and neither be permitted to give her version of the conversations and statements of the deceased to the other in her presence."

In ejectment by one claiming as heir pacity of the grantor to make the deed.

In Crothers v. Crothers, 149 Pa. St.
205, the court said: "It is apparent, therefore, that the litigation involves a transaction to which Samuel J. Crothers and his son Leman were parties, and which his son William is now attempting to invalidate. Prima facie, the interest of Samuel Crothers passed by his own formal and properly authenticated act to Leman, who is a party on the record, and whose title thus acquired is the subject in controversy. The interest of William, who is the opposite party on the record, is adverse to this title, and his contention involves a denial of the right of the deceased grantor to transmit it. Is he a competent witness to testify to matters which he alleges in avoidance of his father's deed? An answer to this question is found in King v. Humphreys, 138 Pa. St. 310. In that case, as in this, the plaintiff claimed title by descent from his deceased father, and his sister, the defendant, claimed under a deed from him. It was alleged there, as it is here, that at the time of the execution of the deed, the grantor had not sufficient mental capacity to make it, and that the grantee obtained it from him by fraud and undue influence.

It was held that the plaintiff was not a competent witness to matters on which he relied to set aside the deed."

In Pope v. Allen, 90 N. Y. 301, the court said: "We have no duty to perform except to examine and consider the exceptions taken during the progress of the trial and urged here as grounds of reversal. The most important of these arises upon the refusal of the trial court to permit the defendant to testify to the bargain which he made with Rogers for the purchase of the twenty-five acres, and which was founded upon the prohibitions of section 829 of the code. At the time of the trial both N. B. Pope, who was the plaintiff's immediate grantor, and Jonathan Rogers, who conveyed to N. B. Pope, were dead, and the defendant contends that the personal transactions, as to which his mouth was closed, were those with the plaintiff's immediate grantor and not those with the grantor of the latter. Under the language of the old code, there was authority for this doctrine. Section 399; Prouty v. Eaton, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 409; Cary v. White, 59 N. Y. 336. We need not consider these cases, since the language upon which they were founded has been materially changed in the later revision. The former prohibition excluded the party's evidence as to 'any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, . . . against the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor of such deceased person.' It was possible to construe this language as limiting the prohibition to the particular deceased person from whom directly the adverse party took his title. Whether even that construction was sound might not be beyond debate, but the essential change in the language at all events requires us to adopt a different construction. The language now is 'against the executor, administrator, or survivor of a deceased person, . . . or a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person, . . . concerning a personal transaction between the witness and the deceased person.' Section 829. The specific modes of succession named in detail in the old code are represented in the revision by a general and broader phrase. The deceased person referred to in the latter is one from whom or through whom the adverse party derives his title, or under whom he holds. The plaintiff here derived his title 'from' Jonathan Rogers, 'through' N. B. Pope, and held 'under' the former as well as the latter. The language covers the case, and we can see no just reason which excludes personal transactions with N. B. Pope, which does not also apply to Rogers, under whom both parties claimed title."

In Ripley v. Seligman, 88 Mich. 177, the court said: "As originally enacted, the statute was confined to suits or proceedings prosecuted or defended by the representatives of a deceased person, or by any surviving partner. Act No. 125, Laws of 1861; Act No. 188, Laws of 1863. By the amendment of 1875, Act No. 155, the statute was extended so as to include heirs, assigns, devisees and legatees, and it so remains at the present time. The word 'assigns' is used here in its legal sense, and signifies a person to whom any property or right is transferred by a deceased person in his lifetime. The statute is broad enough to cover successive transfers, or where the controversy depends upon the acts or dealings with the property of the deceased in his lifetime; and anyone who is called upon to prosecute or defend some interest which is affected by the act or agreement of the deceased party, through whom he claims, may invoke the protection of the statute to shield his interest from the testimony of the opposite party to matters which, if true, were equally within the knowledge of the deceased person through whom he claims."

The death of the grantor of one party will not exclude the testimony of the opposing party when there is no privity of estate between the witness and such deceased grantor, and the witness is not offered to prove a personal transaction or communication between himself and the deceased.² The death of one or more of the grantors in a deed does not disqualify a surviving grantor tiff, the effect of which is to vest his interest in a co-plaintiff, does not render him competent for the latter as to transactions with the defendant's decedent. By that act he becomes the plaintiff's assignor, and his testimony comes directly within the inhibition of the statute. O'Brien v. Weiler, 140 N. Y. 281, affirming 68 Hun (N. Y.) 64. Compare Mageman v. Bell, 13 Neb. 247.

In Tinastman v. Croushore, 104 Pa. St. 192, it was held that the assignor of the personal representative was not competent to support the claim in the latter's hands, although the court expressed regret that this ruling was made necessary by the language of the statute.

In Smith v. Cross, 90 N. Y. 556, the court said: "The question now to be determined is whether Wilson was a competent witness to testify to the facts sworn to by him under the section of the code cited. That section provides as follows: 'Upon the trial of an action . . . a party or person interested in the event, or a person from, through, or under whom such party or interested person derives his interest or title, by assignment or otherwise, shall not be examined as a witness . . . in behalf of the party succeeding to his interest or title, against . . . a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person, . . . by assignment or otherwise, concerning a personal transaction, or communication, between the witness and the deceased person,' etc. These plaintiffs derived their title to the mortgage through a deceased person. The defendants, claiming to be the owners of the land covered by the mortgage, were seeking by their defense to protect the land against the mortgage, to defeat the mortgage as a lien upon the land; and they derived their title to the land through or under Wilson, by his deed to Cross in 1872, and the deed, just before the trial to the action, to Mrs. Cross. He was called as a witness on behalf of parties who succeeded to his interest, whatever it was, in the land, and he was called to protect that land and that interest against the mortgage. He was, therefore, clearly, within the letter and spirit of that section of the code, an incompetent witness."

1. Warren v. Steer, 112 Pa. St. 634.

2. In Waltman v. Herdic, 90 Pa. St. 464, the court said: "Samuel Titus, one of the defendants, was offered as a witness in his own behalf to prove such actual possession as had vested title in himself, and was excluded for incompetency 'because Daniel Billman, whose estate still holds the legal title as shown by the plaintiffs in this suit, is dead, having in his lifetime conveyed only an equitable interest to the parties.' The first thing that arrests attention is the absence of privity between Billman and Titus. There is no semblance of contract relation, nor are their respective titles links of the same chain. Before Billman had an interest in the Brady tract, while he lived, and since his death, Titus claimed the land in suit as part of the Hepburn warrant; the plaintiffs, holding under Billman and others, demand nothing beyond the Brady survey. Aside from the location of the original tract line, Titus sets up title under the Statute of Limitations, the very nature of which excludes its derivation from Billman. There was no proposal to prove by Titus anything that Billman ever said or did, and plaintiffs point to nothing tending to show that there ever was any communication between them respecting the land. If the survivor is incompetent, where will competency begin when some grantor in the chain of title of the opposing party is dead? Can it be that if one party derives title through or under a deceased grantor, however remote, neither can be a witness? Proximity or remoteness of the deceased grantor is of no consequence, for the true inquiry is, has death sealed the lips of one party to a transaction of

to testify against one claiming under the grantee, who is living at the time of the trial.¹ But in a contest between a living mortgagee and the legal representative of a deceased mortgagee of the same land, as to the priority of the mortgages, the mortgagor is not competent to prove that the decedent's mortgage, though prior in date, was not in fact delivered first.² And in a contest between a devisee and the testator's grantor of the land devised, the latter is not a competent witness as to transactions between himself and the deceased.³

which both had knowledge? The proviso was not intended to exclude a party in such a case as this, and we are of opinion there was error in rejecting the offer set forth in the 11th assignment." Compare Mason v. Prendergast, 120 N. Y. 536; Kenyon v. Youlen, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 591; Brown v. Moore, 26 S. Car. 160.

In Craig v. Brendel, 69 Pa. St. 155, it appeared that Craig had purchased land at sheriff's sale, under a judgment against Brendel, the title being in Brendel's wife. Craig alleged that the land belonged to Brendel, and brought ejectment for it against Brendel, and died before the trial. It was held that Brendel was a competent witness as against the devisees of Craig, to prove that his wife purchased the land and paid for it with her own money. The court said: "While it may be considered as true that John Craig, the deviser of the plaintiffs, is their assignor in law according to Karns v. Tanner, 66 Pa. St. 297, yet Frederick L. Brendel, the defendant here, who was offered as the witness, does not stand as the party opposite to them in the thing or transaction which is the subject of the controversy in this suit. The opposite party is Mrs. Brendel, who claims in her own right and not by any privity with Frederick L., her husband. John Craig bought Frederick L. Brendel's title at sheriff's sale. In this suit, F. L. Brendel does not dispute the sheriff's sale, or the title of John Craig; he sets up no title in or for himself. It is the title of Mrs. Brendel that is the subject of contest, and this is wholly adverse to any title of F. L. Brendel, her husband. She bought the property and, as she alleges, paid for it with her own money, and the deed was made to her. It is obvious F. L. Brendel is called to testify to no thing, contract, or transaction to which he and the deceased

John Craig were parties. He is not asked to speak of things pertaining to their affairs, which might be known to Craig and himself, and as to which Craig, if alive, might contradict him; he is called to testify to matters to which he himself was no party in interest, and as to which he would have to testify as a stranger to the transaction."

In Bradley v. West, 68 Mo. 69, it appeared that one party claimed under a deed from a person since deceased, and the opposing party claimed by adverse possession under color of title, but there was no privity of estate between such adverse claimant and the deceased grantor of the other party, and it was held that the grantee was competent to prove the execution of the deed to himself; the estate of the deceased grantor having no interest in the event of the action. But upon reasoning, which does not appear to be entirely satisfactory, this case was overruled in Chapman v. Dougherty, 87 Mo. 625; 56 Am. Rep. 469.

In Bush v. Barron, 78 Tex. 9, it was held that one who claimed the property in dispute in his own right, was competent to prove statements of the deceased person, at whose administrator's sale the opposing party bought the property.

But in Allen v. Davis, 65 Ga. 179, it was held that a grantor, who had conveyed the same land to two grantees severally, stood indifferent between them, his interest being balanced, as he was liable to one of them in any event; and that he was therefore competent to impeach the prior conveyance, notwithstanding the grantee therein was dead at the time of the trial.

by her husband, in alleged fraud of her right of dower, she is not a competent witness to prove communications between her deceased husband and herself concerning the transaction.¹ But upon a writ of dower by a widow against the heir of her deceased husband, who is the tenant in possession, the demandant is a competent witness in her own behalf because the real cause of action is the withholding an estate in land to which she claims title by operation of law; neither of the parties to the suit claiming under a contract, one of the parties to which is dead.²

1. Palmer v. Palmer, 62 Iowa 204; Sanford v. Ellithorp, 95 N. Y. 48; Brandon v. Dawson, 51 Mo. App. 244.

In Witthaus v. Schack, 105 N. Y. 332, the court said: "It is not disputed that the plaintiff is a party and interested in the event of the action, or that the subject of the inquiry related to a personal communication between the deceased person and the witness, but it is claimed, as stated in respondent's points, that the plaintiff was not an incompetent witness under section 829 of the code, because the title or interest to be affected by the action was not derived by defendant from plaintiff's husband but from the plaintiff. The plaintiff thus seeks to stand upon the letter of the statute and to claim exemption from its provisions by reason of the alleged creation of a contingent estate, intermediate the seisin of the husband and the execution of the deed, which it is claimed suspended the husband's title to a part of his property and created a new estate transferable only by a conveyance from the wife. The error in this proposition consists in the assumption that the wife has an estate in the lands of her husband during his life which she can convey to another. The settled theory of the law as to the nature of an inchoate right of dower is that it is not an estate or interest in land at all, but is a contingent claim arising not out of contract but as an institution of law constituting a mere chose in action incapable of transfer by grant or conveyance, but susceptible only during its inchoate state, of extinguishment. By force of the statute, this is effected by the act of the wife in joining with her husband in the execution of a deed of the land. Such deed, so far as the wife is concerned, operates as a release or satisfaction of the interest and not as a conveyance, and removes an incumbrance instead of transferring an interest or estate." After a review of the authorities as to the nature of a wife's inchoate right of dower, the court continued: "It would seem clear from the authorities that the act of the wife in joining her husband in the execution of a deed of his lands does not constitute her a grantor of the premises or vest in the grantee any greater or other estate than such as he derives from the conveyance of the husband. Its effect is merely to extinguish a contingent claim existing as a possible incumbrance and ceasing to exist by reason of the execution of the husband's deed and to be revived only by the subsequent cancellation or annulment of his conveyance. It is also obvious that the grantee in such deed takes title to the whole premises solely by virtue of the title and estate of the husband, and therefore in the fullest sense derives his title through, from, and under such grantor. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the defendant took the title to the entire premises in dispute from Rudolph A. Witthaus, and that his wife was not a competent witness to testify to personal transactions and communications occurring between herself and her husband in reference to such deed. The defendant is, therefore, within the letter as well as the spirit of section 829 of the code."

2. In Flynn v. Coffee, 12 Allen (Mass.) 133, the court said: "The admission of the demandant to testify was right. In suing to recover her dower, there is no party to the contract or cause of action who is dead, within the meaning of the statute, so as to preclude her from testifying. The cause of action is the withholding from her an estate in land to which she claims title. That a former owner of the estate, through whom her title is derived, is dead, is no more an objection in the case of dower than in the case of an inheritance. It is only upon the death of her husband, and not in his life, that her right of action accrues."

In Wentworth v. Wentworth, 71 Me. 74, the court said: "A point is taken,

In an action against the heir of a deceased person to establish and enforce an alleged resulting trust in favor of the plaintiff, he is not a competent witness in his own behalf to prove transactions with the defendant's ancestor which tend to establish the trust,¹ but he may testify to transactions between himself and a deceased person from whom neither party to the action derives title.² And where the action is brought by the heir of the party who paid the purchase-money against the holder of the legal title, the defendant may not testify to transactions between himself and the plaintiff's ancestor.³ After the death of the grantee in a deed, which is absolute on its face, the grantor though untenable, we think, that the demandant should have been debarred from testifying, the tenant holding the estate as an heir of the demandant's husband. The statute (section 87, ch. 82, Rev. Stats.) provides that the living party shall not testify, where the other party is an executor or administrator, or made a party as heir of a deceased party. The statutory inhibition applies only in cases where the heir is made a party because he is an heir, and where the ancestor would have been the party were he alive. It was intended to reach cases where real estate is represented in court by heirs, as personal estate is by executors or administrators; as where in a real action heirs come in to prosecute or defend a suit instead of their ancestor, who dies pendente lite; or where heirs commence proceedings to redeem a mortgage running to the ancestors, Cary v. Herrin, 59 Me. 361; or where the proceeding is against heirs, to recover land which in the lifetime of the ancestor was held in trust for another person. Simmons v. Moulton, 27 Me. 496. Here the defendant is not sued because an heir. He would have been sued if a grantee of his father. He is sued only because he is the tenant of the estate. Nor would the ancestor, if alive, be situated as he is. In such case there could be no claim or action."

In New Jersey, it is held that in a suit by a widow against her husband's heirs at law, to set aside a deed made to them by her husband before his death, on the ground of fraud, she is a competent witness, under the statute of 1880, to testify to transactions with her husband and conversations with him. Crimmins v. Crimmins, 43 N. J. Eq. 86; Smith v. Smith, 52 N. J. L. 207.

It seems, however, that she would not have been competent to so testify before the passage of that statute. See cases above cited, and Colfax v. Colfax, 32 N. J. Eq. 206.

In Indiana, it was held that, where the title to land had been fraudulently taken by the husband in his own name, the wife having paid the purchase price, and the purchaser, at an execution sale of the land against the husband, since deceased, brought ejectment against the widow to recover possession, the defendant was competent to testify to all matters touching her rights in the land. Tracy v. Kelley, 52 Ind. 535. But she is not competent to testify where she brings an action against her former husband's heirs to establish such trust. Noble v. Withers, 36 Ind. 193.

In California, the plaintiff in an action to enforce a resulting trust against the representative of the deceased trustee may testify to facts occurring before the trustee's death. Myers v. Reinsteint, 67 Cal. 89.

In New Jersey, it has been held that a woman who believed herself to be the lawful wife of the man with whom she lived, although it was learned after his death that he had another wife living, was competent to testify that she paid the consideration for property conveyed to her supposed husband and herself, and also paid for the improvements made thereon; these not being transactions with the deceased. Gebel v. Weiss, 42 N. J. Eq. 521.

is not competent to prove that the conveyance was made in trust for himself.¹

h. IN ACTIONS FOR SERVICES RENDERED.—In an action against an executor or administrator to recover for services rendered the deceased, the plaintiff is not competent to testify to facts which would raise an implied promise on the part of the deceased to pay for the same.² Neither is he competent to prove what services he rendered the deceased,³ except such as were so rendered that they do not, independently of the contract of employment, constitute a personal transaction with the deceased.⁴ Where the fact of the rendition of services has been proved by other witnesses, the claimant may, in the absence of an express contract, testify as to the reasonable value of the same, as such testimony does not relate to a personal transaction with the deceased.⁵ But he is not competent to prove that he has not been paid for the same, since testimony negating a transaction with a deceased person is as clearly within the inhibition contained in the proviso to the statute as that in affirmation thereof.⁶

i. WRITTEN COMMUNICATIONS.—Written communications with persons since deceased are within the statutory inhibition as well as oral communications, and it is, therefore, not permissible

And in an action against the grantee of the heir of a deceased person, to have a deed, absolute on its face, from the plaintiff to the deceased ancestor of the defendant's grantor, declared a deed of trust, the plaintiff is not competent to prove transactions with the deceased which tend to establish the trust. Buf-fum v. Porter, 70 Mich. 623.

The assignor of a claim for professional services is not a competent witness for his assignee as against the personal representative of a deceased person. Shain v. Forbes, 82 Cal. 577.

In an action to recover for services rendered and materials furnished to the defendant's testator, the plaintiff is not competent to prove the correctness of his bill of particulars showing the contract price of such services and materials made after the testator's death. Fisher v. Verplanck, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 150.

4. Deans v. King, 20 Fla. 533; Lerche v. Brasher, 104 N. Y. 157, reversing 37 Hun (N. Y.) 385; Belden v. Scott, 65 Wis. 425.

A physician who presents a claim for medical services may testify to the physical condition of the deceased within the period of such services, and to the proportion of his own time required in looking after his patient's health. Sullivan v. Latimer, 38 S. Car. 158.

In an action by an attorney against the executor of a deceased client to recover his fees, the plaintiff may, after competent proof of the contract of employment, testify as to his acts as such attorney, provided such acts were done in the absence of the deceased and without his immediate or personal participation. Lerche v. Brasher, 104 N. Y. 157.

6. But if no evidence of payment has been given by the defendant, it is harmless error where the plaintiff testified that he has not been paid for his services, as payment is an affirmative defense, the burden of establishing which for the survivor to prove by his own testimony that he wrote letters to the deceased and that they were received by the latter.¹ Where letters which passed between two persons in the course of a business correspondence have been lost, one party to the correspondence is not, after the death of the other, competent to prove the contents of such letters.² And where the decedent's personal representative has put in evidence letters purporting to have been

is upon the defendant. Lerche v. Brasher, 104 N. Y. 161. See also In re Brown's Estate (Iowa, 1894), 60 N. W. Rep. 659; Ridler v. Ridler (Iowa, 1895), 61 N. W. Rep. 994.

1. VanVechten v. VanVechten, 65 Hun (N. Y.) 215.

In Resseguie v. Mason, 58 Barb. (N. Y.) 89, where an administrator brought suit upon a claim against the intestate's son, the defendant offered in evidence certain letters and was permitted at the trial to testify that he had written the letters to the deceased and had, after his father's death, found them among the latter's papers. The court said: "In the present case, the letters were proved by the testimony of an incompetent witness. The only evidence of their having been written by the defendant to the intestate, or of their having been found among the papers of the latter, thus showing that he had received and retained them, was the testimony of the defendant himself. The objection was taken that the defendant was incompetent to testify on the subject under section 399 of the Code, and exception to the ruling admitting the evidence duly taken. The testimony was clearly incompetent. It related to both a transaction and a communication between the party testifying and a deceased person, whose claims against such party were the subject of the litigation. The provisions of section 399 of the code relate as well to written as to verbal communications. It cannot be said that these letters and written statements of the accounts between the defendant and the intestate could have had no influence on the mind of the referee in deciding the issues tried before him. They touched the vital points at issue, and must be presumed to have had their legitimate influence."

2. Boozer v. Teague, 27 S. Car. 348; Montague v. Thomason, 91 Tenn. 168.

In Schratz v. Schratz, 35 Mich. 485, it appeared that one Henry Schratz, who resided in Germany, gave to the claimant, Conrad Schratz, a power of attorney, authorizing him to take charge of a lot in the city of Detroit, of which the deceased died seised, and to do generally in relation thereto whatever the deceased might do if personally present. The owner of the lot died, and Conrad Schratz, his attorney in fact, presented a claim against his estate, some of the items of which were contested, and the claimant relied upon the correspondence between himself and his principal to substantiate his claim. The claimant was permitted at the trial to testify that he had written several letters to deceased and had received letters from him in reply thereto, and that these letters fully informed the deceased of the items of expenditure which were contested, and that the replies showed that the deceased fully understood what was being done, and that the letters from the deceased were lost or destroyed, and could not be found. It was moved by counsel for the representative of the deceased that the court strike out this testimony, which motion was denied and an exception was taken. Upon appeal, the court said: "The statute, as amended by Act No. 155 of the Sess. Laws of 1875, p. 184, clearly covers this case. It provides that 'when a suit or proceeding is prosecuted or defended by the heirs, assigns, devisees, legatees or personal representatives of a deceased person, the opposite party, if examined as a witness in his own behalf, shall not be admitted to testify at all in relation to matters which, if true, must have been equally within the knowledge of such deceased person.' This amendment was evidently overlooked during the trial, although we think that this case came within the provision as it stood before amendment. There could be no question, admitting the testimony given to be true, but that the contents of the letters were within the knowledge of the deceased equally as within that of the witness. The letters, if they could have been produced, would have been admissible, but their loss or destruction would not change the rule written by the surviving party to the transaction undergoing investigation to the deceased, such surviving party is not competent to impeach the genuineness of the letters.¹ The surviving party is competent, however, to prove the fact that he received through the mail a letter purporting to have been written by the deceased party to the correspondence, because the latter, if living, could not contradict such fact.²

and permit the witness to testify as to their contents. Such evidence is clearly within the letter, and spirit of this statute, and should not have been admitted."

In Sabre v. Smith, 62 N. H. 663, the court said: "The remaining question arises from the exclusion of the plaintiff's offer to testify that he sent Putnam a letter mailed at Providence within fifteen days after the date of Putnam's proposal, accepting his proposal to deliver the two hundred tons of hay. Conceding that the plaintiff might properly have been allowed to testify to the mailing of the letter, he was rightly excluded as a witness to its contents, of which Putnam must be deemed to have had knowledge, because the presumption is that he received the letter by due course of mail. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 40. And this presumption is not rebutted by the mere fact that the letter was not found among his papers after his decease. The case presented, then, is the ordinary one where the living party to a transaction offers himself as a witness in relation to it, when the other party, being dead, cannot testify; and the statute bar applies."

1. Ford v. Holmes, 61 Ga. 419.

2. Boozar v. Teague, 27 S. Car. 348; Spear v. Evans, 51 Wis. 42.

In Daniels v. Foster, 26 Wis. 691, Dixon, C. J., said: "The question is whether, after the death of the writer, it is competent for the party who receives a letter at a distant place to which it is addressed to testify to such receipt. The deceased party could not, from the nature of the transaction, have made any directly contradictory statement. He was a party to the transaction, but not an immediate party, at least to that part of it concerning which the proof is offered. The fact to be proved is not one of which he had any positive knowledge or which he could, if living, have positively denied. He could deny it indirectly or by inference only, by denying that he ever wrote the letter, but this would be testimony to another fact or point, as to which it is not proposed to examine the living party and of which he has no positive knowledge. It is in the nature of circumstantial evidence so far as the testimony of the living party goes, and the question is whether he can testify to a circumstance transpiring in the absence of the deceased, and of which the deceased had no knowledge and could not disprove except by denying the principal fact which the circumstance tended to prove, or by testifying to some other distinct fact or circumstance which would have an opposing or contradictory tendency and effect. The statute forbids the examination of a party in his own behalf in respect to any transaction or communication had personally by such party with a deceased person, against parties who are executors, administrators, etc., of the deceased. Laws of 1863, ch. 176. The case does not seem to come within the letter of the statute, and yet the communication was, in some sense, personal. But the personal transaction or communication of the statute no doubt means a transaction or communication face to face, or by the parties in the actual presence and hearing of each other. In every such case, the statute excludes the testimony of the living party, upon the obviously wise and just ground that his adversary, whose cause of action or defense survives and who was possessed of equal knowledge and was equally capable of testifying to what the transaction or communication really was, has been removed by death and so cannot confront the survivor or give his version of the affair or expose the omissions, mistakes, or perhaps falsehoods of such survivor. The temptation to falsehood and concealment in such cases is considered too great to allow the surviving party to testify in his own behalf. The law has, therefore, wisely excluded him. But this reason for the exclusion is not applicable to the present case, at least not fully applicable.

j. LOSS OF WRITTEN EVIDENCE.—In case of the loss of a written contract, or other writing material in evidence in a contest between the survivor and the legal representative of the deceased party to a transaction, the surviving party is competent to prove such loss in order to lay a proper foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence of its contents,¹ unless the fact of his having had possession of such instrument is a material issue, and necessarily involves a transaction with the deceased.² But he is not competent himself to testify as to the contents of the lost instrument, because, in so doing, he would not be testifying to an independent fact, as in giving evidence of the loss of the instrument, but would be testifying to a transaction between himself and the deceased.³ The grantee in a lost deed may testify to his former possession thereof and that the signature thereto was in the hand-

Could we know that Mr. Fox, if living, would testify that he never wrote the letter in question, that it was a forgery, then indeed there would seem to be strong reason for excluding the testimony. But we do not and cannot know this, and it is only by assuming the supposititious character of the letter, and that Mr. Fox would have so testified, that any appearance of hardship exists. Had Mr. Fox survived, this controversy might never have arisen. He might have acknowledged the genuineness of the letter which is now the subject of such doubt and conflict of opinion, and might have freely forwarded the discharge therein spoken of. We cannot say what he would have said or done respecting this now perplexing question, and cannot indulge in any presumption either way which shall influence its determination. The statute does not, unless by an interpretation obviously more liberal than its language and the plain intent of the legislature will admit, exclude the testimony of these defendants; and so we must hold that it was admissible and must be considered upon the question under consideration." Compare Ellbert v. Finkbeiner, 68 Pa. St. 243.

2. Calwell v. Prindle, 11 W. Va. 307; Messimer v. McCray, 113 Mo. 382.

In Keech v. Cowles, 34 Iowa 261, the court said: "Appellant claims that plaintiff is not a competent witness of the loss of the notice, and hence she was unable to lay the proper foundation for the introduction of the record thereof. In this he is in error. At common law, the party's own oath may be received as to the facts and circumstances of the loss of a paper, in order to the introduction of secondary evidence of its contents. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 349. This rule is not changed by the provisions of chapter 159 of the Revision. Section 3980 renders competent parties who were incompetent at common law, and section 3982 provides that section 3980 shall not apply when the adverse party is the executor of a deceased person and the facts to be proved transpired before the death of the deceased. No one competent at common law is rendered incompetent by these provisions." To the same effect is Nash v. Gibson, 16 Iowa 306.

There is a dictum to the contrary in Howard v. Galbraith (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 30 S. W. Rep. 689.

In Montague v. Thomason, 91 Tenn. 168, which was an action by executors upon a promissory note, the defendant proposed to testify that the deceased payee had written him a letter, since lost, authorizing a renewal of the note by the execution of another and the cancellation of the old one, and that he had executed a new note and sent it to the deceased; but it was held that he was incompetent to give such testimony, writing of the alleged grantor, notwithstanding the latter is dead at the time of the trial.¹

k. POST-MORTEM EVENTS.—As a rule, the death of one party to a contract or cause of action does not disqualify the other party to testify to any matter occurring after such death.² But on the double ground that it related to both a transaction with and a statement by the deceased.

1. Thus, in Simmons v. Havens, 101 N. Y. 427, it appeared that a mother had conveyed certain real estate to her daughter, then unmarried. The deed was not recorded, and the mother, on account of her displeasure at her daughter's marriage, took it from the daughter's bureau drawer and destroyed it and subsequently conveyed the land to the defendant, Havens, who, according to the evidence, had full knowledge of the facts. The daughter brought ejectment against the defendant, and her testimony was objected to on the ground that it involved a personal transaction with her mother, then deceased. The court said: "Exception was also taken to the plaintiff being allowed to testify that she had the deed in her possession and that the signature was in the handwriting of her mother. She was not asked and did not state from whom she received the deed, and her testimony as to the handwriting or the contents of the deed did not involve a personal transaction between her and her mother. The plaintiff might have received the deed from some third person."

In Stephens v. Cotterell, 99 Pa. St. 191, the court said: "In the rejected evidence covered by the third assignment, there was an offer to prove by Barzilla Stephens, one of the plaintiffs, substantially that he first took possession of the property on or about the time of the appraisal, and, also, where the property was found after letters of administration were granted to the plaintiffs. The defendant objected thereto, first, as it tended to prove a fact prior to the death of Israel, and second, that where they found it, when they took possession after his death, was irrelevant. The objections were sustained. In this we think there was error. It is not concealed that one purpose of this evidence was to create a presumption that the present plaintiffs had not taken possession of the property before the death of Israel. Nevertheless, the offer was to prove facts existing and acts occurring after his death. Although the evidence may, in its effect, tend to prove the same facts existed prior to his death that is no cause for its exclusion. Rothrock v. Gallaher, 10 Norris (Pa.) 108. It was entirely competent to prove, as bearing on both positions contended for by the defendant, where the property was found and in whose possession at the time the administrators, as such, took possession thereof." Compare In re Hoffer's Estate, 156 Pa. St. 473; Rothrock v. Gallaher, 91 Pa. St. 108.

A minor is protected as to all matters occurring prior to his attaining his majority. Stone v. Cook, 79 Ill. 424.

But in Biggs v. McCurley, 76 Md. 409, it was held that a lessee who brought an action against the administrator of his lessor for a breach of covenant was incompetent in his own behalf, although the breach occurred after the death of the lessor, because the contract, on which the action was founded, was made with the lessor. The court said: "And if it be conceded that the lease in this case is the contract or cause of action in issue, then, the lessor being dead, the lessee himself, it is clear, is not a competent witness. And, to escape this conclusion, it was argued that the breach and not the lease itself was the cause of action within the meaning of the statute, and, as the breach occurred after the death of the lessor, the plaintiff was a competent witness. Now, it may be true, that in order to maintain the action, the plaintiff was bound to in some jurisdictions, the rule excludes the surviving party's testimony as to all matters occurring prior to the probate of the will or the grant of letters of administration.¹

1. INDEPENDENT FACTS.—The purpose of the provisos to enabling acts here under consideration is not to render a party incompetent generally, when the opposing party is acting in a representative capacity, but to prevent one party to a contract or cause of action from testifying to personal transactions or communications with the opposing party after the latter has died or has become incapacitated to testify in his own behalf. It follows, therefore, that a party to an action may testify to any fact which is material in evidence and does not involve a personal transaction with the opposing party, notwithstanding the death or insanity of the latter.²

prove a breach of the lease by the lessor, but it is equally true that there could not be a breach or cause of action unless there had been a contract between the parties. And though the cause of action may be said to embrace the lease and the breach, yet the lease, after all, is the contract on which the action is based. And this being so, it is the contract within the meaning of the statute, and the lessor, one of the parties to this contract, being dead, the lessee, the other party, is not, it is clear, a competent witness."

In Wood v. Brewer, 73 Ala. 262, the court said: "What are to be considered transactions with, or statements by, deceased persons under section 3058 of the code of 1876, is a question which very frequently comes before us. To come within the former class, it must be some act done by the deceased or in the doing of which he personally participated. To be within the latter class, there must have been a conversation to which he was a party, in which his statements, replies, or presumed admission from silence, are sought to be introduced in evidence. In each case, to fall within the prohibited line, the transaction or statement must be of such a character and so connected with the deceased as that, if living, the presumption would be, he could deny, qualify, or explain it. This is the sense of the rule. The legislature by it intended to deny to living suitors the advantage they would otherwise have over the estates of deceased adversaries, if permitted to testify to transactions with, and statements by, such adversaries after death had rendered it impossible that such adversaries could be heard in reply. If the testimony relate to a transaction with another or fall not within the class supposed to be particularly within the knowledge of the deceased, neither the rule of exclusion nor the reason of it applies." Citing McCrary v. Rash, 60 Ala. 274; Tisdale v. Maxwell, 58 Ala. 40; Boykin v. Smith, 65 Ala. 294; Killen v. Lide, 65 Ala. 505.

And again, in Miller v. Cannon, 84 Ala. 63, the court said: "We think our former interpretations of the statute we are construing, considered collectively, have established the following propositions: When the case falls expressly within either of the exceptions for which the statute makes provision, neither a party to the record, nor anyone else having a vested pecuniary interest in the result of the suit, can testify against the estate of a deceased party, first as to (that is, directly relating to) any transaction with, or statement by, the deceased involved in the issue on trial; second, that testimony whose direct office and purpose are to corroborate or weaken, strengthen or rebut, other evidence given of such transaction with, or statement by, decedent, is equally within the reason and spirit of the prohibition. Tisdale v. Maxwell, 58 Ala. 40; McCrary v. Rash, 60 Ala. 374; Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Sledge, 62 Ala. 566; Boykin v. Smith, 65 Ala. 294; Killen v. Lide, 65 Ala. 505; Dismukes v. Tolson, 67 Ala. 386; Goodlett v. Kelly, 74 Ala. 213. When, however, the testimony does not relate directly to, nor shed any direct light on, some transaction with, or statement by, the deceased adversary, then the prohibition does not apply. Hence, such witness may testify to pertinent collateral facts and transactions not falling directly within the expressly prohibited class, although the effect may be to materially change the aspect of the case and impair the probative force of the testimony. Wood v. Brewer, 73 Ala. 259, falls within this class." See also Green v. Green (Mo. 1894), 28 S. W. Rep. 1008.

In State v. Osborne, 67 N. Car. 259, the court said: "The third exception was also properly overruled. The plaintiff, it is true, was incompetent to prove any transaction between himself and his deceased guardian, but he was competent to prove any other transaction of his guardian. The transaction in this case was a sale of the property of the plaintiff by his guardian to a third person." Citing Halyburton v. Dobson, 65 N. Car. 88; Isenhour v. Isenhour, 64 N. Car. 640.

In Pritchard v. Pritchard, 69 Wis. 375, which was an action against the administrator to recover for the board of his decedent, it was held that the plaintiff was competent to prove for how long a time the deceased was absent from his house during a certain period, in order to show how long he boarded with him, and also to show what kind of board he furnished. The court said: "The testimony of the respondent objected to, that the deceased during said time was absent so many weeks for the purpose of showing how many weeks he boarded with the respondent, and the testimony of the respondent that he had possession of the three hundred dollar note and had shown it to Christenson and Bauman before the death of the intestate, and that deceased, while living, boarded with the respondent, and the kind of board he received, may be considered together as resting upon the same objection that they were transactions with the deceased under the ban of the statute. Rev. Stats., § 4069. These were independent facts and in no sense transactions with the deceased. They were like unto the evidence decided to be competent in Belden v. Scott, 65 Wis. 425, that the plaintiff kept the books of the deceased, and with how much labor, and the value of the services. See also Daniels v. Foster, 26 Wis. 686."

In Sheibley v. Hill, 57 Ga. 234, the court said: "The defendant was offered as a witness and his testimony was rejected by the court. We think that as to the contract between him and Joseph Davis, or any transactions touching it between him and Joseph Davis, the latter being dead, he was incompetent because the reason on which the statute excluding him is founded is that the other party to the contract is dead and cannot confront him. But he was offered here, among other things, to show the identity of the paper sued on with the paper sold and bought at the administrator's sale. That was a matter between him and the administrator, a sale by the administrator to him, and, as to that transaction, we think that he was competent."

In an action against an executor for the conversion of personal property by his testator, the plaintiff is competent to prove the value of the property. Gregory v. Fichtner, 27 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 86. But he may not testify that he delivered the property to the deceased for safe-keeping. Nunnally v. Becker, 52 Ark. 550.

In other words competency is the rule and the surviving party to the transaction may testify to all material facts within his knowledge, except such as came to his knowledge through a personal transaction or conversation with the deceased,¹ and in order

In an action by an administrator upon a note, the defendant may support his defense that the note had been assigned to his wife by testifying that he saw it in her possession. Smith v. Sergeant, 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 243. And in an action on a promissory note against the estate of the deceased maker, the plaintiff may testify to his possession of the note prior to and at the time of the maker's death. Mortimer v. Chambers, 63 Hun (N. Y.) 335.

Where a party had seen the account book of the opposing party's decedent, it was held that he might testify to an entry which he saw therein in the handwriting of the deceased. Carroll v. Davis, 9 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 60.

In an action against the personal representative of a deceased person, to recover for the hiring of personal property, the plaintiff may testify that the deceased had possession of and enjoyed the use of such property, though he is not competent to prove the contract of hiring. Gray v. Cooper, 65 N. Car. 183.

Where the personal representative of a deceased person is sued for the price of medicines furnished to the decedent in his lifetime, the plaintiff is competent to prove of what ingredients such medicines were composed, as that does not involve a transaction with the deceased. Belote v. O'Brian, 20 Fla. 126.

Where it has been proved that parties were induced to make an agreement by false representations of the other party, since deceased, such parties may testify that they believed and relied on such representations. Hard v. Ashley, 117 N. Y. 606, reversing 53 Hun (N. Y.) 112, sub nom. Hard v. Davison. The court of appeals said: "What led to the making of an arrangement, and the negotiations which shaped it, had all taken place between the parties at a time prior to the execution of the contract. This contract was the effect of the agreement upon which the minds of the parties had met in consent. When, therefore, it was presented to the witnesses for their execution, their belief or reliance in the statement which the deceased had theretofore made, were relevant facts within their own knowledge, and which the deceased could not have known nor testified to himself. If he were living, he could not have contradicted their testimony in that respect."

The widow of a testator, who is named as a legatee in his will, is competent to prove that his will was found among his valuable papers after his death. Cornelius v. Brawley, 109 N. Car. 542.

The surviving party is competent to prove the testimony of a witness, since deceased, given at a former trial of the cause. Costen v. McDowell, 107 N. Car. 546.

to exclude the witness it should be made to appear that his knowledge of the facts to which he proposes to testify was derived from such transaction or conversation and not from another source.¹ An interested party is competent to prove the handwriting of a deceased person if his knowledge thereof was obtained otherwise than through the transaction undergoing investigation.² The obligor in a bond may testify that when he placed it in the hands of an agent for negotiation, it was blank as to the name of the obligee or the amount of the obligation, notwithstanding the obligee is dead at the time of the trial.³ And one who has deposited bonds indorsed in blank for safe-keeping, may testify that when they were deposited there was no name in the indorsement, notwithstanding the custodian and alleged assignee thereof is dead at the time the witness is examined.⁴ Under a statute which excludes matters which, if true, must have been equally within the

In Mississippi, the rule stated in the text does not obtain. It has been held, in that state, that a judgment debtor is not competent, after the death of the judgment creditor, to impeach the judgment by proving that no summons was served on him; though, under the law of the state, he might do so if the judgment creditor were living. Duncan v. Gerdine, 59 Miss. 550.

It is error to exclude a party to the transaction on the ground that the other party is dead, unless it is clear that he can testify to no material facts which are not within the inhibition of the statute. Card v. Card, 39 N. Y. 317.

The presumption being in favor of the competency of the witness, the burden is on the party objecting to show his incompetency. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Sledge, 62 Ala. 566; Hendricks v. Kelly, 64 Ala. 388; Dismukes v. Tolson, 67 Ala. 386; Hill v. Helton, 80 Ala. 528.

But in Reynolds v. Reynolds, 45 Mo. App. 627, it was held that where one party to a contract is dead and the other party offers himself as a witness in his own behalf, he should accompany his offer by a showing that the proposed testimony is admissible under the statute.

4. In Wadsworth v. Heermans, 85 N. Y. 639, affirming 22 Hun (N. Y.) 455, sub nom. Hill v. Heermans, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 470, the plaintiff, as he alleged, had deposited certain bonds indorsed in blank with the defendant's assignor for safe-keeping. During the plaintiff's absence in Europe, the name of the custodian of the bonds was inserted in the blanks, and he assigned the bonds to the defendant and died before the commencement of the action. At the trial, the plaintiff was permitted to testify that when he deposited the bonds the name of the deceased was not in the indorsements or anywhere else in the bonds, and it was held that he was competent to give such testimony. The court said: "We do not think the inquiry involved any personal transaction between Hill and Fellows. It respected merely the then knowledge of the deceased and the witness, a distinction is made between matters within the personal knowledge of the deceased and those of which he had information through other persons; that is, the survivor may not testify to matters which must have been within the personal knowledge of the deceased, but may testify to matters as to which the decedent's testimony would be hearsay, and, therefore, inadmissible were he living.¹

The surviving party may testify to the fact that he had a conversation with the deceased at a certain time and place,² unless condition of the bonds. It neither affirmed nor negated any personal transaction between the two. The insertion of his name in the blank might well have been the separate and independent act of Fellows, and not in and of itself a personal transaction between the two. Whether it was done with the consent or without the consent of Hill, because of a transfer by him, or through a mistake of Fellows, would have involved a personal transaction between the two. Those were the material inquiries and were excluded. That the name was not in the bonds when Hill left them in the safe amounted only to a description of the bonds and indorsement as thus left. Neither in its essential nature nor by reason of the proofs did it involve a personal transaction between the two, either by way of affirmation or denial. Both Hill's knowledge and Fellows' act were, in their essential character, separate and independent of each other. We must enforce the rule fairly, but draw the line somewhere. It is not always easy to do so with entire certainty and precision. We hesitate less in this case, because if the line is not drawn at the point adopted, it is difficult to see where it can be drawn at all. Inferences may often be framed out of the most independent facts. When Hill testified that he bought the bonds of Redbourn and put them among his own papers in the safe, it might be said, inferentially, to negative any personal transaction with Fellows by which the bonds were to be bought for him. The rule must be applied in each case to the facts as they arise, but without pushing it to extremes beyond its natural application. It may also be observed that there is great justice and fairness in the ruling below. The assignee defending was allowed to show the condition of the bonds at one time with the name of Fellows in. Was it, then, improper for Hill to show their condition at another time with the name of Fellows out? Did not the dead man have enough of advantage when he was allowed to reach out from his grave and put into the middle of this trial his declaration in writing that he owned these bonds? The spirit and purpose of this provision of the code is equality, to prevent undue advantage; and that purpose should be kept in view when border questions arise and lines of distinction are to be drawn. We think the courts below applied the rule fairly, and committed no error in overruling the objections." See also Hill v. Heermans, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 470.

In Ripley v. Selligman, 88 Mich. 190, the court said: "In applying this statute, care should be observed in distinguishing between matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased and matters within his information; that is, to distinguish what is knowledge and what is hearsay. It is only as to matters within the knowledge of the deceased that the opposite party is not permitted to testify." Compare Lockhart v. Bell, 86 N. Car. 443.

A party is not precluded from testifying to the fact that he had conversations with the deceased, and when, where, and in whose presence, they were had. Williams v. Mower, 35 S. Car. 206.

In Hier v. Grant, 47 N. Y. 278, Church, C. J., said: "The question to one of the defendants whether he had a conversation with the deceased partner, Schnauber, in relation to selling Hoyt tobacco, was not obnoxious to the objection that it called for a transaction or communication between defendant and a deceased person. The fact of having a communication was not a transaction within the meaning of the code, nor was it a communication. The referee sustained the objection to such fact becomes the material question at issue, as where it is necessary to establish it in order to corroborate other witnesses whose testimony is insufficient to establish the cause of action or defense.¹ Testimony, which on its face relates to an independent fact, should be excluded, where it appears that the fact had its origin in, and directly resulted from, a personal transaction with a person since deceased.² But one party may testify to the

the question calling for the conversation and allowed the witness to state only the fact that he had one. Although such a question is upon the threshold of forbidden ground, I do not think it violates the statute, unless, perhaps, in a case where the mere fact of a conversation is the material fact to be proved. The communication made was the important fact in this case, and the circumstance that a conversation was had was immaterial, and no more important than would be the circumstance that the defendant had seen Schnauber on a certain day."

Where an architect sued the personal representative of a deceased person for the price of certain plans which he had prepared for him, and the plaintiff was permitted to testify to the value of the plans, and also that he would not have drawn them without being requested by someone to do so, it was held that he should not be allowed to testify that he had a conversation with the decedent about the plans, as it might be inferred from such testimony that the decedent requested him to draw them. Ellis v. Filon (Supreme Ct.), 33 N. Y. Supp. 138.

In Killen v. Lide, 65 Ala. 505, there was some evidence tending to show that the surviving party had made a settlement with the deceased, and the survivor was called to testify that he was present with the deceased and the witness at the time and place referred to, but it was held that he was incompetent to give such testimony. The court said: "Lide, who is alleged to have made the settlement with Killen, was dead, and this suit was by his administratrix. The two witnesses referred to had given evidence tending to prove a settlement. Any fact tending to aid or strengthen their evidence of that disputed proposition was evidence tending to prove its truth, or it was nothing. If it tended to prove its truth, then it was evidence of a transaction with the intestate which the statute renders him incompetent to give. Code of 1876, § 3058. The testimony then was irrelevant and worthless, or it was prohibited by the statute." Citing Tisdale v. Maxwell, 58 Ala. 40. Compare Downey v. Andrus, 43 Mich. 65.

2. Thus in Clift v. Moses, 112 N. Y. 426, which was an action on certain promissory notes by the legal representative of a deceased payee, the defense was payment to the deceased in his lifetime, and it was held that the defendant was incompetent to testify that either he or his wife had possession of the notes prior to the death of the payee. The court said: "The possession by the defendant or by his wife of the notes prior to the death of Pardee was a material fact on the main issue of the case. Possession of a thing derived from another is, of course, a personal transaction with the person from whom the possession was derived. Proof by Moses that he had possession of the notes prior to Pardee's death did not of itself necessarily show a possession derived from Pardee. In the absence of explanation, this possession may have been derived from Clift or from some third person to whom the notes had been transferred by Pardee & Co. But before Moses was called as a witness, he had proved by his wife that his possession came from Pardee through a direct personal transaction between Pardee and himself. To permit Moses to testify to his possession of the notes prior to Pardee's death or that he saw them in his wife's hands was equivalent under the circumstances to permitting him to testify that he received the notes from Pardee; and as he could not be permitted to testify directly to that fact, he was equally incompetent to testify to a possession which was the inseparable incident and result of a personal transaction. The statute cannot be evaded by framing a question which, on its face, relates to an independent fact, when it is disclosed other's admissions against interest, though they relate to a transaction or conversation with a deceased person.¹

m. ACTS AND OMISSIONS CAUSING DEATH.—In an action by an administrator to recover damages for the wrongful killing of his intestate, the defendant may not testify concerning the cause of the death.² And where the defendant in such case is a corporation, the officers and stockholders thereof are not competent for the defense.³ Where, however, the right of action is given by the statute directly to the beneficiary, and the damages recovered do not fall into the body of the decedent's estate, for distribution by the administrator, it has been held that the defendant may testify to the circumstances of the killing, because the plaintiff's cause of by other evidence that the fact had its origin in, and directly resulted from, a personal transaction." Compare Downey v. Andrus, 43 Mich. 65.

In Buie v. Scott, 107 N. Car. 181, it was held that the payee in a note was not, after the death of the maker and the loss of the note, competent to prove the date thereof, where that fact had become material in connection with other incidents of the execution of the note.

1. In Hirsh v. Auer (N. Y. 1895), 40 N. E. Rep. 397, which was an action against the beneficiary named in a certificate in a mutual benefit association, by the children of the insured, to recover the proceeds of the certificate, one of the plaintiffs was permitted to testify to an admission against interest made by the defendant and to give the whole conversation on the occasion of such admission which had reference to a transaction with the insured, and it was insisted that this was error on the ground that such evidence must be excluded under section 829 of the Code Civ. Proc. The court, however, said: "We are of opinion that this evidence was competent as tending to prove an admission of Clara Auer against her interest, she being alive at the time of the trial. This was not an effort on the part of the plaintiffs to show a personal transaction or communication between the witness, Mary Ann Hirsh, and her father, and, consequently, section 829 of the code has no application. It was competent to prove this admission of the defendant, Clara Auer, and, in order to do so, the entire conversation between the witness and defendant was material as pointing out the nature of the admission. The only legal effect of this evidence was to prove the admission of the defendant, and it was properly received and considered by the trial judge."

In Forbes v. Snyder, 94 Ill. 378, the court said: "Defendants were offered as witnesses generally as to matters anterior to the death of Snyder, and were held incompetent. This ruling we hold to be correct. In this action, the adverse party sues as administratrix, and, in such case, a party or person interested is expressly excepted from the operation of the statute allowing parties to testify on their own motion in their own behalf. But it is insisted that this clause is to be confined to cases wherein the result of the suit must be to increase or diminish the estate of the deceased person, and that the damages in this case do not, in any proper sense, constitute a part of the estate of deceased, are not assets for the payment of debts or for distribution to heirs or devisees. It is true, these damages are not strictly any part of the estate, but they constitute a fund cast upon his next of kin by means of his death. They surely come within the letter of the statute, and, in our judgment, fall within its spirit. The tongue of Snyder is silent as to the events which led to his death. The same reasons which justify the limitations of the general statute, so as to silence adverse parties where the effect of the proceeding is to increase or decrease the estate, seem equally cogent in a case like the present."

3. Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Keifer, 134 Ill. 483, affirming 26 Ill. App. 466.

But an employee of the company through whose alleged negligence the death of the plaintiff's intestate was action is one which never accrued to the deceased or to his personal representative as such.¹ In such cases, the beneficiary, whether a party to the action or not, may testify for the plaintiff.²

π. WHEN CALLED BY THE OPPOSING PARTY.—A witness who is incompetent to testify to personal transactions or communications with a deceased person, upon his own offer, may nevertheless be called and examined concerning the same by the party who has the right under the statute to object to his voluntary testimony.³ In such case, he is not only competent but may be caused is a competent witness notwithstanding his interest. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Weldon, 52 Ill. 290.

1. Wallace v. Stevens, 74 Tex. 559.
In Mann v. Weiland, 81* Pa. St. 256, the court said: "The fourth assignment relates to the competency of the plaintiff in error to testify. That question is answered by the first section of the act of April 15, 1869, P. L. 30. It declares, 'no interest nor policy of law shall exclude a party or person from being a witness in any civil proceeding,' provided (inter alia) 'this act shall not apply to actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, nor where the assignor of the thing or contract in action may be dead, excepting in issues and inquiries devisavit vel non, and others respecting the right of such deceased owner, between parties claiming such right by devolution on the death of such owner.' This action is not by or against an executor, administrator, or guardian; nor is the assignor of the thing in action dead. There is no assignment, either actually or constructively. If an action had been brought by Weiland to recover damages for injuries he had sustained, it would have survived to his personal representatives, under the 18th section of the act of April, 1851, supra; and after his death the plaintiff in error would not have been competent to testify to matters which occurred during the life of Weiland. This action, however, was not brought by him, nor is it for the recovery of damages for injuries he sustained; but it is for injuries his wife sustained by his death. It is for a cause of action her husband never had. It arose on and after his death, and accrued to his widow. In case of injury causing death, the first section of the act of April 26, 1855 (Pur. Dig. 1094, pl. 3), withholds the right of action from the personal representatives of the decedent, and gives it only to the husband, widow, children, or parents of the deceased. The present right of action never existed in favor of Weiland, nor during his life did it exist against the plaintiff in error. When the law created this right of action against the plaintiff in error, it gave it to the defendant in error. It is true the death of her husband was an act precedent to her right of action; but so was the negligence of the plaintiff in error. The two united enacted the cause of action and gave it to the widow. It had no existence prior to that time. It originated between two living persons. Each is now a party to this action. The learned judge, therefore, erred in not permitting the plaintiff in error to testify, and the judgment must be reversed."

In Hale v. Kearly, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 49, the widow brought her action in the name of the administrator after presenting proper proof that he refused to sue, and it was held that the defendant might testify in his own behalf as the administrator was only a nominal party; the widow being the real party in interest.

compelled to testify.¹ The fact that he is called and examined by his opponent concerning matters which are not within the inhibition of the statute, does not render him competent in his own behalf to give testimony which would be excluded were he to volunteer as a witness for himself.² He may, however, explain the testimony drawn from him by the questioning of his adversary even though it includes a transaction or conversation with a deceased person.³

v. Woodbury, 65 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 226.

In Miller v. Montgomery, 78 N. Y. 285, the court, speaking of a witness who had been called by the opposing party, said: "Either party had the right to call him and have him sworn; and either party had the right to examine him as to all matters to which he was competent to testify; and by such examination they waived nothing. By examining him as to matters for which he was competent, a party would not be bound to permit him to testify as to matters for which he was incompetent. By producing him as a witness, a party would not certify that he was competent to testify as to all matters pertinent to the issue on trial. A party may put his lawyer or physician on the stand as a witness to testify to certain facts, and yet the adverse party could not, upon cross-examination, question the witness as to professional communications or disclosures excluded by the general rules of law. But a party may waive his objections to the incompetent evidence in several ways. He may do it by himself inquiring as to the forbidden transactions or conversations. If he does this, the opposite party may inquire as to the same matters. But here Pollock, upon his examination on behalf of the contestants, was asked only as to facts to which he was perfectly competent to testify. He was not asked as to any transaction or conversation with the testator."

The fact that the witness's examination by the opposing party shows a transaction between him and the deceased will not of itself qualify him to testify to a conversation with the deceased concerning such transaction. Corning v. Walker, 100 N. Y. 547.

In Re Dunlap's Estate, 94 Mich. 17, the court said: "In the present case, the widow was not only called to the witness stand in the probate court, interrogated fully as to the transaction between herself and husband, and asked to make out a list giving the history of the notes, but she was called to the stand in the circuit court, asked to produce the remaining notes, which she did, her attention was called to the list which she had made, and the same was identified, and introduced in evidence. This list showed that several of the notes had been renewed during the lifetime of her husband, and after the date of the alleged gift; that several of these renewal notes had been taken in her husband's name, and that others had been paid to her since her husband's death, and the amounts appropriated by her. The other testimony brought out upon her examination by counsel for the heirs cannot be said to have been confined to admissions made by her after the death of her husband. This widow's disability was waived not only in the probate court but in the circuit. The heirs could not be allowed to go into matters equally within the knowledge of the deceased, so far as they deemed necessary to charge her with these notes, and then revive her disability, so as to prevent her from giving the entire history of the transaction, and thus explain what had been drawn out by counsel for the heirs."

When the personal representative of a deceased person sues one with whom his decedent had dealings for an accounting, he calls the defendant to testify within the meaning of the rule.¹ But in a suit by a surviving partner for a partnership accounting, the plaintiff is not competent to testify in his own behalf.² And in a suit for an accounting inter vivos, an order that the defendant attend and be examined touching the account, will not authorize his examination, should the plaintiff die after the entry of the order and before the examination.³ If a party who has the right to object to the testimony of a witness, calls him and examines him concerning matters within the inhibition of the statute, it seems that the witness may, on his own offer, testify at a subsequent trial of the cause, but such offer, when he proposes to testify to presumably prohibited matters, should be accompanied by a showing that his testimony at the former trial related to matters which occurred during the lifetime of the deceased.⁴ A

If a party is examined by his adversary as to a part of a transaction with the decedent, he may then testify as to the rest of it in his own behalf. Nicolls v. Esterly, 16 Kan. 32; Warren v. Adams, 19 Colo. 515.

If an executor or administrator calls the opposing party to testify to matters within the inhibition of the statute, he does not thereby waive his right to object to the testimony of the husband or wife of such party. Gilbert v. Swain, 9 Ind. App. 88.

1. In Bowen v. Bowen, 17 R. I. 738, the court, among other things, said: "In an accounting, the first step is for the master to require the accounting party to present an account under oath. This may properly be regarded as done at the instance of the party whose suit renders the taking of an account necessary, and the party presenting the account may, therefore, in so doing, properly be regarded as testifying upon the call of his opponent, and hence as not within the prohibition contained in the proviso to Public Statutes of Rhode Island, ch. 214, § 33."

And in such suit, the fact that one of the defendants is presumably a friendly witness for the complainant goes only to his credit and not to his competency. Packer v. Noble, 103 Pa. St. 188.

2. Graham v. Howell, 50 Ga. 203.

And it has been held that, upon a bill for an account by the representatives of a deceased partner, against the surviving partners, the latter are not competent witnesses in their own behalf. Sangston v. Hack, 52 Md. 173.

3. Halsted v. Tyng, 29 N. J. Eq. 86.

4. In Bair v. Frischkorn, 151 Pa. St. 466, the court said: "Frederick Frischkorn, one of the defendants, was called by them to prove that he had an arrangement with plaintiff's intestate, George Bair, by which any payments made to him were to be credited on the note in controversy; that several payments were accordingly made thereon, etc. Plaintiff's objection that the witness is incompetent because he is a party to the record was sustained by the court; and thus arose the only question presented by this record. In this action by the administratrix of George Bair, the defendants were prima facie incompetent to testify to any arrangement or contract with her intestate. It was, therefore, incumbent on them to overcome the prima facie incompetency of their witness by presenting facts, the effect of which would be to remove the disqualification; for example, if they had been able to show that on a former trial the same witness was called by plaintiff to prove transactions between her intestate and himself, the effect would have been to accredit the witness and thus remove his prima facie disqualification. Recognizing the fact that it

party to an action may not, however, call and examine one who appears to be an opposing party, but who is in fact identified with him in interest where the proposed testimony relates to transactions or conversations with a deceased person, the rights of whose estate are in conflict with those of the witness.¹

o. COMPETENCY OF REPRESENTATIVE.—Since it is the purpose of these provisos to enabling acts to protect the estates of deceased and insane persons from the apprehended danger of false testimony by the surviving or sane party to the contract or cause of action, it follows that the testimony of the personal representative given in behalf of the estate which he represents does not fall within the mischief intended to be prevented. Consequently, the general rule is that one who sues or defends in a representative capacity may give any evidence in his own behalf which is not open to objection on grounds other than that here under consideration.² But in some jurisdictions the prohibition extends to was incumbent on them to do so, the defendants, as part of their offer, proposed to show that on a former trial of this case, viz., June Term, 1891, the witness was called by the plaintiff as if under cross-examination and was asked questions, and answered them, and that thereby the plaintiff made him a competent witness to testify to all matters occurring in the lifetime of George Bair. The inference thus drawn by the defendants is a non sequitur from any of the averments contained in their offer. It does not appear therein that the questions propounded to and answered by the witness related to anything occurring in the lifetime of George Bair. If it did so appear, the offer would be self-sustaining; but it does not. For aught that is stated in the offer, the questions may have related to something that occurred since George Bair's decease, and as to which the witness was fully competent to testify. We have no right to assume that they related to anything else."

It follows that in case of his own claim, any party adversely interested may appear and oppose, and in like manner appeal." Shaw, C. J., in Willey v. Thompson, 9 Met. (Mass.) 336.

In Ela v. Edwards, 97 Mass. 318, Gray, J., said: "The statutes requiring an executor or administrator to verify the account of his administration by his oath, and to submit to examination on oath before the probate court upon any matter relating to his account, do not make him a competent witness generally in his own behalf. Gen. Stats., ch. 98, § 9; Bailey v. Blanchard, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 166. The competency of the appellant in this case, therefore, depends upon the statutes making parties to the record competent witnesses. The General Statutes, ch. 131, § 14, by which parties in all civil actions and proceedings, including probate and insolvency proceedings and suits in equity, are admissible as competent witnesses for themselves or any other party, contains the exception that 'where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial is dead, or is shown to the court to be insane, the other party shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor.' The purpose of this exception is to exclude a party to the record from testifying in his own favor when the other party to the contract or cause of action in issue is incapable of testifying against him. Chamberlin v. Chamberlin, 4 Allen (Mass.) 184; Brown v. Brightman, 11 Allen (Mass.) 226. The appellant was not a competent witness within the letter or spirit of this statute. The contract or cause of action in issue and on trial was his claim for services alleged to have been rendered by him to the testatrix in her lifetime. If the claim had been made against the estate of the deceased by any other person than the executor, it must have been prosecuted by action at law, in which the claimant could not have testified in his own favor. An executor having a demand against his testator cannot proceed by action at law because he cannot sue himself, but the appropriate manner of presenting his claim for adjudication is to charge it in his probate account, of which notice is given, so that any person interested in the estate may appear and dispute it. . . . The party plaintiff to the contract in issue and on trial, as well as the plaintiff of record, was the appellant in his individual right. The party defendant was the estate of which the appellant was executor, but which was necessarily represented in this proceeding by the party objecting to the appellant's claim. The statute regulating the competency of parties to the record as witnesses applies equally to probate proceedings and to actions at law. The fact that the appellant was obliged to make his individual claim by stating it in his account rendered to the court of probate, instead of in a declaration in an action at common law, gave him no right to testify in his own favor, since the death of the person whom he alleged to have made the contract which was the foundation of his claim. As the appellant, in seeking the allowance of this item in his account, was prosecuting a claim in his private behalf, and not acting only in a representative capacity, he was not made a competent witness by Statutes 1864, ch. 304, § 1."

As a rule, where both parties are such in a representative capacity, either of them may testify as to transactions with his

In Tuck v. Nelson, 62 N. H. 471, the court said: "The question presented is whether the plaintiff should have been permitted to testify as to the understanding between him and his wife as to the ownership of the shares of stock of which she had the legal title, either as matter of right or discretion to prevent injustice. It is said, in Moore v. Taylor, 44 N. H. 375, and affirmed in Chandler v. Davis, 47 N. H. 464, that the design of the provision in the statute which excludes the survivors from testifying against the estate of a deceased party is to place the parties upon equal footing and not allow the living party to a trade or transaction to be a witness in relation to it when the other party to the same transaction, being dead, cannot testify. An application of this test to the present case shows it to be clearly within the reason and spirit, if not within the strict letter, of the statute. This exception to the general rule allowing parties to testify, was intended for the protection of the estate of the deceased party and not for the personal advantage of the administrator, and the surviving party is prohibited from testifying, not against the administrator personally, but against the estate which he represents. When an administrator is a party in his official capacity, he may testify and permit the adverse party to testify at his election, because he represents the estate of the deceased party, and the statutory exception being for the benefit of the estate, the administrator may waive it; but when the administrator acts in his individual right and against the interest of the estate, as in the case of the settlement of his personal claim or administration account, he stands like any other party claiming adversely to the estate. In such cases, the estate is the defendant and is necessarily represented by the parties opposing the claim as creditors, heirs, or legatees, and the administrator cannot testify as a matter of right." Citing Perkins v. Perkins, 58 N. H. 405; Ela v. Edwards, 97 Mass. 318; Preble v. Preble, 73 Me. 362.

In Lewis v. Merritt, 98 N. Y. 206, an executor sued for the conversion of certain notes which he claimed as the property of the estate; the defense being that the testatrix had given them to the defendant. The executor took the stand and testified that the notes were kept in a tin trunk under the bed of the testatrix; that he saw them there the morning before her death; that upon examining the trunk, the next morning, he found that they had been abstracted; and that they were afterward found in the possession of the defendant, who refused to surrender them. The defendant then offered to testify that he did not take the notes from any trunk or any person, and that he had possession of them several days before the death of the testatrix. It was held that he should have been permitted to give this testimony. The court said: "The excluded evidence did not purport to be admissible, nor was it offered, for the purpose of establishing an affirmative defense; but it is claimed to have been competent, as tending to overthrow a fact upon which plaintiff's cause of action solely rested, and which was testified to by the plaintiff alone. While, of course, it is not competent for a party, when called as a witness in his own behalf against one representing the deceased person, to testify affirmatively as to any transaction or communication had, personally, with such deceased person, or whether a particular interview between them took place or not, unless his adversary is first examined in reference thereto, or the evidence of the deceased person given on some former occasion is proved on the trial, yet this does not necessarily and under all circumstances exclude the evidence of the surviving party when it tends to negate or affirm the existence of such transaction and communication. The object and intent of the restriction placed upon the survivor of those engaged in personal dealings and transactions from giving evidence in relation thereto, will be accomplished if it is limited to cases which preclude him from giving such evidence when it is offered for the purpose of establishing an affirmative cause of action or defense. It is difficult to lay down any general rule which shall cover all possible transactions, but it is safe to say, when a party gives material evidence as to extraneous facts which may or may not involve the negation or affirmation of the existence of a personal transaction or communication with a deceased person, that the adverse party, although precluded from directly proving the existence of such communication or transaction, may give evidence of extraneous facts tending to controvert his adversary's proof, although those facts may also incidentally involve the negation or affirmation of such personal communications or transactions."

Where the personal representative introduces evidence of damaging admissions made, out of the presence of the deceased, by the surviving party to a transaction, the latter may disprove or testify in the result of the suit can testify against the estate of a deceased party, first, as to (that is, directly relating to) any transaction with, or statement by, the deceased, involved in the issue on trial; second, that testimony whose direct office and purpose are to corroborate or weaken, strengthen or rebut, other evidence given of such transaction with, or statement by, decedent, is equally within the reason and spirit of the prohibition." Citing Tisdale v. Maxwell, 58 Ala. 40; McCrary v. Rash, 60 Ala. 374; Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Sledge, 62 Ala. 566; Boykin v. Smith, 65 Ala. 294; Killen v. Lide, 65 Ala. 505; Dismukes v. Tolson, 67 Ala. 386; Goodlett v. Kelly, 74 Ala. 213.

A party will not be permitted to contradict a disinterested witness for his opponent by giving his own version of a transaction with the deceased, to which such witness has testified. Bushee v. Surles, 77 N. Car. 62.

And the fact that such witness acted as an interpreter for the deceased, who could not speak the language of the surviving party, is immaterial. Burnham v. Mitchell, 34 Wis. 117.

But if the transaction was with the executor himself, the other party may testify to it in rebuttal when the executor has proved it by a disinterested witness. Straubher v. Mohler, 80 Ill. 21.

And if the executor or administrator calls an agent of the deceased, through whose fraud the contract is alleged to have been procured, to prove a transaction with the deceased, the other party may testify thereto on his own behalf. Butz v. Schwartz, 135 Ill. 180.

In Nebraska, it appears that a party may testify to a personal transaction with his opponent's decedent in rebuttal of testimony thereto by a disinterested witness. Thus, in Parrish v. McNeal, 36 Neb. 728, the court said: "Under the provisions of section 329 of the code, a person having a direct legal interest in the result of a suit in which the adverse party is the representative of a deceased person, is precluded from testifying to any transaction or conversation had between himself and such deceased person, unless the evidence of the deceased person relating to such conversation or transaction has been taken and read on the trial by the adverse party, or unless such representative has produced a witness who has testified in regard to such transaction or conversation. This case falls within the exception of the statute. The administrator introduced evidence on the trial to show that McNeal had never paid the note; he even proved statements, made by his intestate in his lifetime, after the date of the alleged payment and not in the hearing of the plaintiff, that the note was unpaid. It was not until after such evidence had been received that the plaintiff was allowed to give the testimony complained of. It related to the identical transaction had with the deceased, which the witnesses for the administrator had testified in regard to, and was, therefore, competent."

And, in Pennsylvania, the survivor was made competent in rebuttal of the testimony of a third person by the act of June 11, 1891, P. L. 287. See In re Roth's Estate, 150 Pa. St. 269.

1. Pinney v. Orth, 88 N. Y. 451; Lewis v. Merritt, 98 N. Y. 206; McKenna v. Bolger, 37 Hun (N. Y.) 526; Gorham v. Price, 25 Hun (N. Y.) 11; Wadsworth v. Heermans, 85 N. Y. 639; Haverly v. Alcott, 57 Iowa 171; Miller v. Dayton, 57 Iowa 423; Koenig v. Katz, 37 Wis. 153.

Thus, where a witness has testified to the making of an agreement in his presence, the surviving party to the alleged agreement may testify that he never made such agreement in the presence of the witness. Webster v. Bearinger, 72 Mich. 630; Pinney v. Orth, 88 N. Y. 447.

But he may not testify that he never made the agreement at all. Haughey v. Wright, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 179; Chadwick v. Fonner, 69 N. Y. 404. See explain them by his own testimony.¹ In some jurisdictions, however, this privilege of the survivor is confined to admissions claimed to have been made after the probate of the will, or the appointment of the administrator.² The rules above stated apply

1. Smith's Appeal, 52 Mich. 415; Donlevy v. Montgomery, 66 Ill. 227; Stonecipher v. Hall, 64 Ill. 121; Cousins v. Jackson, 52 Ala. 262; Merrill v. Pinney, 43 Vt. 605.

In Penn v. Oglesby, 89 Ill. 110, it was urged that the survivor was not competent to contradict or explain the admission given in evidence because it was made in the lifetime of the intestate, but the court said the objection was untenable. To the same effect is Burnham v. Mitchell, 34 Wis. 118.

In Smith's Appeal, 52 Mich. 415, it appeared that the representatives of an estate had examined the plaintiff concerning her claim and had rejected it before she began the action. Upon the trial, they put in evidence her statements upon such examination as admissions against interest. It was held that she was competent to testify to the whole transaction concerning which such statements were made. The court said: "Where a party whose testimony, if objected to, would be excluded under the provisions of the statute (2 How. Stat., § 7545) is giving testimony in a cause, and the opposite party calls out facts equally within the knowledge of the deceased, and afterwards seeks to prove the statements so made under oath in a controversy between the same parties, as admissions, he must be held to have waived the inhibition of the statute and the witness may testify fully in respect to the subject-matter of the admission, although it be equally within the knowledge of the deceased. When, therefore, in this case, the defendant had placed the commissioners on the witness stand and proved the admissions made by Mrs. Smith in her testimony given before them relative to the payment of the note and the checks, it was competent for Mrs. Smith to testify relative to the same subject-matter that the note had not been paid, and it was error for the court to strike out such testimony, or exclude her evidence upon the points covered by such admissions."

Where the admissions were made in the presence of the deceased, and the witnesses who testified to them are not parties to the record, parties in interest, or agents of the deceased, the surviving party is not competent to explain or disprove them. Ruckman v. Alwood, 71 Ill. 163.

Proof by an executor of admissions of his adversary tending to show his liability to the estate, does not open the way to the survivor to testify to conversations with, or admissions by, the decedent. Rhodes v. Pray, 36 Minn. 392.

2. Lincoln v. Lincoln, 12 Gray (Mass.) 45; Wade v. Hardy, 75 Mo. 400; Leeper v. Taylor, 111 Mo. 312.

A party should not be prohibited from testifying as to acts and statements attributed to him after the probate of the will or the appointment of the administrator. Brown v. Foster, 112 Mo. 297; Wade v. Hardy, 75 Mo. 400, disapproving Ring v. Jamison, 66 Mo. 424, and Wood v. Matthews, 73 Mo. 482, in so far as they are in conflict with this rule.

A survivor cannot be prevented from testifying as to an admission claimed to have been made by him after the appointment of an administrator, though his testimony may necessarily destroy the evidential value of an admission proved to have been made by him before such appointment. Thus, in Cronan v. Cotting, 99 Mass. 334, the court said: "At the trial, the plaintiff was examined, without objection to his competency as a witness, to testify as to matters occurring since the appointment of the defendant as administratrix. And the only objection of the defendant now open to her, is that he was permitted to testify to a fact existing before such appointment, to wit, his want of knowledge of the existence of certain errors in the accounts between himself and the intestate. The defendant relied on acknowledgments, made by the plaintiff both before and after the death of the intestate, of the balance claimed to be due from him to the estate. It was competent, if the plaintiff is to be regarded as coming within the terms of the last clause of the proviso in the statute making parties witnesses, for him to deny or explain such admissions made since the appointment of the administratrix. Gen. Stats., ch. 131, § 14.

only when the personal representative testifies voluntarily. A party who is disqualified under the statute, cannot render himself competent by calling the personal representative and examining him concerning a transaction between himself and the deceased.¹ And when the representative takes the stand voluntarily, but does not, in his examination in chief, testify to any transaction or conversation between the deceased and the opposing party, the latter cannot render himself competent to testify to matters within the inhibition of the statute, by eliciting testimony concerning the same from the witness upon cross-examination.²

q. WHERE THE DECEDENT'S TESTIMONY IS PRESERVED.—If, after issue joined, the deposition of one of the parties is taken, and he dies before the trial, the introduction of such deposition in evidence, by his personal representative, will open the way to the opposing party to testify to all matters concerning which the deponent has testified.³ And if the testimony of a party, since deceased, given at a former trial of the cause, is read in evidence against

The weight of any such admission would be entirely taken away if made in ignorance of an existing error in the account. And this fact the plaintiff may testify to, although it should incidentally impair the effect of admissions made before the death under the same conditions of ignorance. The plaintiff cannot be deprived of the right to explain the latter admissions because such explanation must necessarily qualify former statements."

In Indiana, the survivor is not competent to testify in denial of admissions proved against him to have been made even after the death of the testator or intestate, unless he is required by the court to testify. Froman v. Rous, 83 Ind. 94.

But he is not bound by the testimony of his opponent even when he calls him himself, as such examination is in the nature of a cross-examination, and he may introduce disinterested witnesses to contradict him. Mason v. Poulson, 43 Md. 161.

2. In Corning v. Walker, 100 N. Y. 547, affirming 28 Hun (N. Y.) 435, the court said: "It is claimed that what plaintiff testified to on the cross-examination was necessary to explain what he had previously testified to on his direct examination, and hence, the evidence offered was competent. We think the testimony offered was not competent on any such ground. The defendant was not required to examine the witness in order to explain his testimony upon the direct examination by introducing evidence as to the declarations of Mr. Corning, sr., and, by doing so, did not open the door to the introduction of conversations had by him with a deceased person. Even if it may be assumed that this testimony related to the same subject in regard to which the plaintiff had given evidence, it was not given by the plaintiff in his own behalf so as to authorize a contradiction of the same. It was drawn out on a cross-examination by the defendant's counsel, and cannot, therefore, be considered to have been given on behalf of the plaintiff and for that reason could not properly be contradicted. There is no rule which authorizes a party to contradict evidence given by his adversary as to a transaction with a deceased person, which he has himself introduced, and the code does not provide for any such case. The testimony being introduced by the defendant himself, he was not authorized to contradict it by showing an interview with a deceased party in relation to the same subject." In Mumm v. Owens, 2 Dill. (U. S.) 477, Dillon, J., said: "Johnson, before his death, was examined as a witness in his own behalf, and his examination was reduced to writing in the form of a deposition, and this deposition has been read in evidence by the plaintiff. Now, is the defendant under these circumstances precluded from testifying to the matters covered by Johnson's evidence as contained in the deposition read to the jury? Under the act of Congress of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. at L. 351, § 3), and of March 3, 1865 (Ib. 533, § 1), it is my opinion that the defendant should be allowed to testify if the plaintiff insists upon keeping the testimony of his intestate before the jury. The first act above cited makes parties competent witnesses in all civil cases, and the second act does not pronounce an absolute disqualification against the living party when the adverse party is an administrator, but enacts that he shall not be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with, or statement by, the testator or intestate, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court. In this case, the intestate has testified and his testimony is before the jury. To exclude the defendant from giving his version of the same transaction would be manifestly unfair and in contravention of the purpose and spirit of the legislation of Congress."

In Monroe v. Napier, 52 Ga. 388, the court said: "In this case Mrs. Varner was dead but her testimony had been taken by interrogatories before her death which were offered and read in evidence by the complainant, in which she fully stated her version and understanding of the contract at the time it was made. What is the reason and spirit of this statute, and what motive had the legislature in the enactment of it? The reason, spirit and intention of the statute is, that when one of the parties to the contract is dead, and cannot give his version of the contract, the other party thereto shall not be admitted to testify in his own favor. If, however, the party who is dead did testify while in life fully in relation to the contract, as in this case, and her testimony is read to the jury, shall the other party to the contract then be excluded from giving his version of it because the other party is dead at the time of the trial? Would such a construction of the statute be in accordance with the reason and spirit thereof? It may be within the strict letter of the statute, but it is no more within the reason and spirit of it than the law which enacted that whoever drew blood in the streets should be punished with the utmost severity, when it was held that the law did not extend to the surgeon who opened the vein of a person that fell down in the street with a fit. The drawing blood in the streets by the surgeon was within the strict letter of the law, but not within the reason or spirit of it. So, in this case, if the complainant had not offered in evidence the testimony of Mrs. Varner, taken in her lifetime, in relation to the contract, the defendants would not have been competent witnesses to testify in their own favor in relation to it. But as the complainant offered and read in evidence her testimony in relation to the contract taken in her lifetime, then to have excluded the testimony of the defendants because she was dead at the trial would not have been in accordance with the reason and spirit of the statute, and the court did not err in admitting their testimony under the facts of the case before it. It was the duty of the court to give the statute a reasonable construction."

Where an executor puts in evidence an entry in his decedent's account book, showing an advancement to a son who claims a distributive share of the estate, that is such testimony of the deceased as will qualify the son to explain the circumstances attending such advancement. Marsh v. Brown, 18 Hun (N. Y.) 319.

In Keran v. Trice, 75 Va. 690, the contrary was held. It there appeared that the deposition of one of the parties was taken and he was cross-examined by the other. The deponent died before the trial, and after his death the deposition of the other party was taken. At the trial, the deposition of the deceased party was offered and received in evidence. It was held that the deposition of the survivor was not admissible on the ground that he was incompetent when it was taken. The court intimated that the deposition might have been received if it had been taken after the amendment of the law by the opposing party, he may be sworn in his own behalf, and may testify in rebuttal of the testimony so read.¹ But in neither case may he testify to matters of the prohibited class, except such as are contained in the testimony of the deceased.²

It has been held that where the testimony of a deceased party has been preserved, and may be used in evidence, the surviving party is competent to testify as to the matters included in the decedent's testimony;³ but, on the contrary, it has been held that he may not testify to matters within the inhibition of the statute, unless the decedent's testimony is first read in evidence.⁴

Bunker*, 68 Mich. 258, the court said: "It is also urged by counsel for plaintiff that, inasmuch as the case had been once tried in the circuit during the lifetime of Mr. Soper, and he was allowed to cross-examine the plaintiff and testify in his own behalf, the plaintiff should be allowed to testify and leave the defendant to introduce in rebuttal the testimony of Mr. Soper given upon the former trial. These circumstances do not afford a sufficient reason for abrogating the statute. Aside from other considerations which render this proposition untenable, it must be remembered that the declaration has been amended since the former trial, so that it cannot be said that the issue is precisely the same, which, if the suggestion were permissible in any case, would render it improper in this." Compare Monroe v. Napier, 52 Ga. 385; Walker v. Taylor, 43 Vt. 612; Barker v. Hebbard, 81 Mich. 267; Zane v. Fink, 18 W. Va.

And, in another case, the intermediate ground has been taken that the error of permitting the survivor to testify is cured by the subsequent introduction, in evidence, of the decedent's deposition touching the same matters.¹ For the purpose of determining the admissibility of a party's testimony, he is, as a rule, considered as testifying at the time when his deposition is offered to be read in evidence, and, consequently, if the opposing party is dead at that time, though he were alive when the deposition was taken, and cross-examined the witness, the deposition, so far as it relates to transactions with the deceased, may not be read in evidence, unless that of the deceased has been first read.² But it has been held that where the witness was competent to testify when his deposition was taken, it was admissible in evidence, notwithstanding the opposing party was dead at the time of the trial.³

7. WHO DEEMED A REPRESENTATIVE.—Generally speaking, one who is an executor or administrator, or takes any part of the estate of a deceased person by devise or inheritance, is deemed his legal representative within the meaning of the rule excluding the testimony of the opposing party concerning transactions with the deceased.⁴ So, also, a party who derives his title to property

When the testimony of Armitage was taken, Knell, the testator, was alive, and, under the Evidence Acts of 1864, ch. 109, and 1868, ch. 116, he was a competent witness. The fact that Knell died before the hearing cannot render the testimony thus taken inadmissible." To the same effect are Neis v. Farquharson (Wash. 1894), 37 Pac. Rep. 697; *McMullen v. Under section 858 of the Rev. Stats. of United States, it is held that the assignee in bankruptcy of one since deceased, is not his legal representative within the meaning of the rule. Thus, in Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 569, the court said: "The witnesses admitted by the circuit court were not excluded by the terms of this statute. The suit in which they testified was not an action by or against an executor, administrator, or guardian. But the counsel for the defendant insists that the policy of the act applies to suits by or against assignees as well as to suits by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, and that we ought to construe the act so as to include such suits. We cannot concur in this view. The purpose of the act was to remove generally the old incapacity to testify imposed on parties or persons interested in the suit. This was done by a sweeping provision subject to certain well defined exceptions; but the exceptions did not include suits by or against assignees in bankruptcy. We cannot insert the exception. When a provision is left out of a statute, either by design or mistake of the legislature, the courts have no power to supply it. To do so would be to legislate and not to construe."

In Douglass v. Snow, 77 Me. 93, the court said: "It is objected that the plaintiff is not a competent witness. She is, unless she comes within some of the exceptions to the provisions of Rev. Stats., ch. 82, § 93. It is claimed that Chase is administrator of the estate of the plaintiff's son, who, it is claimed, is the equitable vendee of the premises. But the mere fact that he is such administrator is not sufficient. He must be a party in his official character and appear as such. He is not sued as such. He is joined in the bill simply as an individual to whom the premises were conveyed by the plaintiff's alleged equitable vendor. Neither by his answer does he appear in that capacity. His signature intimates no official character. If his allegations in the answer are true, he holds the land in his individual and not in his representative character. At most, he is the trustee of the plaintiff's son so far as this case is concerned, holding the property by a resulting trust. Our opinion, therefore, is that she is a competent witness." She is interested only in the question at issue and not in the event of the action, since the record cannot be used as evidence for or against her in a claim for dower.⁵

In Eisenlord v. Clum, 126 N. Y. 557, Peckham, J., after a review of the authorities at common law, said: "Under the rule of the common law on the subject of interest, it is plain that the mother in this case would have been a competent witness. She had no interest in the event of the suit, as that expression has been defined by the courts, and the judgment would not have been any evidence for or against her in any action she might bring. I think the expression, 'interest in the event,' as used in our statute, was never intended to enlarge the class to be excluded under it beyond that which the common law

excluded in using the same language. All legislation on the subject has been in favor of greater liberality in the rules relating to the competency of witnesses. Upon referring to the cases which have been decided under the section of the code already referred to, we find that the rule defining what is an interest in the event is laid down in about the same terms as those used by the common law. Hobart v. Hobart, 62 N. Y. 80; Nearpass v. Gilman, 104 N. Y. 506; Wallace v. Straus, 113 N. Y. 238; Connelly v. O'Connor, 117 N. Y. 91. But the learned general term, upon the appeal in this case, has held the exclusion was proper on the ground that the judgment would furnish the witness with important evidence to establish her claim to dower in the premises described in the complaint. The cases I have cited show conclusively that such a judgment would not have been admissible in evidence at common law, in any such action, either for or against the witness, and in this respect the code has not changed the rule. . . .

The general term also thought the judgment would be evidence as a declaration or admission, by the plaintiff, of the facts, or some of them, which the witness would have to prove in her action against him for dower. Any declaration or admission made by the plaintiff as to any fact material for the witness

Facts which constitute fraud on the part of a deceased person necessarily include a personal transaction or conversation with him.¹ Intrusting money to a person, since deceased, that it might be loaned by him, is a transaction within the meaning of the statute;² and so is the delivery of a deed by one since deceased.³ Facts which are capable of proof by documentary evidence accessible to both parties to the action are not within the inhibition of the statute.⁴

VI. SWEARING THE WITNESS—1. In General.—Before a witness is examined he should be sworn by the proper officer of the court.⁵ But in case he has conscientious scruples against taking an oath, to prove in her action is undoubtedly admissible as an admission. If found in a pleading, and it be shown that it was placed there with the knowledge and sanction of the plaintiff herein, such pleading would be admissible for the purpose of proving such admission. Cook v. Barr, 44 N. Y. 156. In order, however, to prove such admission, it is not necessary or proper to put in evidence the judgment in the action, for it is not the judgment which furnishes the proof, but the admission contained in the pleadings, and the judgment is not in that case the least evidence in favor of the witness in any action she might bring. The admission would exist without the judgment and regardless of it. That the witness has an interest in the question is very plain, but I am aware of no principle that would permit the introduction of this judgment as any proof for or against the witness in any other action. I see no foundation for any estoppel as against the plaintiff herein in an action brought by the witness to recover her dower. If, as I say, he has made admissions, they may be proved, but to say that he is estopped in the action for dower from denying any fact upon which the right of the plaintiff in such action depends, because in another action between himself and a third party it was necessary for him to prove the same fact, would be a great extension of the doctrine of estoppel. If, in the course of such first trial, the plaintiff had admitted by his own testimony any fact material in the dower action, it would be an admission which could be taken advantage of by proving that it was made. But if the fact had been proved by some third party instead of by the plaintiff, it is not, in that event, an admission or declaration of the plaintiff therein which renders a judgment in that action proof against him in any future controversy with a third party. . . . Our conclusion is that the mother of the plaintiff was a competent witness to prove any or all facts of which she was cognizant and which were material and which were not inadmissible upon some ground other than the alleged interest of the witness in the event of the action."

testimony of a witness whose credibility has been successfully attacked;¹ but no court has a right to lay down rules whereby the jury shall determine the force of evidence irrespective of the credence they actually give it in their own minds.² It is reversible error for the court thus to invade the province of the jury.³

Though the jury are the judges of the credibility of the witnesses, they have no right arbitrarily to disbelieve the testimony of an unimpeached witness, unless they are convinced that he has willfully sworn falsely to some material fact in the case.⁴ And the testimony of a witness who has been discredited by impeaching evidence should not be wholly disregarded when it is sustained by the evidence of other witnesses or by corroborating circumstances.⁵ When an attempt has been made to impeach a

On the other hand, the law imposes on a juror no obligation to believe a witness who is unimpeached, but leaves his testimony to operate on the mind of each juror with such force as it may naturally have in producing belief. witness, his testimony is before the jury, and the presiding judge has no legal authority to tell them they should disregard it if they believe he has been successfully impeached. The question of his credibility rests with the jury, even though he has been discredited.¹

2. General Rules for the Guidance of the Jury.—In weighing the testimony of a witness, the jury should consider how far it is corroborated by other evidence, the nature, probability and consistency of his story, his manner of giving it, and all the ordinary circumstances which make for or against his credibility so far as they appear at the trial.² But no juror should make use of his personal knowledge of facts affecting the credibility of a witness, unless he has himself been sworn as a witness, and has testified to such facts in the progress of the trial.³ Nothing to the contrary appearing, it is to be presumed that an unimpeached witness testified truly and not falsely.⁴ This, however, is not a presumption of law in a technical sense, but rather one of fact drawn from our experience and knowledge of human veracity.⁵ If, in a civil case, the jury are not able to arrive at a conclusion as to whether the testimony of a witness is true or false, they should give such a verdict as they would render if his testimony were stricken out.⁶

nected therewith, is not of itself sufficient to discredit him,¹ unless such matters were so inseparably connected that he must remember all or none of them.² On the other hand, a witness may very seriously impair his credibility by swearing positively and minutely to occurrences long past, which were not of such a nature as to impress themselves forcibly upon his memory.³ Where a witness swears to a fact as of his own knowledge, it will be presumed that he had competent means of information, nothing to the contrary appearing.⁴ But if he swears to a fact without actual knowledge, he is guilty of legal false swearing, even though the fact be actually true.⁵ And where it appears that he has so testified, he is unworthy of belief.⁶ Where, from the business or occupation of a witness, he has peculiar knowledge of the matter in controversy, the jury are justified in giving more weight to his testimony than to that of a witness whose occupation does not afford equal means of information.⁷ The weight to be given the testimony of a witness frequently depends upon the opportunity he had to observe the facts to which he has sworn.⁸

4. Improbability.—A mere abstract improbability of the facts stated by an otherwise unimpeached witness, is not sufficient to discredit him where no impossibility is shown.⁹ To have that effect, the improbability must arise from facts appearing upon the trial, and must not rest wholly in the minds of the court and jury.¹⁰

10. "In all cases the positive testimony of an otherwise unimpeached witness can only be disregarded when its improbability or inconsistency furnishes a reasonable ground for doing so, and this improbability or inconsistency must appear from facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence in the case. It cannot be arbitrarily disregarded by either court or jury for reasons resting

5. Bias—a. IN GENERAL.—The fact that a witness manifests a partiality for the party who calls him is a proper matter for the consideration of the jury in estimating the value of his testimony, and it is competent to prove facts and circumstances which naturally tend to create bias in the mind of a witness, for the purpose of affecting his credibility.¹

b. RELATIONSHIP.—With the exception of the relation of husband and wife, the mere relationship of a witness to the party who called him was no ground of disqualification at common law. But, in the very nature of things, near relatives of a party, especially in criminal cases, generally come to the witness stand with strong feelings of sympathy and bias which may give color to their testimony, however truthful they may try to be. Consequently, such relationship is a proper matter for the consideration of the jury in estimating the value of their testimony, and the court may so instruct the jury.² But as the relatives of a

Where a witness, otherwise unimpeached, testifies under circumstances calculated to create a strong bias, and he states what is, in its nature, incredible, his testimony is not necessarily to be believed. Woodruff, J., in *The Helen R. The fact that a physician was employed to examine a party for the express purpose of becoming a witness in the case, may be considered by the jury as affecting his credibility. Jones v. Portland, 88 Mich. 604.

The rule is not changed by the fact that the circumstances which tend to create bias may prejudice the jury against the party calling the witness. State v. McGahey, 3 N. Dak. 293; Crist v. State, 21 Tex. App. 366.

It has been held that evidence of the business relations between a witness and the party calling him is admissible to show bias. Totten v. Burhans (Mich. 1894), 61 N. W. Rep. 58.

The voluntary appearance of a witness without a subpoena is not of itself sufficient to discredit him. State v. Keys, 53 Kan. 674. But the fact that he attends voluntarily may, under some circumstances, betray his feeling in the case, and it is in the discretion of the court to permit him to be cross-examined as to that matter. Wabash R. Co. v. Ferris, 6 Ind. App. 30.

The fact that a witness and the party who calls him are both knights of labor, is not admissible to show bias. Constable v. Lefever (Supreme Ct.), 21 N. Y. Supp. 38. But where it appeared that there was a secret society organized to repress the class or sect to which the defendant belonged, it was held proper to ask a witness for the prosecution if he was a member of such secret society. *People v. party are not, on that account, incompetent as witnesses in his behalf, the court has no right to withdraw their testimony from the consideration of the jury.¹

c. EMPLOYEES.—In an action against a master for the negligence of his servants, the latter are competent witnesses for the defendant. The relation of master and servant, and the incentive of the servants to exonerate themselves from blame, go to their credit, however, and the court may inform the jury of their right to consider these matters in that connection.² But the judge should not give an instruction based on the assumption that a

In State v. Ellington, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 66, Ruffin, C. J., said: "It also seems to the court that the prisoner can take no benefit from his other exception. His Honor did not express an opinion upon any fact in controversy, but merely applied a rule of law to an admitted fact. It was not disputed that the witnesses were the mother and sister of the prisoner, and the court, therefore, did not err in so considering them; nor was there error in telling the jury that their relation to the prisoner affected their credit. That is a proposition of reason and law. The law takes notice that some relations are so close that persons standing in them, though they might tell the truth, cannot be trusted in general, and, therefore, it excludes them altogether. That rule does not, indeed, embrace parents and children, or brethren. Yet all writers upon evidence say that, though it does not make them incompetent, it goes to their credit, because we know that such relations create a strong bias, and that it is an infirmity of human nature sometimes, in instances of great peril to one of the parties, to yield to the bias produced by the depth of sympathy and identity of interests between persons so closely connected. How far these witnesses adhered to their integrity or were drawn aside by the ties of nature between them and the prisoner, in other words, the degree in which the relation actually affected their veracity, was a question for the jury, and his Honor left it to them explicitly. It was proper to let them know that they might legally take the relation into their consideration in estimating the credit to be given to their testimony, and there was nothing improper in stating, also, the reason on which the rule of law rests."

witness stands in fear of being discharged by his employer, unless there is evidence in the case tending to show that fact.¹

6. Hostility.—The hostility of a witness towards a party against whom he is called to testify is always a matter to be considered as affecting his credibility and may be proved by any competent evidence. It may be shown by the cross-examination of the witness himself, or other witnesses may be called who can swear to facts showing it.² It is not a collateral matter regarding which a party is bound by the answer of the witness on cross-examination. If he denies that he entertains any hostility of feeling, other witnesses may be called to contradict him.³ It is, however, so far collateral that a witness will not be permitted to state the cause of his hostility,¹ though sufficient latitude should be allowed in the examination to develop the nature and intensity of his animosity.² It is not necessary to examine the witness himself concerning his hostility of feeling before calling other witnesses to prove it,³ but an attempt to discredit a witness by proof of independent facts intended to show hostility on his part is not allowable, unless the facts sought to be proved imply of themselves a bad or revengeful feeling.⁴ Where witnesses are called to discredit another witness in this manner, they should state his hostile declarations or the facts which imply hostility. It is not permissible for them to state their own conclusions on the subject.⁵ The evidence should show also that the ill feeling exists at the time of the trial, though no rule can be laid down as to what remoteness in point of time would be sufficient to exclude it.⁶

In People v. Brooks, 131 N. Y. 325, Earl, C. J., said: "The hostility of a witness towards a party against whom he is called may be proved by any competent evidence. It may be shown by cross-examination of the witness, or witnesses may be called who can swear to facts showing it. There can be no reason for holding that the witness must first be examined as to his hostility, find that then, and not till then, witnesses may be called to contradict him, because it is not a case where the party against whom the witness is called is seeking to discredit him by contradicting him. He is simply seeking to discredit him by showing his hostility and malice, and, as that may be proved by any competent evidence, we see no reason for holding that he must first be examined as to his hostility, and such, we think, is the drift of the decisions in this state and elsewhere." Citing *Hotchkiss v. Germania F. Ins. The case of Edwards v. Sullivan, 8 Ired. (N. Car.) 304, is not in harmony with the other authorities on this point. There the court proceeded on the mistaken hypothesis that the object was to discredit the witness by contradicting him, whereas the real object is to show the state of his feelings in respect to the parties.

In State v. Dee, 14 Minn. 35, it was objected to the introduction of evidence of a threat made by a witness to kill a party against whom he was called to testify, that the threat was too remote in the point of time to show hostility at the time of the trial, having been made

7. Parties to Civil Actions.—The common-law incompetency of parties being removed by statute, the interest which they have in the result of the trial is a matter to be considered by the jury in weighing their testimony and determining what force it shall have;¹ and the jury are not bound to give credit to the statements of a party, though he is uncontradicted and unimpeached.² On the other hand, it cannot be affirmed as a matter of law that the jury are bound to give more weight to the testimony of one witness than they accord to that of another, on the ground of interest in the one and a lack of it in the other.³ The testimony of a party in interest, as that of any other witness, must be submitted to the jury, for whom it is to say how far his interest shall affect his credibility.⁴ But it is error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury that they have a right to consider the interest of a party when weighing his testimony.⁵

8. Interest in the Event of the Suit.—The fact that a witness is directly interested in the event of the suit in which he is called to testify, being no longer a ground of incompetency, is a circumstance which the jury may consider as affecting his credibility.⁶

in November preceding the trial in October of the next year. The court said: "While we do not hold that there may not be cases where the expression of hostile feelings was made at a date too remote to furnish any reasonable ground for inferring that such feelings continue to exist at the time of the trial, we are of opinion that in this case the testimony offered should have been submitted to the jury. There is no principle or presumption, so far as we are aware, which would authorize a court to say that the feelings which found expression in a threat to kill the defendant in November had ceased to exist in or influence the mind of the witness in October following."

Thus, an attorney whose fee is contingent upon his success in the cause, cannot be considered a disinterested witness when he is called by his client.¹ And the same is true of a witness whose testimony tends to shield him from a criminal prosecution.²

9. Accomplices — (See infra, this title, Corroboration). — An accomplice being a competent witness either for or against the accused, his credibility is, at common law, a question for the jury the same as that of any other witness.³ And, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, the prisoner may be legally convicted on the unsupported testimony of a confederate in crime.⁴ Such

The fact that a witness has laid a wager on the result of the trial, is a circumstance which goes to his credibility. People v. Parker, 137 N. Y. 535. So, also, the fact that a witness is a bondsman of one of the parties, may be shown as affecting his credibility. State v. Calkins, 73 Iowa 128.

In Bevan v. Atlanta Nat. Bank, 142 Ill. 308, it was claimed that the fact that a witness was in a like situation in respect to another claim as that of the party calling him, was a fact which should be considered by the jury as affecting his credibility. The court said: "Several of the witnesses of the plaintiff were asked, on cross-examination, whether they held notes signed by Pratt and Mrs. Williams, where the genuineness of her signature was disputed, or were interested in any bank which held such notes, and the court excluded the evidence. It is not claimed that the holding of such a note, or having an interest in a bank which held such a note, would disqualify the witnesses from testifying in the case, but the claim is that the witnesses were interested, and the evidence was competent as affecting their credibility. It is always competent to show, on cross-examination, that a witness is interested in the result of the suit, but here the witnesses had no direct interest in the result of the suit. The interest, if any, was so remote that we do not regard the ruling of the court in rejecting the evidence as erroneous."

But when, as here, the testimony proceeds from persons who would be guilty of a criminal fault unless they vindicated themselves from the presumption arising from the transaction, a question of credibility is presented for the jury."

evidence, however, should be received with great caution, and should be carefully and doubtingly scrutinized, and it is proper for the court so to instruct the jury,¹ except in jurisdictions where the court has no authority to give any instructions on the weight of evidence.² The fact that an accomplice testifies under a promise of leniency, makes strongly against his credibility and may always be shown for the purpose of weakening the force of his testimony.³

The court may comment upon the nature of such testimony, and point out the various grounds of suspicion which may attach to it, call the jury's attention to the situation and temptation under which the witness may be placed, explain the motives by which he may be actuated, etc., but should not instruct the jury that they are bound to believe or disbelieve him in any particular. *People v. purpose, is not to be regarded as an accomplice, though his conduct must, in some degree, impair his credibility.¹ The fact that a detective employs falsehood, artifice, and fraud to obtain a confession from a person suspected of crime, is not sufficient of itself to exclude his testimony, but it very seriously affects his credibility.² Again, a person who buys intoxicating liquor which is sold in violation of law is not an accomplice of the vendor;³ but if he buys it for the express purpose of prosecuting the vendor, the court may well instruct the jury that his testimony ought to be received with great caution and distrust,⁴ though a less vigorous charge will meet the requirements of the law. Thus, it is sufficient if the court directs the attention of the jury to the conduct of the prosecuting witness, and tells them that it is a matter for their consideration in weighing his testimony.⁵ The testimony of a private detective employed to watch

In Heldt v. State, 20 Neb. 492, the court said: "A man who will deliberately ingratiate himself into the confidence of another for the purpose of betraying that confidence, and while with words of friendship upon his lips he is seeking by every means in his power to obtain an admission which can be tortured into a confession of guilt which he may blazon to the world, as a means to accomplish the downfall of one for whom he professes great friendship, cannot be possessed of a very high sense of honor or of moral obligation. Hence, the law looks with suspicion on the testimony of such witnesses, and the jury should be specially instructed that in weighing their testimony greater care is to be exercised than in the case of witnesses wholly disinterested. Pruit v. People, 5 Neb. 377. The weight to be given to such evidence is a question for the jury and cannot be urged against its admissibility. The confession, however, seems to have been voluntary, although made to one who deliberately and repeatedly deceived and made false statements to the plaintiff to obtain it. It is doubtful if anything is really gained in the administration of the law from the admission of such testimony and the consequent encouragement of the courts of the practice. If it is answered that confessions are thus obtained which otherwise could not be had, it may be said in reply that the same is true of the rack and wheel by means of which confessions were formerly forced from its victims but which experience showed were entirely unreliable. So far as appears, the plaintiff confided in this man as his friend and was betrayed by this professed benefactor. The testimony of such a man may be entitled to but very little credence, yet it must be submitted to the jury."

a husband or wife, with a view to learning facts upon which to base a suit for a divorce, is to be received with great caution, and should be carefully and minutely scrutinized.¹ It is competent to show that a witness is a professional detective, hired by private individuals to work up the case. The jury have a right in weighing the evidence to know the influences which operate upon the witnesses.²

11. Relative Value of Positive and Negative Testimony.—Ordinarily a witness who testifies positively to an affirmative is entitled to greater credit than one who testifies to a negative, because he who testifies to a negative may have forgotten. It is possible to forget a thing that did happen, but it is not possible to remember a thing that never existed.³ The applicability of the rule to

In State v. Hoxsie, 15 R. I. 4; 2 Am. St. Rep. 838, it appeared that certain witnesses called for the state were employed at so much compensation a day in that and other cases, and that they made it their business to procure illegal sales of intoxicating liquors for the purpose of prosecuting the sellers. The defendants requested the judge to charge the jury, in regard to these witnesses, that the testimony of spotters is to be received with great caution and distrust. The judge, however, refused, and instructed the jury that they must weigh all testimony with caution, especially where they saw any reason to doubt its truth or to discredit it. Of this instruction the court said: "We do not see any error in this. The credibility of witnesses is a question for the jury. Counsel are always permitted to argue it to the jury as a matter peculiarly within their province. Without doubt, it is proper for the court to direct the attention of the jury to anything in the conduct or character of witnesses which affects their credibility, and we think the court below, though it might, doubtless, have expressed itself more pointedly without fault, did all it was necessary for it to do. A spotter is not, in contemplation of law, an accomplice."

L. & Eq. 613, Dr. Lushington said: "Whenever persons of this description, such as Owen and others, are employed, for money, to procure evidence to establish any fact, all that they do or say must be watched with great vigilance and for divers reasons. Such persons are naturally anxious to attain their object, and generally, to a certain extent, their pecuniary reward depends, or is by them supposed to depend, on their success; and the very nature of their employment, the constant mixing with the lowest characters, does not tend to make them the most scrupulous agents. Great care and caution, therefore, is necessary; but such caution must not be carried to an extravagant length, for we all know that upon evidence so procured the lives of many men formerly depended, and even at this day all but life does frequently depend."

any state of facts must depend upon whether the negative testimony can be attributed to inattention, defect of memory or inadequate means of knowledge.¹ Consequently, testimony may be negative in form, though in fact not so within the meaning of the rule. Thus, where one witness swears that a certain thing took place, and another of equal credibility and means of knowledge swears positively that it did not, there is a flat contradiction and the rule does not apply.²

Where, after the lapse of forty-eight years, fifteen witnesses testified that a soldier who served in the revolutionary army had survived the war, and one witness testified that he fell in battle during the war, the latter witness being corroborated by documentary evidence, the court refused to disturb a verdict founded on the testimony of the one witness thus corroborated. *Jackson v. In Johnson v. Scribner, 6 Conn. 185, which was an action of slander for defamatory language alleged to have been uttered in a ballroom, where there was a dancing assembly and the music of a violin, three witnesses for the plaintiff testified positively to the speaking of the words charged; and eleven witnesses for the defendant testified that they were in the room at the time and heard no such language and that, in their opinion, they would have heard it if it had been uttered. The verdict was for the defendant, and the court granted a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. Hosmer, C. J., said: "If, in a comparison between the witnesses in respect of the means and opportunity which they have had of ascertaining the facts which they testify, it turns out that the one has had more competent and adequate means of information than the other, or that, under the circumstances of the case, the attention of the witness testifying that he did not see or hear, was not so likely to be so fully excited and particularly directed to the facts as that of the one who swears affirmatively, this principle coöperates with the one first stated in all cases where there is room for error and mistake. It is true that evidence of a negative nature may, under particular circumstances, not only be equal but superior to positive evidence. This must always depend on the question, whether the negative testimony may be attributed to inattention, deficient means of knowledge, error or defect of hearing. . . .

The witnesses who have sworn that they did not hear may have testified truly, perhaps through deficient means of knowledge, or inattention to the conversation relative to which they have given evidence. And this presumption, founded as it is in law and common candor, is powerfully enforced from the noise and tumults and attractions with which they were surrounded, and the still further probability that they were not within earshot of the defendant's conversation. The inference is unquestionable that the verdict is manifestly and palpably against the weight of evidence, and the facts ought to be submitted to another jury."

Whether negative testimony as to blowing a whistle or ringing a bell is to be brought within this rule, will depend upon the situation of the witness and the attention he is giving at the time in question. Rockford, etc., R. Co. v. Hillmer, 72 Ill. 236, distinguishing Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Still, 19 Ill. 499; 71 Am. Their testimony was as positive, as to the fact in controversy, as the testimony of the people's witnesses, and if they had equal honesty, ability and opportunity of knowing what did transpire, and memory, their testimony would have had the same weight on a mind seeking to ascertain truth."

An instruction that if the jury find that a witness has testified falsely, as to any material fact in the case, they are at liberty to reject and disbelieve all his testimony, clearly and sufficiently states the law upon the subject, and it is not necessary in applying this rule to call the attention of the jury to any particular witness. Fraser v. Haggerty, 86 Mich. 521.

instruction, therefore, is that the jury may disregard the whole of the testimony of such a witness, and it is reversible error to instruct them that they must do so. But in Huber v. Teuber, 3 McArthur (D. C.) 484; 36 Am. Rep. 110, it was held that a witness who swears to a falsehood in relation to a matter the truth of which he must have known, is not to be believed in any part of his testimony, even when the fact is not material in the case.

In Georgia, the rule is that where a witness knowingly and willfully swears falsely in a material matter his testimony should be rejected entirely, unless it be corroborated by the facts and circumstances of the case, or by other credible evidence. Pierce v. State, 53 Ga. 365; Skipper v. State, 59 Ga. 63; Jackson v. State, 64 Ga. 348; Williams v. State, 69 Ga. 34; Day v. Crawford, 13 Ga. 508.

In New York, there has been much confusion on this point. In Dunlop v. Patterson, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 243, it was held that the testimony of a witness who contradicted himself on a material point should be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury. The correctness of this decision was questioned in Dunn v. People, 29 N. Y. 528; 86 Am. Dec. 319, where Denio, C. J., said that the testimony should remain in the case to be considered by the jury in connection with the other evidence, under such prudential instructions as might be given by the court. But in People v. Evans, 40 N. Y. 5, the court returned to the doctrine of Dunlop v. Patterson, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 243. But in Pease v. Smith, 61 N. Y. 483, it was held that the trial court had no power, under the maxim, to instruct the jury that they ought not to consider the testimony of such a witness, and it was there said that the jury are clearly at liberty to believe the witness, though they may, if they see fit, disregard his testimony. This decision, however, did not set the matter at rest, as the court admitted that there might be an exception where it was shown that the witness had been guilty of perjury, though not convicted of the offense. Again, in Place v. Minster, 65 N. Y. 103, it was said, by the commission of appeals, "the cases which go to show that the testimony of a witness who contradicts himself, or who is impeached by the testimony of others, must be rejected by the judge, cannot be regarded as law in this state." Citing Dunn v. People, 29 N. Y. 523; 86 Am. Dec. 319; White v. McLean, 57 N. Y. 670; Wilkins v. Earle, 44 N. Y. 172; 3 Am. Rep. 655; Pease v. Smith, 61 N. Y. 477; Warren v. Haight, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 490.

Notwithstanding this clear statement

If, in the application of this maxim, the judge were authorized to withdraw the testimony of the witness from the jury, or to direct them to disregard it, the distinction between competency and credibility would, to that extent, be obliterated, and a witness might, in effect, be rendered incompetent upon his own confession of perjury, without a trial or conviction, and thus the judge could, by an instruction on the credibility of the witness, accomplish what he would be powerless to do when acting in the capacity of judge of the competency of the witness.¹

there remained some doubt as to the power of the court where a witness had willfully perjured himself, as will be seen by consulting Deering v. Metcalf, 74 N. Y. 501; People v. Petmecky, 99 N. Y. 423.

The legislature, however, came to the relief of the court and entirely removed incompetency occasioned by conviction of crime, perjury not excepted. See New York Penal Code, § 714; New York Code Civ. Proc., § 832. And now the law in that state is as laid down in the text. See People v. Chapleau, 121 N. Y. 276.

In People v. O'Neil, 109 N. Y. 251, Andrews, J., said: "The refusal of the court to charge that if the jury should find that the witnesses Fullgraff and Duffy had, in the testimony before the Senate committee in respect to the same matters, committed willful perjury, the jury should wholly disregard their testimony given on the trial, raises a question which, prior to the enactment of section 714 of the Penal Code, was open to doubt under the decisions in this state. The cases were fully reviewed in Deering v. Metcalf, 74 N. Y. 501, and the question was again referred to in the recent case of People v. Petmecky, 99 N. Y. 421. Under the Rev. Stats. (2 R. S. 681), a person convicted of perjury was not permitted to be a witness in any cause or matter until his conviction was reversed. While this statute was in force, there was much reason certainly in the contention that where a witness, by his own confession on the stand, in the presence of the jury, admitted that he had willfully perjured himself on a former occasion in respect to the same matter, his testimony ought to be wholly disregarded to the same extent as though his perjury had been judicially established by conviction. But now, by section 714 of the Penal Code, no conviction for crime disqualifies a witness, and the section expressly makes a person convicted of crime, not excepting perjury, a competent witness in any cause or proceeding, civil or criminal, but allows the conviction to be proved for the purpose of affecting the weight of his testimony. It would be manifestly absurd, in the light of this statute, now to hold that an unconvicted perjurer was an incompetent witness whose evidence could not be considered by the jury, when, under the statute, if he had been convicted, his evidence must be received and weighed by the jury. In view of the present statute, whatever doubts may have heretofore existed, the true rule is that stated by Judge Denio in Dunn v. People, 29 N. Y. 529; 86 Am. Dec. 319, and which was followed on the trial of this case, that the testimony of a witness who has committed perjury in the same matter on a prior occasion, whether the perjury is established by a conviction or by his confession, or is found by the jury, 'must be considered by the jury in connection with the other evidence under such prudential instructions as may be given by the court, and subject to the determination of the court having a jurisdiction to grant new trials in cases of verdicts against evidence.'"

1. In Rex v. Teal, 11 East 307, a witness admitted that she had before sworn falsely upon the particular point to which she was then called to testify, and it was strongly urged, upon the authority of the cases of Titus Oates, 4 St. Tr. 47, and Elizabeth Canning, 10 St. Tr. 390, that her evidence should be rejected by the court, though she had not been convicted of perjury, and this, upon the analogy of a witness who admits himself to be an infidel. But Lord Ellenborough, C. J., observed that an infidel cannot admit the obligation of an oath at all, and cannot, therefore, give evidence under the sanction of it. 'But,' said he, "though a person may prove on his own showing, or by other

IX. IMPEACHMENT—1. Direct Contradiction.—It is scarcely necessary to state that a party has a right to call witnesses to contradict material evidence, given by a witness for his adversary.¹ As has been said by a learned judge, if a witness fabricate a story and circumstances, the disproof of the circumstances is generally the only possible way of disproving the material facts.² Consequently, where the witness has given testimony which is material to the issue on trial, he is subject to direct contradiction upon any fact or circumstance which tends to corroborate and strengthen his testimony.³ So, also, his credit may be attacked by proof of evidence, to have forsworn himself as to a particular fact, it does not follow that he can never afterwards feel the obligation of an oath, though it may be a good reason for the jury, if satisfied that he had sworn falsely on the particular point, to discredit his evidence altogether; but still, that would not warrant the rejection of the evidence by the judge. It only goes to the credit of the witness, on which the jury are to decide." And, after quoting some passages from Lord Chief Baron Gilbert, the learned Chief Justice observed that those passages, contrasted with others, pointed out the distinction between competency and credibility.

In State v. Williams, 2 Jones (N. Car.) 257, it was insisted, upon the supposed authority of State v. Jim, 1 Dev. (N. Car.) 509, that, where a witness had committed willful perjury, the court should instruct the jury, as a rule of law, that his whole testimony should be disregarded. But Pearson, J., after an elaborate review of the authorities, arrived at the conclusion stated in the text. He said: "The result is that the construction put on State v. Jim, 1 Dev. (N. Car.) 509, has no other support but Dunlop v. Patterson, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 243, and that stands by itself as the only instance in which a court of common law has converted the maxim, 'falsum in uno, etc.,' into a rule of the law of evidence to be enforced by the court, and is opposed by all the decisions that have ever been made in any other common-law court. Next, as to analogy. If a witness admits that he has committed murder or burglary, State v. Valentine, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 225; or felony, in stealing a slave, State v. Haney, 2 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 390, he is, nevertheless, a competent witness, and his testimony is to be weighed by the jury, and they may convict upon it, provided it 'carries to their minds full and entire conviction of its truth.' Where is the difference between a witness who confesses that he has been guilty of these crimes, and one who confesses that he has committed perjury? The idea that the latter was a confession of the crimen falsi is suggested by Cockell, in Rex v. Teal, 11 East 307, but the court said there was nothing in it, because murder, burglary, etc., are crimes of a higher nature, and include not merely a disregard of truth, but a disregard of all obligations and a total depravity and wickedness of heart, consequently, a system of law would not be true to itself which permitted the testimony of the former to be weighed by the jury, but required the testimony of the latter to be withdrawn from their consideration. This must be so, according to the maxim, 'the greater includes the less.' All the writers upon evidence treat of the evidence of an accomplice and the impeachment of a witness, by his confession or by contradictory statements, in the same connection."

2. Conduct Inconsistent with Testimony.—The acts and conduct of the witness, relative to the matter in controversy, and inconsistent with his testimony, may always be proved for the purpose of weakening the force of his evidence.²

3. Previous Contradictory Statements—a. LAYING FOUNDATION—(1) In General.—As we shall presently see, a witness may be impeached by proof that he has, upon some material point, made verbal statements out of court which contradict his testimony at the trial, though such statements are not admissible as independent evidence on the merits of the case. But before the evidence of such contradictory statements can be received, it is necessary to prepare the way for its reception by cross-examining the witness concerning the supposed contradictions which are to be brought forward against him, and such cross-examination must extend not only to the particulars of the conversation, upon which it is intended to contradict the witness, but also to the time when, the place where, and the person or persons to whom, the witness is supposed to have made such statement.³ The direct tendency of the evidence being to impeach the veracity of the witness by contrasting his present statement with that supposed to have been made by him to some other person, common justice requires that he be given an opportunity of declaring whether he ever made such a statement to that person, and of explaining, in the reëxamination, the nature and particulars of the conversation, under what circumstances the statement was made, from what motives, and with what design.¹

In The Queen's Case, 2 Brod. & B. 299; 6 E. C. L. 154, the House of Lords put the following question to the judges: "If in the courts below a witness examined in chief, on the part of the plaintiff, being asked whether he remembered a quarrel taking place between A and B, answered that he did not remember it; and such witness was not asked on his cross-examination whether he had or had not made a declaration stated in the question respecting such quarrel; and in the progress of the defense the counsel for the defendant proposed to examine a witness to prove that the other witness had made such a declaration, in order to prove that he must remember it: according to the practice of the courts below, would such proof be received?"

Where the contradictory statements were reduced to writing by the witness, or by another and signed by him, the necessity of laying a foundation for the reception of impeaching evidence still remains, but for obvious reasons the limitation as to the time and place of making the statements does not apply.¹ It is sufficient to show the witness the paper or read it to him and question him concerning its genuineness. If he admits that it is in his handwriting, or that he has signed it in its present form, it may, at the proper season, be received in evidence.²

In answer to this question, Abbott, C. J., delivering the opinion of all the judges, said: "It must be in the knowledge and experience of every man that a slight hint or suggestion of some particular matter connected with a subject, puts the faculties of the mind in motion, and raises up in the memory a long train of ideas connected with the subject, which, until that hint or suggestion was given, were wholly absent from it. For this reason, the proof that, at a time past, a witness has spoken on any subject, does not, in our opinion, lead to a legitimate conclusion that such witness, at the time of his examination, had that subject present in his memory; and to allow the proof of his former conversation to be adduced without first interrogating him to that conversation, and reminding him of it, would, in many cases, have an unfair effect upon him and upon his credit, and would deprive him of that reasonable protection which it is in my opinion the duty of every court to afford to every person who appears as a witness on the one side and on the other. According, therefore, to the practice of the courts below, a witness is asked, on cross-examination, whether he has made a declaration or held a conversation; and such previous question is considered as a necessary foundation for the contradictory evidence of the declaration or conversation to be adduced on the other side. I must, however, my lords, take the liberty to add, that in any grave or serious case, if the counsel had, on his cross-examination, omitted to lay the necessary foundation in the way which I have mentioned, the court would, of its own authority, call back the witness in order to give the counsel an opportunity of laying the required foundation, by putting his questions to the witness, although the counsel had not before asked them; it being much better to permit the order and regularity of the proceedings, as to time and season, to be broken in upon, than to allow irrelevant or incompetent evidence to be received."

It is not allowable, in cross-examination in the statement of a question to a witness, to represent the contents of a letter and to ask the witness whether he wrote a letter to any person with such contents, or contents to the like effect, without first having shown the witness the letter, and asking him if he wrote that letter. Two or three lines of a letter may be exhibited to a witness without exhibiting to him the whole, and the witness may be asked whether he wrote the part exhibited, but if the witness denies that he wrote such part, he cannot be examined as to the contents of the letter. Opinion of the judges in The Queen's Case, 2 Brod. & B. 286; 6 E. C. L. 148.

A written contract is admissible in evidence for the purpose of impeaching a witness after he has admitted that he

Where a witness, who is also a party to the action, has made material statements out of court, which are in conflict with his testimony, the opposing party may prove them without first laying a foundation for the reception of the evidence upon the cross-examination of the witness. The fact that a party chooses to take the witness stand in his own behalf, can in no way limit or restrict the right of the opposing party to prove his admissions against interest,¹ and the same is true when the witness is the agent of a party, provided the contradictory statements were made in reference to a matter in which the agent had authority to bind the principal.² It has been held, however, that when a party's contradictory statements are offered for the sole purpose of impeaching him as a witness, and not as admissions against interest, the proper foundation should be laid on cross-examination as in the impeachment of other witnesses.³

The cross-examining party has a right to lay a foundation for the impeachment of a witness who has given material evidence against him, and it is reversible error to deny him the privilege.⁴

signed the contract as a party thereto. Drew v. Wadleigh, 7 Me. 94.

A witness is not bound to answer as to matters reduced to writing by himself or by another and subscribed by him, until the writing has been produced and read or shown to him. Newcomb v. Griswold, 24 N. Y. 298; Belling v. People, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 595.

The deposition of a witness may be received in evidence for the purpose of discrediting his testimony, only so far as the contents thereof were called to his attention during his examination at the trial. Stephens v. People, 19 N. Y. 549; Grosse v. State, 11 Tex. App. 364; Hammond v. Dike, 42 Minn. 273.

It is not proper, on the cross-examination of a witness for the counsel, in order to contradict him, to read from what purports to be a deposition previously given by him, and then to ask him whether he has so testified. The correct rule in such case is first to prove the deposition to be his, and then to read it as part of the evidence in the case. After this has been done the witness may be cross-examined as to any supposed discrepancies between his testimony in court and the deposition. Cropsey v. Averill, 8 Neb. 151.

admits, for the purpose of avoiding a continuance, that an absent witness would, if present, testify to certain material facts, he will not be allowed to adduce proof of counter declarations made by the witness at another time and place. To admit such evidence would be a violation of the rule requiring a foundation to be laid before introducing the impeaching evidence.¹ And the same is true where the testimony has been taken under a commission, and no predicate was laid for the impeachment of the witness at the time of his examination.² Where a witness makes statements at variance with his testimony, after the taking of his deposition, the only way to take advantage of such statements is to sue out a second commission and lay the requisite foundation for their reception in evidence.³ Where the contradictory declarations were made before the taking of the deposition, and the attention of the witness was not, at that time, called to them, they cannot be received in evidence to discredit his testimony after death has placed him beyond the power of explanation;⁴ and it appears that if a witness testify in a cause, and subsequently make contradictory statements, evidence of such statements cannot be received at a second trial of the cause, though the witness is dead, and the party against whom his testimony is read has had no opportunity of laying a foundation for impeaching him.⁵

Where the testimony of an absent witness, given at a former trial, is put in evidence, it cannot be discredited by evidence of contradictory statements of the witness, Pruitt v. State, 92 Ala. 41; but such evidence is subject to direct contradiction, the same as if the witness had testified in open court. U. S. v. Taylor, 35 Fed. Rep. 484.

Where the testimony of a witness who has become insane since the former trial is put in evidence, proof of contradictory statements made by him after the first trial is not admissible. Stewart v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 203.

Where two depositions of the same witness have been taken in the same case, the first one cannot be introduced for the purpose of impeaching the second, when no foundation was laid at the taking of the second, by calling the attention of the witness to the contradictory statements made in the first. *Samuels v. In Georgia, it is held that the former deposition cannot be introduced for the purpose of impeaching the latter, but the difficulty can be met by suing out interrogatories and therein calling the attention of the witness to the discrepancies, thus laying the foundation for impeaching him, and that a continuance may be had for this purpose. *Georgia R., etc., Co. v. b. INTRODUCTION OF IMPEACHING EVIDENCE—(1) Of Verbal Statements of the Witness—(a) Where Witness Admits Making the Statement.—If, upon cross-examination, the witness admits that he made the statement, by proof of which it is proposed to impeach him, that ends the matter, and no further proof of it is necessary or allowable.¹

(b) Where He Denies Having Made the Statement.—If a witness is cross-examined with the particularity above described in regard to any material statement, supposed to have been made by him at some other time, which is in conflict with his present testimony, and he denies having made such statement, the proper predicate or foundation is thus laid for impeaching him; and it is the privilege of the cross-examining party to call other witnesses to contradict him.²

In Pennsylvania, the rule is otherwise. Thus, where a witness, after the taking of his deposition, admitted that he had made a mistake in his testimony, and died before the trial, it was held that such admission might be proved at the trial, notwithstanding no foundation was laid for impeaching the witness.

(c) Where the Witness Neither Admits nor Denies.—There has been some conflict of English authority as to whether it is admissible to prove a previous statement of the witness in conflict with his testimony, where he says that he has no recollection of having made the statement. It has been held that the statement may not be proved unless he expressly denies that he made it;¹ but it appears to be the better opinion that, where the suggested statement is a contradiction of the testimony of the witness upon the stand, it may be proved, unless he admits that he made it, when he is questioned about it, provided always that such statement is material to the matter at issue.² The latter rule has generally been Welch v. Franklin Ins. Co., 23 W. Va. 303.

A statement made by another in the presence of a witness, and assented to and adopted by him, may be proved for the purpose of impeaching him, if it contradicts his testimony in a material part, and he denies that it was made. State v. McGaffin, 36 Kan. 315; Easterwood v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1895), 31 S. W. Rep. 204.

A mere denial by a witness that he made a material statement imputed to him will not give the cross-examining party a right to prove it, unless it tends to contradict the evidence given by the witness. Lamb v. Ward, 114 N. Car. 255; Hall v. Young, 37 N. H. 134; Martin v. Farnham, 25 N. H. 195; Hall v. Simmons, 24 Tex. 227.

Intentionally False.—The credibility of a witness may be affected by evidence of contradictory statements without showing that they were intentionally false. Craig v. Rohrer, 63 Ill. 325.

The subsequent denial by a witness that he made the contradictory statement proved, will cure the error of its admission without a proper foundation. Hartsfield v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1895), 29 S. W. Rep. 777.

1. So held, by Lord Abinger, in Long v. Hitchcock, 9 C. & P. 619, and by Tindal, C. J., in Pain v. Beeston, 1 M. & Rob. 20.

2. In Crowley v. Page, 7 C. & P. 789; 32 E. C. L. 737, Parke, B., said: "Evidence of statements by witnesses on other occasions relevant to the matter at issue, and inconsistent with the testimony given by them on the trial, is always admissible in order to impeach the value of that testimony; but it is only such statements as are relevant that are admissible, and in order to lay a foundation for the admission of such contradictory statements, and to enable the witness to explain them, and, as I conceive, for that purpose only, the witness may be asked whether he ever said what is suggested to him, with the name of the person to whom or in whose presence he is supposed to have said it, or some other circumstance sufficient to designate the particular occasion. If the witness, on the cross-examination, admits the conversation imputed to him, there is no necessity for giving other evidence of it; but if he says he does not recollect, that is not an admission, and you may give evidence on the other side to prove that the witness did say what is imputed, always supposing the statement to be relevant to the matter at issue. This has always been my practice, and if it were not so, you could never contradict a witness who said he could not remember."

And upon this subject, Mr. Phillips remarks: "It is true, the proof of the statement imputed to the witness, which he says he does not remember to have made, is not admissible as a contradictory statement, for, until further inquiry be made, there is no apparent contradiction, but still, it seems, the evidence should be admitted, for the imputed statement, when proved, may be such as to amount to a direct contradiction of the witness, and may also possibly convince the jury that the witness did not speak truth in saying he did not remember making the statement. If the rule were otherwise, it might happen that, under the pretense of not remembering, a witness who has made a false statement, and who knows it to be false, would escape contradiction and exposure. If the ruling of Parke, B., is adopted, and the statement imputed to the witness should appear on inquiry to contradict his evidence in court, it would evidently be proper to give him preferred where the question has been raised in American courts;¹ though there are some cases in which it was held that evidence of the imputed statement should not be received where the witness said he had no recollection of having made it.²

(2) Of Written Statements.—The proper foundation having been laid, it is competent to impeach a witness by putting in evidence any material statement in contradiction of his testimony, which he may have reduced to writing, or which may have been written by another, and subscribed by him. This is most frequently done by the introduction of letters written by the witness,³ but any other form of written statement is equally admissible. Thus, an affidavit of the witness is admissible for this purpose,⁴ so, also, is a written report of railroad employees.⁵ A party who has testified in the case may be contradicted by the allegations in his verified pleadings,⁶ or by statements in his petition for a new trial.⁷ And in a criminal case the prosecuting witness may be impeached by the statements in his sworn complaint against the defendant.⁸ In a suit against a municipal corporation, to recover an opportunity on reëxamination to make any explanation in his power as to the apparent contradiction." 2 Phil. Evidence 960.

damages resulting from a change in the grade of a street, the written report of the viewers is admissible to impeach their trial evidence.¹ In respect to the time when such papers may be put in evidence, it is the orderly course for the cross-examining party to introduce them after he has opened his case,² though they may be read in connection with the cross-examination of the witness sought to be impeached, but in either case they are a part of the evidence of the party who introduces them.³

(3) Proof of Former Testimony.—The proper foundation having been laid on the cross-examination, it is competent to impeach the witness by proving that his testimony differs materially from that given by him at another time, relative to the same matter;⁴ and his testimony at the former trial may be proved by any competent witness who heard the same and recollects it.⁵ If the former testimony is in the form of a deposition, regularly taken, signed and certified, it is undoubtedly the best evidence of what the testimony was and is admissible for the purpose of impeaching him.⁶ But minutes of the testimony in the nature of a pri-

Where the testimony before the coroner is taken in the form of a deposition and subscribed by the witness and certified by the coroner, the record should, if possible, be produced where it is sought to impeach the witness by proof of his testimony before the coroner. Cole v. State, 59 Ark. 50.

And in such case the whole of the testimony should be produced; the witvate memorandum, are not admissible to impeach the witness, although the person who made them may use them to refresh his memory when called to the witness stand to prove the former testimony.¹

c. MATERIALITY OF THE EVIDENCE—(1) In General.—In order to impeach a witness by proof of contradictory statements made by him, it is essential that such statements have reference to some matter which is relevant and material to the issue on trial.² Or, to state the rule in another form, the cross-examining party is concluded by the answer which a witness gives to a question concerning a collateral matter, and no contradiction will be allowed, even for the purpose of impeaching the witness.³ This ness has a right to the benefit of any explanations which may be contained in any part of it. Carden v. State, 84 Ala. 417; Kennedy v. State, 85 Ala. 326; Dunbar v. McGill, 69 Mich. 297.

rule, however, is confined to evidence drawn out on the cross-examination. A party who draws from his own witness irrelevant testimony which is prejudicial to the opposing party, ought not to be heard to object to its contradiction on the ground of its irrelevancy.¹ The test as to whether a matter is collateral within the meaning of the rule, is this: that the cross-examining party be entitled to prove it in support of his case.² It must be remembered also that this test applies to the subject-matter of the inquiry, and not to the admissibility of the evidence offered in proof of it. If the witness is not a party to the action, his declarations out of court are merely hearsay, and cannot be received as evidence in chief.³ Proof of such declarations is confined strictly to the question of credibility, and the court should so instruct the jury.¹ Where the witness is also a party to the action, his admissions against interest are of course admissible as evidence in chief, but that affords no ground of objection to their reception for the purpose of impeaching him as a witness.²

(2) Interest, Bias, and Hostility.—Where a witness denies the making of statements or the existence of facts which show that he is interested in the event of the suit or is influenced by bias or hostility, the cross-examining party may call other witnesses to contradict him.³ Thus, it is competent to prove that he attempted to suborn another witness in the cause to give false testimony.⁴ Or attempted to dissuade him from attending the trial.⁵ So, also, it is competent, after laying the proper foundation, to prove that a witness proposed, for a certain consideration, to leave the jurisdiction, and not to testify in the case.

(3) Matters of Opinion.—The statement of a witness upon which he may be impeached must not only be relevant to the issue, it must also be of a matter of fact, and not merely a former opinion of the witness in relation to the matter at issue, which is inconsistent with the conclusion which the facts he testifies to tend to establish,² unless the matter in question be one upon which the opinion of the witness is admissible in evidence. In that case the opinion is material to the matter at issue, and the witness may be contradicted by proof that he has expressed a contrary opinion out of court.³

d. DEGREE OF CONTRADICTION.—It is the rule that the former statement of a witness, to be admissible for the purpose of impeaching him, must tend to contradict him in some material particular.⁴ But its admissibility does not depend on the degree of variance between it and the subsequent testimony; that is a matter for the consideration of the jury in estimating the weight of the impeaching evidence.⁵

4. Material Additions to Former Statement.—Where a witness has made a previous statement of the transaction in regard to which he testifies, under such circumstances that he was called upon as a matter of duty or interest to state the whole truth as to the transaction, the court may, in its discretion, allow the introduction of Tippett, 2 Campb. 637, but it is a nisi prius decision, and does not seem to have had much consideration. It is criticised in Morgan v. Frees, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 354, where the court said it was undoubtedly wrongly decided.

Where the opinion is of such a nature as to show the hostility of the witness, and is offered for that purpose, it seems that it may be received. Dudley v. Satterlee (City Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 741.

Acts Showing a Contrary Opinion.—If a witness who is not called as an expert has testified to facts tending to show that a party to a contract was, at the time of making it, incompetent to contract by reason of mental imbecility, and his own opinion is not asked for or given in evidence, it is not competent to show, by way of contradiction of his testimony, that he has done acts indicating that he considered such party of sound mind. Hubbell v. Bissell, 2 Allen (Mass.) 196.

evidence to show that he then omitted material parts of the transaction to which he now testifies. The fact that he did not then state such material facts may afford some presumption that they did not happen, and thus tend to contradict his testimony.¹

5. Attacking the Reputation of the Witness—a. IN GENERAL.—When a witness has reached the bad eminence of notoriety as a liar in the community where he lives, he is liable to direct impeachment by proof of his general reputation for truth and veracity.² The extent of the permissible inquiry into the character of a witness sought to be impeached has been the subject of much discussion and contrariety of opinion. There are many decisions in which it has been held that the impeaching party is not confined to evidence of the general reputation of the witness for truth and veracity, but may, also, offer proof in derogation of his general moral character.³ It is believed, however, that the better and safer rule is that impeaching evidence of this kind, except

In California, it is provided by statute that the inquiry may extend to general reputation for truth, honesty, where it comes from the witness himself, on cross-examination, should be confined to proof of the general reputation of the witness for truth and veracity at his present or recent place of residence. By a strict adherence to this rule a witness who is notorious for his disregard of truth may always be successfully impeached, and, at the same time, the confusion which arises from a multiplicity of collateral issues may be avoided. This view is well supported by authority as well as by reason.¹

b. EXAMINATION OF IMPEACHING WITNESSES—(1) Direct Examination.—Whenever a witness is called to impeach the credit of another in this manner he must know what is generally said of the witness whose credit is impeached, by those among whom the latter resides, in order that he may be able to answer the inquiry, either as to his general character in the broad sense, or as to his general reputation for truth and veracity. It is, therefore, a pre-and integrity. People v. Markham, 64 Cal. 163; 49 Am. Rep. 700; Heath v. Scott, 65 Cal. 548.

Such evidence must have some tendency to show a want of veracity. For example, it is not competent to prove that a witness is a rash, turbulent and dangerous man when under the influence of liquor. State v. Nelson, 101 Mo. 464.

In Rudsdill v. Slingerland, 18 Minn. 380, the court said: "The only object in inquiring into the character of a witness is to ascertain whether his statements in themselves are entitled to credit. If he is a truthful person, they are, otherwise they are not. A witness, therefore, in coming into court would perhaps properly be considered as asserting his character for truthfulness to be good and be charged with notice to defend it; but we are unable to see why a witness should be held responsible to answer for or be required to meet an attack upon his character in any other respect. A man may indulge in vices which destroy his general character, yet his truthfulness and his reputation for truthfulness may be unimpeachable. An inquiry, in such a case, as to his moral character, would mislead instead of assist in arriving at the object of the investigation, namely, his credibility. It would, in any event, be an unnecessary attack and exposure of him to contempt and disgrace. Further, by such general inquiry as to character, the administration of justice would be hindered and delayed by collateral issues and be more easily made the channel of venting private hatred and malice. For these, among other reasons, we think the better general rule is that in impeaching the character of a witness in this mode the inquiry in liminary step in the examination of such a witness to inquire if he is in possession of this knowledge.¹ If he answers in the affirmative he may then be asked what is the witness's general reputation for morality or for truth and veracity, as the rule of the jurisdiction requires, and if he answers that it is bad, he may next be asked whether from his knowledge of such general reputation he would believe the impeached witness under oath.²

chief must be restricted to his credibility; that is, his general reputation for truth and veracity."

If the witness says he has no knowledge of the general reputation of the person sought to be impeached, he ought to be told to stand aside. Counsel have no right to cross-examine their own witness to elicit impeaching testimony. State v. Perkins, 66 N. Car. 126; Com. v. Lawler, 12 Allen (Mass.) 585; Young v. Com., 6 Bush (Ky.) 312; Sorrelle v. Craig, 9 Ala. 534.

But a witness who is competent to testify to any fact is competent to testify to reputation for truth. There is no preliminary question of competency to be decided by the court as in the case of experts. The amount of information and means of knowledge of a witness to reputation are matters for the consideration of the jury. Bates v. Barber, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 108.

Professor Greenleaf seemed to be of the opinion that the weight of American authority was against permitting the witness to testify as to whether he would believe the impeached witness under oath, and he is supported in this opinion by the case of Phillips v. Kingfield, 19 Me. 375; 36 Am. Dec. 760, and Willard v. Goodenough, 30 Vt. 393; but the text writers generally, and the great weight of authority, support the rule as laid down in the text. Thus, in Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 186, the court said: "Until Mr. Greenleaf allowed a statement to creep into his work on evidence to the effect that the American authorities disapproved the English rule, it was never very seriously questioned. See 1 Greenl. Ev., § 461. It is a little remarkable that of the cases referred to to sustain this idea not one contained a decision upon the question and only one contained more than a passing dictum not in any way called for. Phillips v. Kingfield, 19 Me. 375; 36 Am. Dec. 760. The authorities referred to in that case contained no such decision, and the court, after reasoning out the matter somewhat carefully, declared the question was not presented by the

(2) Cross-Examination.—There is no occasion where witnesses are more prone to substitute their impressions or their prejudices in the place of facts than when testifying on the subject of character. Reputation is often affected by suspicion or aspersed by malevolence, and it is not infrequent that it is made the subject of detraction for the very purpose of attack on the trial where it is made the subject of inquiry.¹ The impeaching witness may, therefore, be required to state on cross-examination the names of the persons whom he has heard speak disparagingly of the other witness, what they said about him, etc. In other words, he may be required to answer such questions as are proper for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of his information and the source of his knowledge.²

c. REQUISITE KNOWLEDGE OF IMPEACHING WITNESS.—The object of an inquiry of this sort is, or should be, to bring to light the true character of the witness sought to be impeached, record for decision. The American editors of Phillips and Starkie do not appear to have discovered any such conflict and do not allude to it. . . . So far as the reports show, the American decisions, instead of shaking the English doctrine, are very decidedly in favor of it and have so held upon repeated and careful consideration, and we have not been referred to, nor have we found, any considerable conflict."

The opinion of the impeaching witness must be based on general reputation. He should not be asked if he would believe the impeached witness where he was interested. Massey v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 104 Ill. 327.

It is not essential that witnesses who state that they would not believe another person on oath, should ever have heard such person give evidence under oath. The real question is, whether they have a sufficient knowledge of his character to give such testimony. Rex v. Bispham, 4 C. & P. 392; 19 E. C. L. 437.

In People v. Annis, 13 Mich. 517, Cooley, J., said: "In nothing may parties be more easily mistaken than in judging of the general reputation of another for truth and veracity. They may either be mistaken in assuming the speech of one or two to be the voice of the community; or they may confound a reputation for something else with a reputation for untruth; or they may misconstrue reports; or they may honestly be mistaken in regard to their purport. Nothing is more common in practice than to see a witness placed upon the stand to impeach the general reputation of another for veracity when a cross-examination demonstrates that the reports only relate to a failure, probably an honest one, to meet obligations, while the party's real reputation for truth is above suspicion. Nothing short of a cross-examination, which compels the impeaching witness to state both the source of the reports and their nature, will enable the party either to test the correctness of the impeaching evidence or to protect the witness who is assailed, if he is assailed, unjustly."

The time for testing the knowledge of the witness is on cross-examination; the judge may properly prevent inquiries on the direct examination as to whether the impeaching witness has ever heard the reputation of the witness sought to be impeached, discussed. Wood v. State, 31 Fla. 221; Bakeman v. Rose, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 110.

the better to enable the jury to judge of his credibility, and the legal evidence of his character is his general reputation in the community where he resides; that is, what the persons who have the best opportunity of knowing him say about him in their social and business intercourse.¹ It follows that the impeaching witness is not required to speak from his own knowledge of the acts and transactions from which the character or reputation of the other witness has been derived, nor, indeed, is he allowed to do so, but he must speak from his own knowledge of what is generally said of him by those among whom he resides, and with whom he is chiefly conversant, and any question which does not call for such knowledge is an improper one, and ought to be rejected.²

Though an impeaching witness may not speak from his personal knowledge of the facts which establish reputation, he must

When the impeaching witness has declared under oath that he knows the general reputation of the witness sought to be impeached, in the community where he lives, he is qualified to proceed with his testimony. If he has mistaken his opinion based on personal knowledge for general reputation, it remains for the cross-examining party to develop that fact. *Bullard v. It is not proper to inquire what is said of the witness by others. The inquiry, on the examination in chief, must be as to what is said by people in general. Hadjo v. Gooden, 13 Ala. 721; Wike v. Lightner, 11 S. & R. (Pa.) 198; Boynton v. Kellogg, 3 Mass. 189; Phillips v. Kingfield, 19 Me. 375; 36 Am. Dec. 760.

It is not necessary that the impeaching witness be personally acquainted with the other. It is sufficient if he knows his general reputation in the community. State v. Turner, 36 S. Car. 539.

But to be acquainted with the general reputation of a person for truth and veracity it is not necessary to know what a majority of his neighbors and associates think and say of him, Robinson v. State, 16 Fla. 835; Crabtree v. Hagenbaugh, 25 Ill. 233; 79 Am. Dec. 324; Crabtree v. Kile, 21 Ill. 180; Dave v. State, 22 Ala. 23; though a witness should not take as his estimate of general reputation what two or three persons say of one. Taylor v. Ryan (Neb. 1884), 19 N. W. Rep. 475; Matthewson v. Burr, 6 Neb. 312.

speak from his personal knowledge of that reputation as established. What other persons have told him of the reputation of the witness sought to be impeached is but hearsay, or reputation of reputation, and does not qualify him to testify as an impeaching witness.¹ For example, a stranger sent by a party into the neighborhood of a witness to learn his general reputation, will not be permitted to testify as to the result of his inquiries.²

d. TIME AND PLACE OF ACQUIRING REPUTATION.—The impeaching evidence should, as a rule, relate to the general reputation of the witness in his present or recent place of residence.³ But a person's reputation is not to be impeached or sustained by calling as witnesses only a certain number of his nearest neighbors, nor are witnesses to be confined to what is said of a man among a few of those who live nearest to him. A man's neighborhood or place of residence extends, for these purposes, as far as he is well known; as far as people are acquainted with him and his character.⁴ It is, also, true that the material object of inquiry is the character of the witness at the time when he testifies;⁵

In Haley v. State, 63 Ala. 86, a witness called to impeach another witness was asked and permitted to answer the question whether he knew the general character of the other witness in his neighborhood from rumor. This the court held to be an improper question, saying: "Rumor is not always reputation. The word has many meanings. Its most common and accepted signification is a flying report traceable to no known or responsible source. Hence, a knowledge of character derived from rumor may be no more nor less than that furnished by a flying report brought to the knowledge of the witness. He may know nothing of the estimate in which the person of whom he testifies is held, beyond that which is brought to him by a flying report; still, a non-professional witness having only this information might ignorantly and innocently answer that he knew the general character from rumor. All legal practitioners have encountered difficulty in bringing to the comprehension of witnesses the legal import of the words general character when they became the subject of inquiry."

but if some latitude were not allowed in this regard, it would, in many cases, be impossible to impeach the most corrupt witness, or to sustain the most truthful one.¹ The principle that the existence of a state of things once established by proof is presumed to continue the same until the contrary is shown is applicable, within reasonable limits, to the character of a witness proved to have once sustained a bad reputation for truth and veracity.² It is, therefore, competent to impeach a witness by proof of his reputation in a neighborhood where he formerly resided, if the evidence be not too remote in point of time.³ As the law prescribes no definite limit of time, the discretion of the court must be exercised in every instance where the proposed evidence is not so recent or remote as to preclude all differences of the opinion of the court, said: "Another matter of alleged error is in the ruling of the court in reference to impeaching testimony. It excluded all testimony of knowledge of plaintiff's reputation for truth and veracity based upon rumors and reports, since the commencement of the action. In other words, the court made this inquiry: 'What was the plaintiff's reputation for truth and veracity before the commencement of this action?' and not, 'What is his reputation to-day, when he is testifying?' In this was error. Impeaching testimony is for the purpose of discrediting the witness by showing that the community in which he lives do not believe what he says; that he is such a notorious liar that he is generally disbelieved. It is his present credibility that is to be attacked; is he now to be believed? What do his neighbors think and say of him at the present time? not, what did they think and say months or years ago? True, general reputation is not established in a day; and so the inquiry is not to be restricted to any particular week or month or year. The reputation a man has in any community is based upon all the years, few or many, of his living in such community. He may not have entered the community until after the commencement of the action, and still have established a reputation for truth and veracity, or the reverse; for oftentimes a case is not tried until years after its commencement."

It is not necessary that evidence of reputation have reference to the precise time of the examination. Rucker v. Beaty, 3 Ind. 70.

2. Sleeper v. Van Middlesworth, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 431.

In State v. Lanier, 79 N. Car. 622, the court said: "Witnesses are not and cannot be, in testifying on the subject of general character, limited to the times precisely when they speak, because reputation depends very greatly on reports which the witness must have heard before he is put on the stand for examination. Then, how long before is the question. No doubt evidence referring to the character of the witness sought to be impeached at a recent period would have more influence with the jury than evidence at a more remote period. Still, the evidence in each instance is of the same grade, and we cannot say that either would not aid the jury in estimating the value of what has been said by the witness. Men's characters, no doubt, change frequently, but in the eye of the law, they are not presumed to change suddenly."

Evidence of the reputation of a witness in a neighborhood from which he removed two years before the trial is admissible. Norwood, etc., Co. v. Andrews, 71 Miss. 641.

The law does not presume that a person of mature age, whose general character has been notoriously bad up to within a period of five years, has reformed so as to have acquired an unimpeachable reputation since that time. Rathbun v. Ross, 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 127.

opinion.¹ And the decisions are by no means uniform as to what constitutes a proper exercise of this discretion, some courts being much more liberal in their views regarding the admission of such testimony than others.²

c. PARTICULAR ACTS OF MISCONDUCT. — Whether the inquiry into the character of the witness be confined to his reputation for truth and veracity, or extend to his general moral character, the rule is uniform that evidence of specific crimes or of

In Teese v. Huntingdon, 23 How. (U. S.) 2, the court said: "Such testimony undoubtedly may properly be excluded by the court when it applies to a period of time so remote from the transaction involved in the controversy as thereby to become entirely unsatisfactory and immaterial; and as the law cannot fix that period of limitation, it must necessarily be left to the discretion of the court."

In Sleeper v. Van Middlesworth, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 434, the court said: "No certain limit, in point of duration, can be laid down for inquiries like this. The impeaching party is not restricted in his evidence to the present time, but may look to the past, and it is only necessary to say here that the law does not absolutely shut out, as immaterial, an inquiry into the character of the witness four years before the trial."

2. It has been held that evidence of the bad reputation for truth and veracity of a witness sought to be impeached, at a time one and one-half years before the trial, was not too remote. Com. v. Billings, 97 Mass. 405. And the same has been held of evidence of a reputation two years before the trial, Lawson v. State, 32 Ark. 220; or three years, Kelly v. State, 61 Ala. 19; or four years, Keator v. People, 32 Mich. 484; Sleeper v. Van Middlesworth, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 431.

Where a witness left the jurisdiction seven or eight years before the trial, it was held that proof of the reputation he left behind was admissible for the purpose of impeaching him, it not appearing that anyone within reach of the process of the court was acquainted with his reputation in his new domicile. Watkins v. State, 82 Ga. 233; 14 Am. St. Rep. 155. See also Snow v. Grace, 29 Ark. 131.

On the other hand, it has been held that where the witness sought to be impeached had resided in another jurisdiction for two years, he could not be impeached, except by witnesses who knew his general reputation there. Chance v. Indianapolis, etc., Gravel Road Co., 32 Ind. 472. Compare Stratton v. State, 45 Ind. 468.

In Missouri, it has been held that such evidence relating to a period three years back was too remote. Wood v. Matthews, 73 Mo. 482.

Where a witness has resided in a jurisdiction five years and is well known, it is not permissible to attack his credibility by proof of his general reputation in the place of his former abode. Webber v. Hanke, 4 Mich. 198; State v. Potts, 78 Iowa 656; Rucker v. Beaty, 3 Ind. 70.

Where there is some evidence of the bad reputation of the witness in the neighborhood where he at present resides, there is no objection to evidence tending to prove also that he had a bad reputation at his former place of residence. Memphis, etc., Packet Co. v. McCool, 83 Ind. 392; 43 Am. Rep. 71; People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 192.

Reputation After Commencement of Action. — The fact that the testimony of a witness was taken by commission some time before the trial, is no objection to proof of his bad reputation for truth and veracity at the time of the trial. Dollner v. Lintz, 84 N. Y. 669.

Unless the testimony touching his reputation is founded on opinions expressed post litem motam. Reid v. Reid, 17 N. J. Eq. 101.

And even in that case, it seems that the impeaching testimony should be received, leaving it to the party who called the impeached witness to show by cross-examination or by direct testimony that a conspiracy had been formed, after the institution of the prosecution or suit, to destroy the credit of his witnesses. State v. Howard, 9 N. H. 485; Fisher v. Conway, 21 Kan. 18; 30 Am. Rep. 419.

particular acts of misconduct on his part, is not admissible for the purpose of impeaching his credit. The impeaching evidence must be confined to the general reputation of the witness.¹

f. PARTICULAR TRAITS OF CHARACTER—(1) When Not Material to the Issue.—It is also a general rule that peculiar traits of character, aside from that of habitual lying, shall not be made the subject of inquiry for the purpose of impeaching a witness.² Thus, a witness may not be impeached by evidence that he is in the habit of associating with lewd and unchaste women,³ neither is it permissible, as a rule, to impeach a female witness by attacking her reputation for chastity,⁴ even where it is proposed to prove that she is a common prostitute.¹ In a few cases, however, the wholesome restraints of this rule have been disregarded.² It is not competent to attack the reputation of a witness by proof that he or she is the keeper of a house of ill fame.³ In an action by a father to recover damages for the seduction of his daughter, proof of her bad character is admissible in mitigation of damages.⁴ And in a bastardy case the mother may be cross-examined in regard to her sexual intercourse with other men about the period of conception, in order to show that it cannot be known who the father is,⁵ but in such case it is not competent to prove her bad reputation for chastity prior to the

In Com. v. Murphy, 14 Mass. 387, it was held that a female witness might be impeached by proof that she was a common prostitute, but the authority of this case was greatly shaken by the case of Com. v. Moore, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 196; and it was subsequently overruled in Com. v. Churchill, 11 Met. (Mass.) 538; 45 Am. Dec. 229.

2. Thus it has been held in a few cases that inquiry may be made into the general character of a witness for chastity, though specific acts of lewdness may not be proved. State v. Shields, 13 Mo. 236; 53 Am. Dec. 147; *State v. It was intimated in State v. Grant, 76 Mo. 236, that this rule did not apply to male witnesses, and indeed it has been expressly so decided by the appellate court of that state. State v. Clawson, 30 Mo. App. 144; State v. Coffey, 44 Mo. App. 455. But in State v. Shroyer, 104 Mo. 441; 24 Am. St. Rep. 344, the supreme court of the state held that the rule applied to male as well as female witnesses, remarking: "If it be true that the general character of a man is not affected by his reputation for unchastity, the evidence of such reputation will do him no injury." It may be remarked that such reasoning merely dodges the question, and affords no justification for the admission of irrelevant testimony, and, besides, it ignores the injury which may be done to the cause of the party who called the witness thus attacked. The court cited, in support of its ruling, the case of State v. Rider, 95 Mo. 486.

A witness may not be impeached by proof that he is a common drunkard;² or that he is in the habit of eating opium;³ but it is competent to show that when the litigated event occurred the witness was drunk,⁴ or was under the influence of opium.⁵

(2) When Material to the Issue.—In cases where reputation for chastity has a direct bearing upon the probability of the facts stated by the witness, it may be proved for the purpose of impeachment. Thus, in a prosecution for rape, or for assault with intent to commit a rape, the defendant may prove the unchaste character of the prosecutrix, as tending to show the improbability of her story.⁶ But, according to the weight of authority, it is not competent to prove her specific acts of illicit intercourse except with the defendant himself.⁷ The reason for this rule, however, has never been quite satisfactory to the bench or the bar,

In Minnesota, this rule applies where the alleged offense is assault with intent to commit rape. State v. Vadnais, 21 Minn. 384. In Reg. v. Robins, 2 M. & Rob. 512, Coleridge, J., after consultation with Erskine, J., was of the opinion that the prosecutrix might be asked, on cross-examination, if she had had sexual intercourse with other men, and that witnesses might be called to contradict her if she answered in the negative. But if this case was ever considered authority it was expressly overruled in Reg. v. Holmes, L. R., 1 C. C. R. 334, where it was said: "The question raised in this case is one of very great importance; and if we had entertained any substantial doubt upon it, we should have thought it right to submit it for the opinion of all the judges. But when we look, first, at the principles applicable to the case, and, secondly, at authority, we think it impossible to doubt what the decision ought to be. The question is, whether, on an indictment for rape, or for attempt at rape, or for an indecent assault, amounting in substance to an attempt at rape, if the prosecutrix is asked, in cross-examination, whether she has had connection with another person not the prisoner, and denies it, evidence can be called to contradict her. We are all of opinion that it cannot. In the first place, the general rule of evidence is that if a question be put in cross-examination as to a collateral point, the answer must be taken for better or for worse. And the reason is obvious. If such evidence as that here proposed were admitted, the whole history of the prosecutrix's life might be gone into. If a charge might be made as to one man, it might be made as to fifty, and that without notice to the prosecutrix. It would not only involve a multitude of collateral issues, but an inquiry into matters as to which the prosecutrix might be wholly unprepared, and so work great injustice. Upon principle, therefore, we must hold that the answer is binding. When we look at the authorities the case is still clearer. The first case on the subject is Rex v. Hodgson, R. & R. C. C. 211. That case was heard first before eight of the judges, and afterwards before the whole number. It was an actual decision that the prosecutrix, on a charge of rape, was not bound to answer such a question as that here put. That seems, as a matter of principle, to involve that, if the question had been answered, the answer would have been binding. But, further, the second objection taken in that case seems to raise the very point; and upon that the judges lay down the law distinctly, in accordance with the view which we take. That case is therefore an actual decision, involving in principle the point now in question, and a dictum, at the least, by some of the most learned judges who ever sat, upon the point. Reg. v. Cockcroft, 11 Cox C. C. 410, was an indictment for rape, and was tried first before Martin, B., and again before Willes, J., and both of those learned judges held that such evidence as that here tendered was inadmissible. So far all the decisions entirely support that view which we think to follow clearly from the settled principles of the law of evidence. We are asked to abandon that view upon the authority of Reg. v. Robins, 2 M. & Rob. 512. That was, no doubt, a decision of Coleridge, J., after consulting Erskine, J., upon the very point now in dispute. But we cannot follow that ruling in opposition to the whole current of authority upon the question. In Rex v. Barker, 3 C. & P. 589; 14 E. C. L. 467, the question was as to evidence showing the prosecutrix to be a common prostitute, and such evidence has long been held material. In Rex v. Martin, 6 C. & P. 562; 25 E. C. L. 544, the evidence was as to the prosecutrix having previously had connection with the prisoner, and such evidence is undoubtedly admissible, for it has a direct bearing upon the question of consent. These are really all the cases upon the subject. But from Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393, it may be collected that Holroyd, J., held the same view in the case of an indictment for an attempt at rape. We have, therefore, a deliberate judgment of the twelve judges, the decisions of Martin, B., and Willes, J., and the opinion of Holroyd, J., against the ruling of Coleridge, J."

Whatever may be the rule in regard to the relations of the prosecutrix with other persons, her previous acts of incontinence with the defendant may always be made the subject of inquiry in order to show the improbability that she resisted him. Rex v. Martin, 6 C.

and there is good authority supporting the rule that previous illicit intercourse with other men may be shown as bearing directly on the principal question at issue, that is, whether the intercourse was by force or with the consent of the prosecutrix, and this for the reason that no impartial mind can resist the conclusion that a female who has recently been in the habit of indulging in illicit intercourse with others, will not be so likely to resist as one who is spotless and pure.¹ In case the prosecutrix is a child under the age of consent, the law conclusively presumes

State*, 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 132. In State v. Jefferson, 6 Ired. (N. Car.) 305, it was held that the prisoner might give evidence that the woman had been his concubine, but that he might not give in evidence, to prove her a strumpet, that she had had criminal connection with one or more other individuals. But in State v. Murray, 63 N. Car. 31, a judgment of conviction was reversed because the trial court refused to allow the prisoner to prove that the prosecutrix had had intercourse with other men; and in State v. Freeman, 100 N. Car. 435, it was held proper to ask the prosecutrix, on cross-examination, if she had not given birth to a bastard child. This rule was sanctioned in People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 192, where Cowan, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I am fully aware of the two cases of Rex v. Hodgson, R. & R. C. C. 211, and Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393, in which it was held that you shall not be permitted to inquire of the prosecutrix as to connection with other men. It is with a view to these cases that I have thought it my duty to consider the question a priori, and I must say that they appear to me entirely anomalous, not only when compared with the cases in respect to circumstantial evidence generally, but with adjudications in respect to evidence receivable on trials for this very crime. . . . The decisions of the courts at Westminster Hall are certainly very high evidence of the law. In most cases, I agree that we ought to regard them as conclusive; but no court can overrule the law of human nature, which declares that one who has already started on the road of prostitution, would be less reluctant to pursue her way than another who remains at her home of innocence, and looks upon such a career with horror. I have long had occasion to know and consider much the two cases cited as adverse to the reception of this evidence; and I never yet could bring myself to doubt that circumstances much more remote and of less influence are constantly received on the very best authority. Those cases are anomalous in more than one respect. While they reject evidence of the fact, they receive evidence of reputation of the fact, or mere hearsay. They seem to suppose that the testimony was proposed to shake the general credibility of the witness, as if it went to truth and veracity. That is not so. It goes to her credibility in the particular matter, to a circumstance relevant to the case in hand, from which the jury are asked to say she did consent; and it may be proved by the prosecutrix, or, if she deny it, by others. It is most strange that a reputation of a want of chastity should be preferred in evidence to direct proof. No reason is given for such a distinction by the court; but the counsel in Rex v. Hodgson, R. & R. C. C. 211, did say that general reputation alone was to be received, because it was not to be presumed the prosecution would come prepared to meet evidence of the particular fact. Such a reason would go to show that every circumstance in a chain must be shown by reputation instead of

that she is not capable of giving her consent, and evidence of her reputation for chastity, or the lack of it, is not admissible, since every act of intercourse with her is a crime committed against her.¹

g. CONVICTION OF AN INFAMOUS CRIME.—In many jurisdictions, the common-law disability of a witness resulting from his conviction of an infamous crime has been removed by statute,² but where this has been done, such conviction may still be proved for the purpose of impeaching the witness.³ In some jurisdictions, it is not competent to prove the conviction of any crime which would not have rendered the witness infamous at common law,⁴ while ocular proof. I am unwilling to deprive prisoners of any evidence sanctioned by authority in this kind of prosecution. Their case is often hard enough. 1 Hale's P. C. 635, 636. But I never yet could see why reputation should be received upon any principle peculiar to such a case. It cannot be, as supposed in Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393, that the woman's character is in issue, in any other sense than that of every witness, who may be impeached as generally unworthy of credit. The books are certainly strong and uncontradicted that on trying this offense her character as a common strumpet may be proved for such a purpose. Rex v. Barker, 3 C. & P. 589; 14 E. C. L. 467. . . . I must, with great deference, and on the grounds already mentioned, be allowed to differ from Mr. Justice Holroyd, in Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393, when he treats the inquiry into acts of lewdness, as collateral, saying, that even though you question the prosecutrix as to particular facts, you must take her answer as conclusive. The same idea seems to have been entertained in Rex v. Hodgson, R. & R. C. C. 211. I have been quite unfortunate if I have not shown that in this case of rape, the question is very material in examining the probability of consent; the vital inquiry in the cause. Those authorities are very severe, and I never could bring myself to act upon them in their full extent."

The general term of the supreme court refused to follow this decision in People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. Rep. (N. Y.) 391; but in Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 515; 14 Am. Rep. 309 (reversing 1 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 610), it was held that evidence of the complainant's habits of receiving men at her dwelling, for the purpose of promiscuous intercourse with them, was competent on the question of consent. And in Brennan v. People, 7 Hun (N. Y.) 171, the court followed the rule laid down in People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 192, citing People v. Dohring, 59 N. Y. 383; 17 Am. Rep. 349, and Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 515; 14 Am. Rep. 309. Compare Conkey v. People, 1 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 418.

in others, the language of the statute is broad enough to let in the record of conviction of any crime, whether a felony or a misdemeanor.¹ An intermediate rule is that the crime must be of such a nature as to imply moral turpitude or a lack of veracity in the person committing it.² The fact that a witness is under indictment may not be proved for the purpose of impeaching him;³ neither is evidence of his arrest upon a criminal charge admissible for that purpose.⁴ The record is the best evidence, and, in direct impeachment, is the only admissible evidence of conviction,⁵ though it has been held in many cases that the witness himself may be cross-examined on the subject.⁶ And where this is not allowed, he may, nevertheless, be asked if he has been in prison, since that is an independent fact which may be proved without the production of documentary evidence.⁷

far vouches for his credibility that he will not, as a general rule, be permitted to impeach him either by proof of his general reputation, or of his contradictory statements made out of court at another time.¹

b. CONTRADICTING ONE'S OWN WITNESS.—It must not be understood, however, that a party, by calling a witness who unexpectedly gives evidence against him, is concluded by such evidence. He may call other witnesses to prove that the facts are otherwise than as stated, and it is no objection to any relevant evidence of the material facts upon which he relies to support his case or defense, that it may incidentally contradict and discredit one or more of his own witnesses.²

c. PARTY ENTRAPPED BY HOSTILE WITNESS. — It frequently happens that a party is entrapped into calling a hostile and unscrupulous witness who has given one account of a state of facts before the trial, but gives a materially different account on the witness stand. This circumstance has given rise to much discussion, and no little contrariety of opinion as to how far a party thus surprised and deceived may impeach such a witness by proving his statements out of court. If a witness unexpectedly give material evidence against the party who called him, such party may, for the purpose of refreshing his memory and awakening his conscience, ask him if he did not, on a particular occasion, make a contrary statement.¹ Thus far the authorities are agreed, but the question is, should the inquiry stop here. If the witness admits that he has made a contrary statement, there is, of course, no necessity for other evidence of it, and, according to the weight of judicial authority, if he denies making the imputed statement, the party cannot be allowed to prove it by other witnesses where it would not be admissible as independent evidence, and can therefore have no effect but to impair the credit of the witness with the jury.² On the other hand, it has been urged with much reason that a party should not thus be placed at the mercy of a designing witness, and there are many cases in which it is held that where a party has been surprised and entrapped by his own witness, the court may, in its discretion, allow him to call other witnesses to prove that such treacherous witness had previously made statements contrary to his testimony, not for the purpose of proving the truth of such previous statements but to show the treachery of the witness and to set the party right before the jury.¹ In a number of jurisdictions the discussion has been set

This rule was vigorously supported by Lord Denman, C. J. See Wright v. Beckett, 1 M. & Rob. 427, for his reasoning on the subject. In this case he cited Bernasconi v. Fairbrother, a nisi prius case in which he had received similar evidence. See also Dunn v. Aslett, 2 M. & Rob. 122, where he adhered to this opinion. In Wright v. Beckett, 1 M. & Rob. 427, Mr. Baron Bolland, differing from Lord Denman, was of the opinion that the evidence was not admissible, and the same opinion was afterwards expressed by Parke, Baron, in Holdsworth v. Dartmouth,

2 M. & Rob. 153, and by Erskine, J., in Winter v. Butt, 2 M. & Rob. 357. See also other English cases cited in the last preceding note. The matter was, however, set at rest by Stat. 17 & 18 Vict., ch. 125, which declares such evidence admissible, thus establishing by statute the rule contended for by Lord Denman.

In State v. Norris, 1 Hayw. (N. Car.) 429; 1 Am. Dec. 564, the prosecution was permitted to impeach one of its own witnesses by proof that he had made statements out of court at variance with his testimony, though the court conceded that a party to a civil action could not be permitted thus to impeach his witness. This distinction is not sound in principle, and the case was expressly overruled in State v. Taylor, 88 N. Car. 697.

In Selover v. Bryant, 54 Minn. 434, Dickinson, J., said: "The case justified the conclusion of the court that the plaintiffs were surprised by the adverse testimony. It is one of the controverted questions in the law of evidence whether a party calling a witness, and who is surprised by his adverse testimony, may be permitted to show that he had made previous statements contrary to his testimony. A learned writer has said that the weight of authority seems to be in favor of admitting such proof. 1 Greenl. Ev., § 444. We are in doubt whether the weight of authority is not the other way, but we feel confident that well recognized reasons and principles of the law of evidence support the proposition that, at least in the discretion of the trial court, such evidence is admissible." And after discussing the contrary rule, the learned judge continues: "The reason upon which it rests is, we think, plainly fallacious. The fault in the reason lies in the premise that, by calling the witness, the party presents him as being at rest by the statutory adoption of the rule last above stated.¹ In order, however, to justify the application of this rule, it is not sufficient that the witness has merely failed to give evidence which he was expected to give. In such case, his credibility is immaterial, as he has done no damage; he must have actually testified against the party who called him, and in favor of the opposing party, in some material matter, before he may be thus impeached.²

worthy of credit, or in any sense vouches for his truthfulness. In some sense and measure this may be true, but, laying aside the subject of general impeachment, and directing our attention only to the question of allowing proof of statements contrary to the testimony by which a party is surprised at the trial, the above stated reason is of no controlling force, except as it includes and implies such a degree of responsibility for the credit of the witness,—such a personal voucher of his truthfulness—that it would be bad faith, double dealing, trifling with the court, or something akin thereto, for the party to afterwards throw discredit upon his testimony. The premise is not tenable. A party is not to be held to have assumed any such responsibility as to the truthfulness of a witness, and ordinarily, at least, there can be no imputation of bad faith or anything like it when, the party being surprised by his own witness testifying directly in favor of the adverse party, he offers to show his preliminary statements to the contrary as impeaching his credibility. One has not all the world from which to choose the witnesses by whose testimony he must prove his case. He has not the freedom of choice that one has in the selection of an agent; he can only call those who are supposed to know the facts in issue. He is entitled to have their testimony placed before the jury, not as the statements of his agents or representatives by which he is to be concluded, but as the testimony of witnesses whose credibility he cannot be expected to vouch for, but which the jury are to determine. It is everywhere admitted that a party whose witness testifies against him is not concluded thereby. He may prove the fact to be contrary to such testimony, although that does discredit a witness whom he has called. We deny that, by calling a witness to the stand, a party becomes responsible for his credibility in any such sense that he is absolutely precluded, when surprised by adverse testimony, from showing that the witness had made statements of the facts contrary to his testimony. It is at least within the discretion of the court to allow this."

d. PARTY BOUND TO CALL THE WITNESS.—Where a party is bound by law to produce a certain witness, such as a subscribing witness to a will, deed, or other paper, he is not deemed to vouch for his credit, and if such witness give damaging evidence against him, he may contradict him or impeach him by proof of his previous declarations at variance with his testimony.¹

e. WHERE A PARTY CALLS AN OPPOSING WITNESS.—If, after a witness has been examined and cross-examined, the cross-examining party calls him in support of his own case, he thereby makes him his own witness and will not be allowed to impeach him as the witness of the opposing party.² Neither may a party impeach

A party, though surprised, may not impeach his own witness if he is not hurt by his testimony. Chism v. State, 70 Miss. 742; People v. Mitchell, 94 Cal. 550; Smith v. Briscoe, 65 Md. 561; Bennett v. State, 24 Tex. App. 77; Adams v. State, 34 Fla. 185.

In Massachusetts, a party being under the necessity of calling a subscribing witness may contradict his statement of facts. Brown v. Bellows, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 179. But he cannot impeach his general character for truth and veracity. Whitaker v. Salisbury, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 534.

Pub. Stats. of Massachusetts, ch. 169, § 22, authorizes the party producing a witness to prove that he has, at other times, made statements inconsistent with his present testimony, but expressly declares that he shall not be allowed to impeach his credit by evidence of bad character.

In New Jersey, it has been held that the complainant in a suit in equity cannot impeach the general character of the defendant for truth and veracity, though he cannot avoid taking his answer under oath, thus making it evidence in the case. Brown v. Bulkley, 14 N. J. Eq. 306.

2. Craig v. Grant, 6 Mich. 447; Tourelotte v. Brown, 4 Colo. App. 377; Richards v. State, 82 Wis. 172.

In Com. v. Hudson, 11 Gray (Mass.) 66, Shaw, C. J., said: "The district attorney called a witness and thereby undertook that, so far as he knew, he was entitled to credit, and held him up to the court and jury as a credible witness. Can he afterwards impeach him? Sometimes the attorney may be disappointed. The witness may even have told him that he would testify that way, and courts, in such case, are inclined to allow him to disparage a witness, but the general rule is that he must not. Here, the district attorney must have known that he testified before the grand jury, but we do not put it on that ground. The attempt is not to prove the fact which he testified to before the grand jury; it can only be to disparage him by showing that he testified differently. The whole course of practice is otherwise in this Commonwealth. A witness, when called by one party, is liable to be examined, and bound to answer, as to all facts material to the case, whether examined upon his own witness who is called by the opposing party at a subsequent stage of the trial;¹ though it has been held that where the party calling a witness is not able to prove anything by him, and, upon cross-examination, the witness gives damaging testimony against him, such witness is, for the purpose of impeachment, to be deemed the witness of the cross-examining party.² So, also, in jurisdictions where the cross-examination is confined to the matters inquired of in the examination in chief, a party who travels beyond the legitimate bounds of cross-examination and thereby elicits new and material matter, to that extent, at least, makes the witness his own and should not be allowed to impeach him.³ But where the cross-examination may properly extend to all matters material to the issue, the witness remains the witness of the party who called him, and the other party's right to impeach him is not jeopardized by the extent of the cross-examination.⁴

f. ONE PARTY CALLED BY THE OTHER.—Where a party calls the opposing party to the witness stand, he is, of course, no more concluded by his testimony than he would be by that of any other witness. He may prove the facts as they exist by other witnesses, if he can, though he do thereby incidentally discredit the opposing party as a witness; but, by calling him as such, he precludes himself from attacking him for the mere purpose of impeachment.⁵ And he will not, as a rule, be heard, in argument to that subject by the party calling him or not. It is said that the defendant, by calling the witness again, makes him his own witness to all purposes. He does, to some purposes; it would be very difficult to determine what. But the party who first called him cannot be allowed to say or to show that he was unworthy of credit."

Where a Party Entraps His Opponent.

—If a party relies on what his adversary swore at a former trial, and calls him as a witness, and is surprised and deceived by a material change in his

the court or jury, to question his veracity.¹ But the fact that a party calls the opposing party as a witness, does not preclude him from proving material admissions made by such party at other times. Such admissions are admissible as independent evidence, notwithstanding they may contradict the testimony given by the witness.²

X. CORROBORATION—1. Not Allowed Until the Witness Is Attacked.

—In a case where corroboration is required by law, it is always permissible to strengthen the testimony of a witness by proof of connected incidents showing its consistency.³ But in other cases, a party is not allowed to introduce evidence to sustain the testimony of his witness before his credibility has been attacked.⁴ Thus, where a witness is merely contradicted by evidence disproving the facts testified to by him, and no other attempt is made to impeach him, it is not competent to call witnesses for the purpose of corroborating him.⁵ The party who called the witness is not, testimony, he may impeach him in jurisdictions where he would be allowed to impeach another witness called by him in such case. Cox v. Prater, 67 Ga. 588.

1. Tarsney v. Turner, 48 Fed. Rep. 818; 2 Flipp. (U. S.) 733; Graves v. Davenport, 50 Fed. Rep. 881.

In Minnesota, the rule is otherwise. Thus, in Schmidt v. Durham (Minn. 1892), 52 N. W. Rep. 277, Gillfillan, C. J., said: "Whether a party who calls the opposite party to be examined as a witness, under Laws of 1885, ch. 193, accredits him, so that he cannot offer evidence to impeach his general character for truth and veracity, we need not, in this case, consider. He certainly may question the truth of his statements of fact, either by independent opposing evidence, or by inference or arguments drawn from the testimony of the party himself. Thus, if, in a case like this, the party so called testify that the conveyance was made in good faith, the party calling him is not concluded by such testimony, but may insist that upon the entire account of the transaction, given by the party testifying, the inference may be drawn that the conveyance was not bona fide."

The general character of a witness is presumed to be good until he is impeached, and evidence of his good character is not admissible until his character has been impugned by the other party. Dodd v. Norris, 3 Campb. 519; U. S. v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. (U. S.) 98; Rogers v. Moore, 10 Conn. 13; Johnson v. State, 21 Ind. 329; Magee v. People, 139 Ill. 138; *Braddee v. Corroborating evidence is not admissible on the examination in chief. Jackson v. Etz, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 314; People v. Vane, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 78; Adams v. Greenwich Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. 170; Conway v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1894), 26 S. W. Rep. 401.

In Harrison's Case, 12 How. St. Tr. 861, corroborating evidence was received in connection with examination in chief, but the law is now settled the other way. See Dodd v. Norris, 3 Campb. 519, where Lord Ellenborough excluded evidence of good character in rebuttal of the cross-examination, observing that there was ample opportunity for explanation on the redirect examination.

however, precluded from adding to the strength of the evidence upon which he first rested his case, though he does thereby incidentally corroborate an unimpeached witness.¹

2. Right to Corroborate.—When a shadow has been cast upon the reputation of a witness for truth and veracity, by competent impeaching evidence, the party who called him has a right to introduce evidence to corroborate him.² And for this purpose an impeaching witness may in his turn be impeached.³

3. Evidence of Good Character.—Where a direct assault has been made upon the general character of a witness, or upon his general reputation for truth and veracity, the party who called him may

1. John v. State, 16 Ga. 200.

In Outlaw v. Hurdle, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 163, Pearson, J., said: "We conclude with his honor that the practice in North Carolina has been, and, we think, it is sustained by good sense, for a party to offer as many witnesses as may be deemed necessary to establish his allegation. If the other party chooses, he may rest the case upon it, or he may call witnesses in his turn, and the first party may call witnesses in reply and for the purpose of adding to the strength of the evidence upon which he at first rested the case. Lord Kenyon, who had as much good sense as any judge that ever tried a case, somewhere remarks, 'It is not worth while to jump until you get to the fence;' that is, there is no use in meeting objections until they are presented, or in piling up proof until it is made necessary by what is done on the other side." Compare Wade v. Thayer, 40 Cal. 578.

The contrary was held in State v. Parish, 22 Iowa 284.

Where it is attempted to impeach a witness by the introduction of a portion of his testimony on a former occasion, it is error to exclude another portion which corroborates his testimony on the witness stand. Jones v. State (Tex. Crim. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 634.

Where a party, in attempting to impeach a witness for the opposing party, incidentally impeaches one of his own witnesses, he cannot afterwards introduce evidence to corroborate him. Mealer v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 102.

Judge Taylor remarks that it has not yet been formally settled how far this plan of recrimination may be carried, but that the practice has been said by some lawyers to conform to the rule of the civil law, that is, a discrediting witness may himself be discredited by other witnesses, but no further witnesses may be called to attack the support his testimony by proof of his good reputation.¹ There appears to be no difference of opinion regarding the general rule as stated above, but there is considerable conflict of authority as to the limits of the rule. It is said by some of the best text writers that if the character of a witness has been impeached, although upon cross-examination only, evidence on the other side may be given to support his character by proof of his general good reputation.² Accordingly, it is held in some jurisdictions that whenever the character of a witness for truth is attacked in any way, it is competent for the party calling him to give general evidence in support of his good character.³ Where this rule obtains, it is competent to support the credibility of a witness who has been impeached by proof of his former declarations at variance with his testimony, by evidence of his general characters of these last. 2 Tayl. on Ev., § 1473, citing Stafford's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 1484.

The case of Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393, is generally cited in support of this text, but, as we shall presently see, it does not go to the full extent claimed for it by the text writers.

In pursuance of this rule, it has been held that where the credibility of a witness is vigorously attacked on cross-examination, evidence of his good reputation for truthfulness is admissible. State v. Fruge, 44 La. Ann. 165; State v. Boyd, 38 La. Ann. 374; State v. Johnson (La. 1895), 17 So. Rep. 789; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Raney, 86 Tex. 363; Richmond v. Richmond, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 343; Vernon v. Tucker, 30 Md. 462; State v. Cherry, 63 N. Car. 495; Isler v. Dewey, 71 N. Car. 16.

In Stevenson v. Gunning, 64 Vt. 609, the court said: "It is observable that a distinction is taken between an attack upon the character of the witness, as such, for credibility, and the character of the testimony given for belief. It is only when the character of the witness for credibility is directly attacked by general evidence regarding his standing and character for truth and veracity, or by showing that he has made contradictory or inconsistent statements, either out of court or in court, or that he has been convicted of some crime, or engaged in some act affecting his credibility, like suborning or attempting to suborn a witness, or suppress testimony in the case on trial, that sustaining evidence can be used. But when the character of the testimony given by a witness is attacked only by showing its improbability, or by other testimony conflicting with the testimony of the witness, sustaining testimony cannot be admitted. If admitted when there is only a conflict in the testimony of opposing witnesses, the opposing witnesses on both sides could be supported by sustaining testimony in regard to their standing and character by reputation as witnesses, and the trial would be prolonged indefinitely. Besides, the character of the testimony given by a witness does not directly attack the character of the witness for credibility." Compare Sweet v. Sherman, 21 Vt. 23.

In order to admit evidence of good character for truth, it is not necessary that the general character of a witness be first impeached. It is sufficient that his veracity as a witness has been fairly challenged. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Raney (Tex. Civ. App. 1893), 23 S. W. Rep. 340.

good character for truth and veracity.¹ It must, however, be admitted that the English cases do not warrant this liberal reception of character evidence. As a rule, evidence in support of the good character of a witness is not admissible unless other witnesses have been called to attack his general reputation, and admissions wrung from him on the cross-examination do not warrant the reception of such evidence, unless they are of such a nature as to amount to an attack on his general reputation.² This is the rule in a number of American jurisdictions.³ And

Evidence of the contradictory statements must actually be introduced. Merely laying the foundation is not sufficient to let in evidence of good character. State v. Cooper, 71 Mo. 436.

2. Dodd v. Norris, 3 Campb. 519; Doe v. Harris, 7 C. & P. 330; 32 E. C. L. 529; Bamfield v. Massey, 1 Campb. 460.

The case of Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393, generally cited in support of the more liberal rule, went no further than this: The prosecutrix admitted on cross-examination that she had twice been sent to the house of correction on charges of theft, and Holroyd, J., considering this an attack upon her general reputation, admitted evidence of her subsequent good conduct.

The English cases make an exception of attesting witnesses to wills who are dead at the time of the trial. If the reputation of such witnesses is impugned by a charge of fraud in the execution of the will, the proponent may prove their general good character though no direct attack has been made on their general reputation. Doe v. Stephenson, 3 Esp. 284; Doe v. Walker, 4 Esp. 50; Provis v. Reed, 3 M. & P. 4; Bishop of Durham v. Beaumont, 1 Campb. 207. Compare Wright v. Littler, 3 Burr. 1245.

This exception is allowed, however, only when the witness is dead at the time of the trial. Coleridge, J., in Doe v. Harris, 7 C. & P. 330; 32 E. C. L. 529.

3. Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 154; Brown v. Mooers, 6 Gray (Mass.) 451; McCarty v. Leary, 118 Mass. 509; Rogers v. Moore, 10 Conn. 13; People v. Rector, 19 Wend. (N. (N. Y.) 308, and overruling Carter v. People, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 317. See also Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 493.

It has been held that an attempt to impeach a witness by asking another witness what is his character for truth, warrants the introduction of evidence in support of his character, though the impeaching witness answered that his character is good. Com. v. Ingraham, 7 Gray (Mass.) 46.

In Connecticut, an exception to the rule permits evidence of general good character for veracity, without a general impeachment, where the witness is in the situation of a stranger. Merriam v. Hartford, etc., R. Co., 20 Conn. 364; 52 Am. Dec. 344; Rogers v. Moore, 10 Conn. 13. See also State v. De Wolf, 8 Conn. 93; 20 Am. Dec. 90.

Mr. Greenleaf has stated the more liberal rule first considered in the following language: "Where evidence of contradictory statements by a witness or of other particular facts, as, for example, that he has been committed to the house of correction, is offered by way of impeaching his veracity, his general character for truth being thus in some sort put in issue, it has been deemed reasonable to admit general evidence that he is a man of strict integrity and scrupulous regard for truth." 1 Greenl. Ev., § 469, citing Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393. But, notwithstanding the great reputation of the author, it has been said this statement is not law. Thus, in Brown v. Mooers, 6 Gray (Mass.) 451, it was attempted to introduce evidence of the good reputation of a witness for truth, who had been impeached by proof of material false statements made by him, but the court said: "The evidence as to the general character of Shaw for truth was not competent. His general character had not been impeached. The case of Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 143, cited by the plaintiff, is directly against him on the precise point at issue. See pp. 146, 154. The statement in 1 Greenl. Ev., § 469, is not sustained by the case the author cites of Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393, and is not law."

In Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 154, the same court, after stating the rule as laid down by Starkie, said: "The position, as laid down by Starkie, cannot be carried to the extent contended for. He probably meant only that where the questions put in the cross-examination and the answers did impeach his general character, the other party might rebut by proving a good general character, and so far we do not object to the principle. As in the case stated by Starkie, the witness was asked whether she had not been twice committed to Bridewell, and answered that she had. This went to affect her general reputation, and the party who called her was allowed to prove that since those commitments her character had been fair and good. But it never was decided that if a witness was contradicted as to any fact of his testimony, either by his own declarations at other times, or by other witnesses, evidence might be admitted to prove his general good character. If this were the practice, great delay and confusion would arise, and as almost all cases are tried upon controverted testimony, each witness must bring his compurgators to support him when he is contradicted, and, indeed, it would be a trial of the witnesses and not of the action."

1. Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241; 3 E. C. L. 393; People v. Amanacus, 50 Cal. 233; Gertz v. Fitchburg R. Co., 137 Mass. 77; 50 Am. Rep. 285; Com. v. Green, 17 Mass. 541; Webb v. State, 29 Ohio St. 351; Wick v. Baldwin, 51 Ohio St. 51.

But an admission by a witness, upon cross-examination, that he had been tried for crime in another state and acquitted does not authorize the introduction of evidence in support of his good character. Harrington v. Lincoln, 4 Gray (Mass.) 563.

Where the record of conviction of crime is introduced as impeaching evidence, it may be rebutted by evidence of the good reputation of the witness for truth and veracity, but it may not be shown that the witness was innocent of the crime for which he was convicted; the record is conclusive evidence on that point. Gertz v. Fitchburg R. Co., 137 Mass. 77; 50 Am. Rep. 285; Com. v. Gallagher, 126 Mass. 54.

The sustaining proof should go to character generally, and not to the disproof of particular facts brought out on the cross-examination of an impeaching witness. Surles v. State, 89 Ga. 167.

2. Stamper v. Griffin, 12 Ga. 456; Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 143; Brown v. Mooers, 6 Gray (Mass.) 451; People v. Gay, 7 N. Y. 378; People v. Hulse, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 313; *Frost v. Evidence tending to show that a witness has made contradictory statements in reference to the matter under inquiry, is more properly an assault upon the credit rather than the character of the witness, and, therefore, does not open the way for evidence to sustain the general character of the witness.

4. Prior Consistent Statements.—It was ruled, in an early English case, that a party who called a witness against whom contradictory statements were proved might show that he had at other times made statements in harmony with his testimony, and that he was consistent in his relation of the facts;¹ and this rule has been adopted in many American cases.² The soundness of the rule, however, was justly doubted by Mr. Justice Buller,³ and it was subsequently discarded by the courts on the ground that what a witness said without the sanction of an oath ought not to confirm what he said upon oath.⁴ And perhaps the weight of American authority rejects evidence that the witness on other occasions made statements in harmony with his testimony,⁵ unless it is charged that his story is a recent fabrication,¹ or that he has some motive for testifying falsely, which it can be shown did not exist when he made the statements proposed to be proved in corroboration of his testimony.² It may be added that in prosecutions for rape, it is always competent to prove the fact that the prosecuting witness complained of the outrage soon after its perpetration, for the purpose of corroborating her testimony, though the particulars of such complaint are not admissible to prove the commission of the crime.³

Such evidence is admissible only when the general character of the witness is directly assailed by the party against whom he is called to testify. Chapman v. Cooley, 12 Rich. (S. Car.) 654; State v. Jones, 29 S. Car. 201; Miller v. Western, etc., R. Co., 93 Ga. 480.

5. Requisite Knowledge of Sustaining Witness—a. IN GENERAL.—

A witness called to sustain another whose general character or reputation for truth and veracity has been assailed, must first state that he knows the general moral character of the witness thus impeached, or his general reputation for truth and veracity, according to the rule of the jurisdiction; otherwise, he cannot be further examined on that point.⁴ But if he answers that he is

In Utah, the rule is that prior consistent statements are not admissible to corroborate a party who is a witness in his own behalf, when such statements were made in his own interest. Silva v. Pickard (Utah, 1894), 37 Pac. Rep. 86.

In New York, the early cases followed the rule laid down in Lutterell v. Reynell, 1 Mod. 282. See Jackson v. Etz, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 314; People v. Vane, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 80; *People v. acquainted with the general reputation of the witness sought to be sustained, the court will not determine by a preliminary inquiry whether he has sufficient knowledge to enable him to testify. That is a matter to be attended to on cross-examination, after which the value of his testimony is to be determined by the jury.¹

b. VALUE OF NEGATIVE EVIDENCE.—Inasmuch as the best character is generally that which is the least talked about,² the testimony of one who is well acquainted with a witness and his neighbors, and would be likely to hear what is said of him, that he has never heard his character called in question, is admissible to show that his general character is good;³ and the fact that a witness has known a person for a long time and has never heard anyone speak disparagingly of him, seems to be a sufficient qualification for him to swear that he would believe such person upon oath,⁴ though it has been held no error to refuse to permit him to do so.⁵

6. Explanation by the Impeached Witness Himself.—It is always proper to give a witness who has been impeached, either upon cross-examination or by independent evidence, an opportunity to make any explanation he can in support of his own credibility.⁶

7. Necessity of Corroboration—a. OF ACCOMPLICES—(1) At Common Law.—At common law, the credibility of an accomplice, like that of any other witness, is a matter for the consideration of the jury, and the accused may be legally convicted upon the unsp-

But surely, it is evidence in support of character that a witness acquainted with the person assailed, living in his neighborhood, has never heard any ill of him. It is certainly some proof that a person, against whom the tongue of slander has never been heard to wag, is not so destitute of truth and sincerity as that he ought not to be believed on his oath. The evidence is not easily reconcilable with the charge that he is totally unworthy of credit. The presumption is, if the charge be true, it must have been heard by those who lived near and were in daily intercourse with him."

ported testimony of a confederate in crime.¹ The great caution, however, which is necessary in weighing the testimony of such witnesses, has led the courts to the uniform practice of advising the jury not to convict the prisoner upon the testimony of an accomplice, unless it is corroborated in some material part.² But there is no positive rule of law requiring such an instruction, though it has been said by a great judge that it is a practice which deserves all the reverence of law.³ It rests in the discretion of the court, and a refusal to give it is consequently not reversible error.⁴ In giving this instruction, the judge does not withdraw the case from the jury by positive direction, but only advises them not to give credit to such unsupported testimony.⁵

Judge Taylor also says: "It is true that judges in their discretion generally advise a jury not to convict a prisoner upon the testimony of an accomplice alone, and although the adoption of this practice will not be enforced by a court of review, its omission will, in most cases, be deemed a neglect of duty on the part of a judge." 1 Tayl. Consequently, her testimony ought to be corroborated in order to convict him.⁸ So, also, persons who by mutual consent commit the crime against nature are accomplices and neither should be convicted on the unsupported testimony of the other.⁹ Whether or not a witness is an accomplice, is a question of fact for the jury.¹⁰ But it is not necessary that such fact be established beyond a reasonable doubt,¹¹ though the jury should be reasonably satisfied that he is an

(4) Sufficiency of Corroborating Evidence.—It is not necessary that an accomplice be corroborated upon every fact to which he swears, for, if this were required, there would be no necessity for calling him as a witness.² Neither is it necessary that he be corroborated by the direct testimony of other witnesses; circumstantial evidence is sufficient, if it is material and tends to connect the prisoner with the crime charged.³ It is, however, necessary that the corroborating evidence be upon some part of the testimony which is material to the issue,⁴ and it must also tend to show that the defendant committed the crime charged in the indictment. It may be laid down as a general principle that it is not a sufficient corroboration to prove that an offense was in fact committed in the manner described by the accomplice,⁵

In Reg. v. Farler, 8 C. & P. 106; 34 E. C. L. 314, Lord Abinger instructed the jury as follows: "It is a practice which deserves all the reverence of law that judges have uniformly told juries that they ought not to pay any respect to the testimony of an accomplice, unless the accomplice is corroborated in some material circumstance. Now, in unless proof of the corpus delicti necessarily involves the defendant's connection with the crime.¹

The practice requiring corroboration of the testimony of one accomplice, applies where two or more are called to testify, because one accomplice cannot corroborate another.² And it has my opinion, that corroboration ought to consist in some circumstance that affects the identity of the party accused. A man who has been guilty of a crime himself, will always be able to relate the facts of the case, and if the confirmation be only on the truth of that history, without identifying the persons, that is really no corroboration at all. If a man was to break open a house, and put a knife to your throat and steal your property, it would be no corroboration that he had stated all the facts correctly, that he had described how the person did put the knife to the throat, and did steal the property. It would not at all tend to show that the party accused participated in it. Here you find that the prisoner and the accomplice are seen together at the house of the landlord. Now, look at his evidence. If they were seen together under circumstances that were extraordinary, and where the prisoner was not likely to be, unless there were concert, it might be something; but he lives within one hundred and fifty yards, and there is nothing extraordinary in his being there, and he left when they were shutting up the house. Therefore, it is perfectly natural that he should have been there and left when he did. The single circumstance is that the prisoner was seen in a house which he frequents, where he may be seen once or twice a week, and there the case ends against him. All the rest depends upon the evidence of the accomplice. The danger is that when a man is fixed, and knows that his own guilt is detected, he purchases impunity by falsely accusing others. I would suggest to you that the circumstances are too slight to justify you in acting on this evidence."

There are some expressions to the contrary in earlier cases; but it seems that all those cases really decide is that there is no rule of law preventing the conviction of a prisoner upon the unsupported testimony of an accomplice. Rex v. Jones, 2 Campb. 132; Rex v. Dawber, 3 Stark. 34; 14 E. C. L. 153; Rex v. Hastings, 7 C. & P. 152; 32 E. C. L. 475.

The corroboration must extend to all of them before they can all be convicted.³

(5) In Trials for Misdemeanors.—It was at one time contended that the practice of requiring confirmation did not extend to cases of misdemeanors.⁴ But it has been said that there is no sound reason for such distinction, and if it ever prevailed it no longer exists,⁵ though the amount of corroboration required may depend, to some extent, on the nature and circumstances of the crime and the degree of moral obliquity to be presumed from its commission.⁶ The rule, however, does not apply in civil actions growing out of conspiracies to commit fraud.⁷ Nor is it applicable in actions to recover penalties and forfeitures suffered by reason of the commission of misdemeanors;¹ though in such cases the credibility of witnesses may be seriously impaired by their known complicity with the parties from whom the forfeitures are sought to be recovered.²

b. WHERE THE TESTIMONY OF ONE WITNESS IS INSUFFICIENT—(1) Treason.—At common law, treason and misprision of treason were sufficiently proved by one credible witness,³ but it has been deemed wise to change this rule by statute. In England, the statutory rule is that no person shall be indicted, tried, or attainted of high treason, or misprision of high treason, but upon the oaths of two lawful witnesses, either both to the same overt act or one of them to one, and another of them to another, overt act of the same treason, unless he shall willingly, and without violence, in open court confess the same.⁴ An exception is made in case of the assassination of the Queen, or an attempt to take her life or to do her bodily harm. In such case, the prisoner is to be tried by the rules of evidence applicable to trials for murder, though upon conviction he shall suffer the penalties of high treason.⁵ Though the treason itself must be proved by two witnesses, yet a collateral fact not tending to the proof of an overt act of treason may be proved by one witness only.⁶ For example, if the defendant pleads alienage as a defense, the statute does not require the testimony of two witnesses to prove that he is a British subject.⁷

It is clear, from the language of the statute, that if the prisoner, when arraigned, makes a voluntary confession in open court, there is no necessity for further proof of his guilt.⁸ And it seems that confessions of overt acts made before examining magistrates are admissible against the prisoner as evidence in chief, if they are proved by two lawful witnesses;⁹ and such confessions are

This rule has been extended to Ireland, also, by Stat. 1 & 2 Geo. IV., ch. 24.

Stats. 1 Edw. VI., ch. 12, and 5 Edw. VI., ch. 11, contain substantially the same provision. Under these statutes, it was held that a person might be convicted of high treason upon the testimony of two witnesses who testified to separate overt acts of the same treason, but not when they testified to separate overt acts of different treasons. Lord Stafford's Case, T. Raym. 407. See also Case of the Regicides, Kel. 9; 1 East P. C. 129; Deacon's Case, Fost. 9; 1 East P. C. 130; 18 How. admissible in confirmation of witnesses who testify directly to overt acts, though they be proved by one witness only.¹

It is provided in the constitution of the United States that no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.² And as early as the year 1778, it was held in the State of Pennsylvania that the prisoner's confession proved by two witnesses was not alone sufficient to convict him, though where an overt act was proved the confession might be received as corroborating evidence.³

(2) Perjury.—In a prosecution for perjury, the evidence of one witness is not sufficient to warrant a conviction, as in such case there is only one oath against another.⁴ Indeed it appears to have been thought at one time that two witnesses were necessary to a conviction.⁵ But, upon principle and authority, the true rule is that to prove the falsity of the statement upon which perjury is charged, the testimony of two witnesses is necessary, or that of one credible witness supported by such corroborating circumstances as make the evidence for the prosecution sufficient at least to overcome the oath of the defendant, and the legal presumption of his innocence.⁶ This rule applies only to the proof of the falsity of the matter upon which perjury is charged; other facts, such as the holding of the court, the proceedings therein, administering the oath, and even that the defendant swore as charged in the indictment, may be proved by one witness.⁷ In an action of slander for charging the plaintiff with perjury, if the defendant pleads the truth of the charge in justification he must sustain his plea by two witnesses, or by one witness and corroborating circumstances.¹ And it seems that the defendant, to support his justification, is bound to give as conclusive proof as would be necessary to convict the plaintiff on an indictment for such offense.² It is not required, however, that the jury shall be satisfied of the truth of the plea beyond a reasonable doubt. After such evidence has been offered and admitted, they should weigh it, as in other civil cases, and if the evidence preponderates in favor of the plea of justification, they may find in favor of the defendant, although upon the same evidence they might acquit the plaintiff, were he on trial for perjury, by allowing him the benefit of a reasonable doubt.³

(3) To Overcome Answer in Equity.—As has been seen in another part of this title, an answer in equity is to be taken as evidence in the suit so far as it is responsive to the bill; and to overcome it the complainant must prove his allegations by two witnesses, or by one witness supported by corroborating circumstances.⁴

(4) Bastardy.—In England, the mother of an illegitimate child must not only be a witness, but her testimony must be corroborated before a man can be adjudged the putative father or an order of affiliation can be made,⁵ and it is necessary that the corroboration be in some material particular.⁶ But this is a statutory rule; and in the absence of such a statute no corroboration is required in such cases as a rule of law;⁷ though, if she is impeached, corroborating evidence is admissible to sustain her testimony.⁸

(5) Breach of Promise of Marriage.—In England, it is provided by statute that, in actions for breach of promise of marriage, the plaintiff's testimony must be corroborated by some other material evidence in support of the promise.⁹

A witness cannot object to answering a question on the ground that he is a foreigner and his answer will subject him to punishment in his own country, unless he furnishes satisfactory proof of what the law of his country is.³ But if it is proved to the court that by the law of his country his answer may expose him to prosecution, or subject him to a penalty or a forfeiture, he is entitled to his privilege.⁴

2. Exposure to a Penalty or Forfeiture.—It is also the privilege of a witness to refuse to answer any question which has a tendency to expose him to a penalty or a forfeiture,⁵ and this rule is the same in equity as at law.⁶

3. Exposure to a Civil Action.—In England, it is now settled that a witness cannot lawfully refuse to answer a question relevant to the matter in issue, on the ground that his answer might subject him to a civil suit upon a cause of action not involving a penalty or a forfeiture.⁷ And in the United States, this rule is pounded to them by the House of Lords in Lord Melville's case. See 6 Parl. Debates 167; 2 Phil. Ev. 936; Pye v. Butterfield, 5 B. & S. 829; 117 E. C. L. 829. See also *Johnson v. 7. This question was much discussed in Lord Melville's case and was propounded to the judges by the House of Lords. Eight of the judges, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Eldon were of the opinion that the law was as it is given in the text. Four of them, among whom was Lord Mansfield, C. J., were of the opinion that a witness was not compellable to answer any question, the answer to which might subject him accepted by the current of authority as the true doctrine of the common law,¹ though the rule is not so applied in either country to a civil action. 6 Parl. Debates, pp. 234, 245; 2 Phil. Ev. 937. This division of opinion gave rise to the statute 46 Geo. III., ch. 37, which settled the rule as declared by the majority of the judges and as stated in the text. See Hall's Am. L. J. 223, 232.

In Bull v. Loveland, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 12, Shaw, C. J., said: "In this case, the general question has been argued at some length whether a witness, without his own consent, can be called to testify to any fact pertinent to the issue between other parties, where such testimony may tend to charge him with a debt or subject him to pecuniary loss or liability, but where it does not tend to expose him to punishment or subject him to any penalty or forfeiture. This question has been the subject of much discussion and difference of opinion among eminent judges and those of the greatest experience in nisi prius trials both in England and in the United States. In the case of U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 344, it seemed to be taken for granted by Marshall, C. J., that a man in a civil case is not bound to testify against his interest, but that was before the discussions in England and the opinions of the judges in the House of Lords, growing out of questions raised in Lord Melville's trial. Besides, the question was not argued, and it arose where the witness was called to testify to a fact which would have rendered a ship forfeited under the registry acts of the United States, in which at the time of the forfeiture he, himself, claimed an interest. In Webster v. Lee, 5 Mass. 334, it was stated, by Parsons, C. J., in giving the opinion of the court, that a witness may, if he consents, testify against his own interest. Although this expression implied that his consent was requisite, yet the case did not call for the expression of an opinion upon the question whether he could be compulsorily required to testify against his will. In a later case, however, Appleton v. Boyd, 7 Mass. 131, the same point again came before the same eminent judge at nisi prius, upon which he ruled that a witness cannot be required without his consent to testify against his own pecuniary interest. This point, among others, was reserved, but it was not argued or noticed by the counsel on either side. In giving the opinion the court cited no authority, and, in noticing this point, seemed to take the rule for granted, and considered rather whether, from the facts reported, the witness had an interest in the question, than whether by law it would excuse him from giving his testimony. In England, this subject underwent much discussion pending the impeachment against Lord Melville, in 1806, upon which occasion the question was put to the judges by the House of Lords. The question was presented in two or three different forms, slightly varying in terms, but it was substantially the same in each. Eight judges and the chancellor were of opinion that the witness was bound to answer a question, although his answer might render him liable to a civil action. The

as to compel a party to the record, or the real party in interest, though not a party to the record, to testify against his own interest.¹

4. Exposure to Disgrace.—There has been much discussion as to whether a witness may be compelled to answer a question, the answering of which will degrade his character, though it will not tend to criminate him or expose him to a penalty or a forfeiture.² It may be stated that a witness will not be excused from answering a question concerning a matter which is material to the issue on trial, on the sole ground that his answer will tend to disgrace him.³ But as to collateral and irrelevant matters inquired of other four judges expressed a contrary opinion. In order to remove the doubts which such a difference of opinion among eminent judges implied, an act was passed, 46 Geo. III., ch. 37, declaring that a witness cannot, by law, refuse to answer a question relevant to the matter in issue, the answering of which has no tendency to accuse himself, or to expose him to a penalty or forfeiture of any nature whatsoever, by reason only, or on the sole ground that the answering of such question may establish or tend to establish that he owes a debt, or is otherwise subject to a civil suit. This act, as a statute, of course, has no authority here, but as strictly a declaratory law it is entitled to weight. Lord Erskine, then Lord Chancellor, stated that, notwithstanding some difference of opinion among high authorities, he considered the law so far precise, clear and conspicuous, that it was necessary no new law should be promulgated otherwise than in the form of a declaratory law. In this suggestion he was countenanced by Lord Eldon, who was not then in judicial office. 1 Phil. Ev. (Am. ed.) 208; Peake Ev. (3d ed.) 193; 1 Hall's L. J. 223; 1 Stark. Ev. 135. This rule has recently been recognized and acted on in Maryland, Taney v. Kemp, 4 Har. & J. (Md.) 348; 7 Am. Dec. 673; Stoddert v. Manning, 2 Har. & G. (Md.) 147; and in Pennsylvania, Baird v. Cochran, 4 S. & R. (Pa.) 397. In a recent case in this court, it has been held that one summoned as trustee cannot avoid answering questions put to him in regard to the validity of a conveyance under which he claims title to property, on the ground that it may affect his own pecuniary interest. Devoll v. Brownell, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 448. This is not precisely in point, but it is important as giving a construction to a constitutional provision which might be supposed to stand in the way of the application of the rule in question in this commonwealth. The provision is found in the 12th article of the Declaration of Rights. 'No subject shall be held to answer for any crime, etc., or be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against, himself.' In this case, it was decided that the trustee was bound to answer, though he might thereby charge himself, and that the above constitutional provision does not relate to questions of property. On the whole, we think the weight of authority is in favor of the rule that a witness may be called and examined in a matter pertinent to the issue, where his answers will not expose him to criminal prosecution, or tend to subject him to a penalty or forfeiture, although they may otherwise adversely affect his pecuniary interest, and that the witness was properly called and examined in the present case."

There are some early Connecticut cases in which the contrary was held. Benjamin v. Hathaway, 3 Conn. 528; Storrs v. Wetmore, Kirby (Conn.) 203; Starr v. Tracy, 2 Root (Conn.) 528.

under the license allowed in cross-examination, no definite rule can be formulated. Such questions are asked for the purpose of impairing the credibility of the witness by showing that he has been guilty of immoral acts which render him unworthy of credit, and it is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court in each particular case as to how far such a method of attack may be pursued.¹

5. Constitutional Guaranty—a. IN GENERAL.—It is provided by the constitution of the United States that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.² And similar provisions are to be found in the constitutions of the various states.³ This constitutional provision is not limited to cases where witnesses might be called to testify in criminal prosecutions against themselves. The privilege is as broad as the mischief against which it seeks to guard, and insures that a person shall not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which may tend to show that he himself has committed a crime.⁴

And it is the better opinion that it is a violation of the constitutional privilege of the witness to compel him to submit to a

1. See Encyc. of Pl. & Prac., article "Examination of Witnesses."

These rulings are made at nisi prius, and the varying circumstances of cases have caused great judges to make different rulings at different times. Thus Lord Ellenborough, who once held that a witness was not bound to state whether he had been imprisoned in a house of correction, Millman v. Tucker, Peake Add. Cas. 222, and again that the question could not even be put to the witness, Rex v. Lewis, 4 Esp. 226, is reported to have decided the contrary in the later case of Frost v. Holloway, cited in 2 Tayl. Ev., § 1460, and 2 Phil. Ev. 949, where, upon the refusal of a witness to state whether or not he has been confined in jail for theft, the learned judge said to him: "If you do not answer the question I will send you there."

2. See 5th Amend. Const. United States. This provision, read in connection with the 4th amendment aimed at unreasonable searches and seizures, protects a witness from producing books and papers which may be used as incriminating evidence against him. Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616.

It has been held that a proceeding to enforce a forfeiture under the revenue laws is not a criminal proceeding within the meaning of this provision. The true test is whether the judgment is of punishment against the person, or of forfeiture against the res. U. S. v. Three Tons of Coal, 6 Biss. (U. S.) 379.

3. See constitutions of the various states.

A statute requiring officers of a corporation to inform the secretary of state, under oath, whether or not the corporation had violated a statute providing for the forfeiture of the charter in case of such violation is unconstitutional. State v. Simmons Hardware Co., 109 Mo. 118.

4. Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 562; Emery's Case, 107 Mass. 172; 9 Am. Rep. 22; Cullen v. Com., 24 Gratt. (Va.) 624; State v. Enoch, 69 Ind. 314; Ex p. Cohen, 104 Cal. 524.

In New York, the contrary has been held, the court taking the narrow view that the words "criminal case" must be construed to mean a prosecution against the witness himself. People v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. 74.

In a divorce suit, a witness cannot be compelled to state whether he has had criminal intercourse with the plaintiff's wife. Smith v. Smith (N. Car. 1895), 21 S. E. Rep. 196.

A prosecution for the removal of a public officer for a violation of duty is a criminal case within the meaning of physical examination, or to make experiments in the presence of the jury which tend to criminate him.¹ The refusal of the accused to do anything which might tend to criminate him, cannot be proved as a circumstance against him.² And it seems that the result of an experiment which he is compelled to make out of court should not be admitted in evidence against him,³ though the contrary conclusion has been reached by some courts.⁴ It is not a violation of the defendant's constitutional privilege for the jury to observe his general personal appearance, and scrutinize such of his physical peculiarities as are open to the observation of the general public.⁵

6. STATUTES ABRIDGING THE PRIVILEGE.—In the absence of a constitutional provision, this privilege may be abridged by the legislature. In England, the privilege has been taken away in some cases by act of Parliament, and in others it has been rendered valueless by acts of indemnity.⁶ In a number of the states having constitutional provisions similar to that contained in the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States, it the constitutional rule. Thruston v. Clark (Cal. 1895), 40 Pac. Rep. 435.

1. State v. Jacobs, 5 Jones (N. Car.) 259; People v. McCoy, 45 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 216.

A defendant in a criminal case cannot be required to give evidence against himself either by acts or words. Blackwell v. State (Ga.), 3 Cr. L. Mag. 393; 67 Ga. 76.

In Stokes v. State, 5 Baxt. (Tenn.) 619; 30 Am. Rep. 72, the prosecution brought a pan of mud into court and, after proof that it was about as soft as that in which the tracks of the offender had been seen, called on the defendant to put his feet in the mud. The court refused to compel him to do so, but the judgment was nevertheless reversed because the prisoner was asked to make evidence against himself in the presence of the jury.

The contrary rule was adopted by the majority of the court in State v. Ah Chuey, 14 Nev. 79; 33 Am. Rep. 530, where the defendant was compelled to exhibit his arm, in order to reveal the presence of tattoo marks described by another witness and thus to prove his own identity.

2. Thus, in Cooper v. State, 86 Ala. 610; 11 Am. St. Rep. 84, the defendant, who was on trial for burglary, had refused to make tracks on the carpet in the house where the crime had been committed, in order that they might be compared with those made by the burglar. The state was permitted to prove the fact of his refusal, and for this error the judgment was reversed.

3. Day v. State, 63 Ga. 667.

4. It has been held that if a prisoner is compelled by the officer who arrested him to make an experiment, such as putting his foot into a track found at the scene of the crime, evidence of the result is admissible against him. State v. Graham, 74 N. Car. 646; 21 Am. Rep. 493; Walker v. State, 7 Tex. App. 245; 32 Am. Rep. 595.

In State v. Garrett, 71 N. Car. 85; 17 Am. Rep. 1, it had been proved at the coroner's inquest that the defendant had said that the deceased was accidentally burned to death and that she had burned her own hand in trying to put the fire out. The coroner compelled her to remove the bandage from her hand and it appeared to be uninjured. It was held that the state might prove this circumstance at the trial. See 22 Alb. L. J. 144, where the writer approves this decision on the ground that the prisoner had attempted to conceal evidence ordinarily visible, but questions the soundness of the two preceding cases because they admit secondary evidence of incompetent evidence.

5. State v. Johnson, 67 N. Car. 55; State v. Woodruff, 67 N. Car. 89; Williams v. State, 98 Ala. 52.

6. See 24 & 25 Vict., ch. 96, §§ 75-84; 26 & 27 Vict., ch. 119, § 5. And some other statutes referred to in 2 Tayl. Ev., § 1455.

has been held that statutes which provide that a witness may be compelled to give self-criminating evidence, but that his answers shall not thereafter be used as evidence against him, fully preserve the constitutional privilege.¹ These decisions seem to ignore the fact that a witness may thus be compelled to disclose matters which will lead to his prosecution, or to reveal the existence of evidence, other than his own testimony, which may secure his conviction. It is, therefore, the better opinion that the constitutional privilege of refusing to answer cannot be taken away by statute, unless absolute indemnity is provided, and nothing short of complete amnesty to the witness, an absolute wiping out of the offenses as to him, so that he can no longer be prosecuted for it, will furnish that indemnity.² If, however, he is thus fully

Section 860 of the Rev. Stats. of the United States reads as follows: "No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence obtained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture, provided that this section shall not exempt any party or witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in discovering or testifying as aforesaid." In a number of cases it was held by the trial judges of the federal courts that this statute fully protected the witness in his constitutional privilege. U. S. v. McCarthy, 18 Fed. Rep. 87; U. S. v. Brown, 1 Sawy. (U. S.) 531. But in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, reversing 44 Fed. Rep. 268, it appeared that one Charles Counselman was summoned before the grand jury, who were investigating certain alleged violations of the interstate commerce act, and he declined to answer certain questions propounded to him, on the ground that his answers would criminate him. The district court considered his excuse insufficient and committed him for contempt. Upon habeas corpus, the circuit court decided that he was fully protected by section 860 of the Rev. Stats., discharged the writ of habeas corpus, and remanded him to the custody of the marshal. From this order he appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the decision of the circuit court was reversed on the ground that the statute was not sufficient to protect the constitutional privilege of the witness. After a critical review of the authorities pro and con, the court said: "It is quite clear that legislation cannot abridge a constitutional privilege, and that it cannot replace or supply one, at least unless it is so broad as to have the same extent in scope and effect. It is to be noted of section 860 of the Rev. Stats., that it does not undertake to compel self-criminating evidence from a party or a witness. In several of the state statutes above referred to, the testimony of the party or witness is made compulsory, and, in some, either all possibility of a future prosecution of the party or witness is distinctly taken away, or he can plead in bar or abatement the fact that he was compelled to testify. We are clearly of opinion that no statute which leaves the party or witness subject to prosecution after he answers the crinating question put to him, can have the protected by statute, he may be compelled to answer, though his testimony may show that he has committed a crime.¹ But neither the court nor the prosecuting attorney can offer a witness such indemnity; it must be positively guarantied to him by statute.²

6. Where the Witness Can No Longer Be Prosecuted.—A pardon under the great seal precludes the possibility of subsequent punishment for the offense pardoned, and takes away the privilege of refusing to answer questions concerning the same.³ So, also, where a prosecution for an offense, or an action for the recovery of a forfeiture, or a penalty, is barred by the Statute of Limitations, the privilege of refusing to answer no longer exists.⁴ But in order to deprive the witness of his privilege, it is not sufficient to show simply that a prosecution instituted after the question is asked would be barred; it should appear affirmatively that no prosecution is then pending.⁵ Likewise, after an acquittal upon a effect of supplanting the privilege conferred by the constitution of the United States. Section 860 of the Rev. Stats. does not supply a complete protection from all the perils against which the constitutional prohibition was designed to guard, and is not a full substitute for that prohibition. In view of the constitutional provision, a statutory enactment, to be valid, must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates. In this respect we give our assent rather to the doctrine of Emery's Case, 107 Mass. 172; 9 Am. Rep. 22, than to that of People v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. 74, and we consider that the ruling of this court, in Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, supports the view we take. Section 860, moreover, affords no protection against that use of compelled testimony which consists in gaining therefrom a knowledge of the details of a crime, and of sources of information which may supply other means of convicting the witness or party. It is contended, on the part of the appellee, that the reason why the courts in Virginia, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire have held that the exonerating statute must be so broad as to give the witness complete amnesty, is that the constitutions of those states give to the witness a broader privilege and exemption than is granted by the constitution of the United States, in that their language is that the witness shall not be compelled to accuse himself or furnish evidence against himself, or give evidence against himself; and it is contended that the terms of the constitution of the United States, and of the constitutions of Georgia, California and New York, are more restricted. But we are of opinion that however this difference may have been commented on in some of the decisions, there is really, in spirit and principle, no distinction arising out of such difference of language.⁶

criminal charge, it is too late for the witness to refuse to answer concerning the same.¹

7. Privilege of Witness Not of Party.—The privilege of refusing to answer is exclusively the privilege of the witness.² Neither party to the action can claim it or raise the objection on behalf of the witness;³ neither can counsel interpose the objection.⁴ But where a party is a witness in his own behalf he may claim his privilege through his counsel.⁵ And where the matter inquired of is not pertinent to the issue, a party may, of course, object on that ground, or the court may of its own volition exclude the question.⁶

8. Who Determines the Tendency of the Question.—When a question is asked, it is for the court to determine whether any possible answer to it might tend to criminate the witness.⁷ This being decided in the affirmative, the witness must decide for himself whether or not the answer he would give would have such a tendency.⁸ If the judge were to require him to point out how his answer would criminate him, his privilege would be worthless.¹ But if the witness abuses his privilege by willfully and falsely asserting that his answer would criminate him, he may be made to respond in civil damages to the party thus wrongfully deprived of the benefit of his testimony.²

9. Time of Claiming the Privilege.—In England, it was formerly held that if a witness testified without objection to any portion of a matter tending to criminate him, it was then too late for him to claim his privilege.³ But it is now settled that he may claim his protection at any stage of the inquiry, and, having done so, may not be compelled to answer any additional questions tending to criminate him.⁴ According to the weight of authority in the United States, if the witness understandingly discloses part of a material transaction in which he was criminally concerned without claiming his privilege, he may be compelled to go forward and state the whole of it;⁵ but his privilege should not be denied him if his answer to the question demurred to is not necessary to the full understanding of other material statements which he has made.⁶ The witness has no right to refuse to be sworn on the ground that any testimony he could give would tend to criminate him. The privilege should not be claimed until the question is asked.⁷

If he claims his privilege, and refuses to answer a material question, that fact may be considered against him the same

Nothing can be more fallacious as a standard of credit than such a conclusion, or more dangerous to justice by depriving the subject of that protection to which he is entitled by law, and the practice formerly was that the judge told the witness that he was not bound to answer the question."

as any other refusal to produce evidence within his power.¹ But the refusal of a witness to answer a criminating question cannot be shown as a circumstance against him in a subsequent trial for the offense inquired of.² Neither can his answer be put in evidence against him if the court compels him to answer such a question.³

b. WHERE THE PRIVILEGE IS DENIED.—The refusal of a witness to answer any question which he may lawfully be required to answer, is a contempt of court, and if he persists in his refusal he may be punished accordingly.⁴

5. Webster's Dictionary; followed in Osborne v. Warren, 44 Conn. 357. In that case, a statute of Connecticut provided that "every person who shall wittingly and unlawfully throw down, or leave open, any bars, gate or fence," belonging to any inclosure, shall pay to the party injured double damages and a sum not exceeding five dollars, to be recovered in an action of trespass. The defendant, in a controversy with the plaintiffs as to a right of way over their land, threw down their fence, claiming and believing that he had a right to do so, but the court found that he had no right of way. It was held that his case fell within the intent of the statute. The court said: "That we may know the precise force of the word 'wittingly' we resort to the dictionary. Webster defines it thus: 'Knowingly—with knowledge—by design.' We must presume that in the common speech of the people it imported knowledge simply; that the legislature understood and used it in the same sense, and that the statute is aimed at persons who knowingly and by design throw down fences and leave open gates and bars, having no legal right to do so, excluding only cases which are the result of accident or forgetfulness. The legislature designed to punish to the extent of double damages all persons who, having controversies with adjoining owners as to dividing lines, take the law into their own hands, and render judgment and do execution in their own favor, thereby exposing inclosures to serious damage from incursions of cattle, in the absence and without the knowledge of the owner. The law intends that all persons shall adjust such differences through its appointed means."

In Indictment.—In Harrington v. State, 54 Miss. 490, it was held that an indictment under the Mississippi Code, for the alteration of a record, must charge that the alteration was "wittingly" done, and is fatally defective if it charges that it was done "willingly," and should be quashed upon motion.

WOOD—WOODS—(See also TREES, vol. 26, p. 557; TIMBER, vol. 26, p. 22).—The word "wood" has several well defined and recognized meanings:

1. A thick collection of trees, a forest.²

The court said: "The alteration of the record was charged to have been 'willingly' done. The language of the statute is 'wittingly.' While it is not always necessary to follow the literal language of the act in framing indictments for statutory offenses, it is essential that either the same words, or words of equivalent meaning, and substantially synonymous, should be used. Section 2884, Code 1871; Kline v. State, 44 Miss. 317. 'Willingly' and 'wittingly' are not synonymous words, and do not convey the same idea. The one relates to the will, and means 'freely,' or 'voluntarily;' while the other relates to the wit or understanding, and means 'knowingly,' or 'designedly.'"

1. In Com. v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 237, the court said that it was at a loss to see a distinction between a "woman child" and "a female child."

Woman and Female Synonymous.—In Myers v. State, 84 Ala. 11, it was held that the use of the word "female," in an indictment, meant the same thing as "woman," and did not render the indictment insufficient. The court said: "The words female and woman, used as the former was in the indictment before us, mean the same thing, and the indictment is sufficient. 1 Brick. Dig. 499, § 736; Sparrenberger v. State, 53 Ala. 481; 25 Am. Rep. 643; Smith v. State, 63 Ala. 55; Block v. State, 66 Ala. 493; Parker v. State, 39 Ala. 365; Watson v. State, 55 Ala. 150."

Settlement of Pauper—Married Woman.—In Somerville v. Boston, 120 Mass. 574, it was held that the Massachusetts statute providing "that any woman of the age of twenty-one years, who resides in any place within this state for five years together, without receiving relief as a pauper, shall thereby gain a settlement in such place," applied only to unmarried women.

2. Worcester's Dictionary; quoted in State v. Howard, 72 Me. 459.

A field of broom sedge and wire grass, surrounded by an old fence and used as a pasture, is not a woods within the meaning of the North Carolina statute imposing a penalty for injury to an adjoining proprietor, arising from the owner burning off the same. The court said: "The case of Hall v. Cranford, 5 Jones (N. Car.) 3, in which it was held that 'an old field which had been turned out without any fence around it, and which had grown up in broom sedge and pine bushes, some of which were waist high and others head high,' did come within its meaning, stretched the doctrine of being liberal in construing statutes in order to reach the mischief intended to be remedied, as far as it is safe to follow." Achenbach v. Johnston, 84 N. Car. 265.

Forest Lands.—"We cannot imagine how, in any proper sense, the burning of log heaps in one's own inclosed field can be called burning his woods. The term 'woods,' as used in the statute (see Rev. Stat., ch. 16; Rev. Code, ch. 16, § 1), means forest lands in their natural state, and is used in contradistinction to lands cleared and inclosed for cultivation. The statute is a penal one, and must, therefore, be construed strictly; but, whether construed strictly or liberally, we are clearly of opinion that the facts proved do not bring the defendant either within the letter or spirit of it." Averitt v. Murrell, 4 Jones (N. Car.) 323.

Woodhouse.—A policy of insurance on a "dwelling-house and woodhouse," described in the application as "occupied for the usual purposes," covers a building, built at one time, with a single frame and roof, and designed for one building, for a carriage house and woodhouse, of which the wood room constitutes two-thirds, and is separated from the carriage room by a loose partition extending to the eaves on one side, and halfway to the roof on the other; and evidence is admissible that the whole building was called by the tenants and neighbors the "woodhouse." White v. Mutual F. Assur. Co., 8 Gray (Mass.) 566.

Whether "Wood" Will Carry Soil.— "Wood, boscus, contains timber or hautboys and underwood or subboscus. Both the trees and the soil on which they stand pass by the grant of a wood or boscus (Co. Litt. 4 b. Compare Doe v. Bevis, 18 L. J. C. P. 128; 7 C. B. 456; 62 E. C. L. 456). In like manner, by an exception in a lease of the woods and underwoods growing or being on the property demised, the soil itself on which they grow is excepted (Ive's Case, 5 Coke 11 a; Hide v. Whistler, Pop. 146; Whistler v. Paslow, Cro. Jac. 487. On the other hand, by an exception of 'trees' (Liford's Case, 11 Coke 46b), 'saleable underwoods' now growing on the premises (Pincomb v. Thomas, Cro. Jac. 524), the soil itself is not excepted. Glover v. Andrew, 1 And. 7." Elph. on Interpretation of Deeds 631. See also Shep. Touch. 94, 95; Stanley v. White, 14 East 332.

"Under the term 'wood,' used as synonymous with the Latin word boscus, not only the trees, but the soil upon which they are, will pass; and where there was a lease of a manor, 'always excepting the wood and underwood,' it was held that the soil itself was excepted; but where the grant or exception is of timber trees, no soil passes or is excepted but so much as is necessary for the nutriment of the granted trees. Whistler v. Paslow, Cro. Jac. 487; Leigh v. Heald, 1 B. & Ad. 622; 20 E. C. L. 458. Or, as it was said in another place, the grantee of the trees has 'an interest in the soil for a particular use,' Clap v. Draper, 4 Mass. 266; 3 Am. Dec. 215; he is entitled 'to sufficient nutriment out of the land to sustain the vegetative life of the trees, for without that the excepted trees cannot subsist.' Liford's Case, 11 Coke 49. To the same effect is Tucker v. Andrews, 1 Me. 122, where it was held that by a conveyance reserving all the pine timber of a particular size, the trees remain the property of the grantor, with as much soil as is necessary to support them. From these ascertained principles, it would seem to follow that the owner of growing trees has, technically speaking, an interest in the close where they are situate; for close does not so much mean an inclosure as an interest in the land itself. It was accordingly decided in Rolls v. Rock, 2 Selw. N. P. 1287, that where trees are absolutely excepted in a lease, the land on which they grow is necessarily excluded also; consequently, if the tenant cut down the trees, the landlord may maintain trespass for breaking and entering his close and cutting down his trees; the landlord's possession being, in legal contemplation, exclusive." Boults v. Mitchell, 15 Pa. St. 380.

Lumber and Bark.—A conveyance was conditioned upon the grantee applying to the purchase-money the avails of any wood cut from the land, other than that necessary for sugar wood. It was contended that this did not include lumber and bark. The court said: "The defendant claims that the word 'wood,' as used in the condition of the deed, cannot be construed to comprehend lumber and bark, and so that no recovery can be had for the avails thereof. But it appears that the parties had given it that construction, and we give it the same construction; for it is evident that it is used in its generic sense, which, of course, includes all the growing trees upon the lot." Hutchinson v. Ford, 62 Vt. 97.

Refuse Wood and Timber.—Sawdust and shavings are "refuse wood and timber." State v. Howard, 72 Me. 459. This was an indictment for throwing such stuff into the Penobscot river, from a sawmill. The court said: "The word 'wood' has several well defined and recognized meanings. Among them, as given by Worcester, are: '1. A large and thick collection of trees; a forest. 2. The substance of trees; trees sawed or cut for architectural or other purposes; timber. 3. Trees sawed or cut for fuel.' In what sense is the word used in the act under consideration? The subject-matter to which the act relates is the business of manufacturing logs, as cut in the forest and floated to the mills, into various kinds of lumber; and the manner in which, at the time of the passage of the act, at the mills, on the Penobscot

3. Trees sawed or cut for fuel.¹WOOL.—See MANUFACTURE, vol. 14, p. 262.WORDS.—(See also INTERPRETATION, vol. 11, p. 507; STATUTES, vol. 23, p. 140).—Words are the common signs that mankind make use of to declare their intention to one another; and river, the manufacturer was accustomed to get rid of the refuse or waste, or such portions of the log as were not utilized for any purpose and were valueless, by casting them into the river to be floated away from the mill. It was found that this practice was fast filling up the channel of the river and greatly impeding its navigation; and the object sought to be accomplished by the act was to prevent it. Having in view the subject-matter to which the act relates and the object to be accomplished by it, it cannot be supposed that the word wood was used in its commercial sense, as designating 'trees cut or sawed for fuel,' as the materials which it was intended to designate were not subjects of commerce but such as were cast off as waste or refuse, of no value. We think it was used in its generic sense as designating 'the substance of trees,' or of the logs to be manufactured. But it is contended in argument that the use of the adjective 'refuse,' to qualify and limit the word 'wood,' is inconsistent with this interpretation; that 'refuse,' used to qualify and limit wood or timber, means unmerchantable, of inferior quality, and is not an apt or appropriate word to describe such portions of the substance of the log as are cast off in its manufacture; but that for that purpose the apt and appropriate word is waste. The answer to this argument is that standard lexicographers use 'refuse' as synonymous with 'waste.' Thus, Worcester: 'Refuse, a—left as worthless when the rest is taken; worthless; waste;' and one of the meanings given by him of waste is refuse. Moreover, the title of this act is: 'An act to prevent the throwing of slabs and other refuse into the Penobscot river.' Here it is obvious that 'slabs, board or lath edgings, bark, grindings of edgings, wood, bark or lumber,' named in the act, which it is claimed are properly called waste, are all designated by the word 'refuse.' Then the word 'sort' has some significance in pointing the meaning of other words. It does not appear to be used in reference to the different kinds of wood, but rather in reference to the form or shape of the refuse wood or timber. The great purpose sought to be accomplished by the act was to prevent obstructions to the navigation of the river by throwing into it the waste or refuse made in the manufacture of logs into the various kinds of lumber; and, that this purpose might not be defeated, the legislature, after naming several articles of refuse or waste, added the general description of 'refuse wood or timber of any sort.' Both of the materials involved in this indictment are a part of the substance of the log; they are refuse or waste; and when thrown into the river tend to obstruct and impede its navigation; and we are of opinion that they are embraced in the general description in the act, and that throwing them into the river is inhibited by it."

1. Worcester's Dict.; quoted in State v. Howard, 72 Me. 459.

Standing Wood.—A sale of "standing wood" includes trees suitable for timber as well as those for fuel. Strout v. Harper, 72 Me. 270. The court said: "True, the word 'wood' is often used to designate fuel. But when so used it means fuel wholly, or at least partially, prepared for the fire. The term 'standing wood' cannot be so used. It can apply only to trees. And when there is nothing in the context, or in any other part of the deed, to indicate that it is used in a more limited sense, we think it must be held to include all the trees—trees suitable for timber as well as those fit only for firewood."

Firewood; Cord Wood.—Under a statute requiring "firewood" to be measured, it is not necessary to measure trimmings of lumber, consisting of pieces from one or two inches to one or two feet long, and sold by the cart load. The court said: "We cannot doubt that it means cord wood of the usual length. It could never have been the intention of the legislature that chips or the trimmings of lumber, which is sold by the load and not by the cord, should be surveyed." Duren v. Gage, 72 Me. 118.

when the words of a man express his meaning plainly, distinctly and perfectly, there is no occasion to have recourse to any other means of interpretation.¹

WORK—WORKS, ETC.—See note 2.

1. Pea Patch Island, 1 Wall. Jr. (C. C.), app., p. cxlv.

Words are nothing except in connection with the intention with which they are used, or taken. The animus of a look, or other expressions of countenance, is as perceptible to the eye as words are to the ear, and often much more capable of correct understanding. That this is so is self-evident. Ray v. State, 50 Ala. 107.

Confined to Written Words.—In State v. McArthur, 5 Wash. 558, it was held that the Penal Code of Washington did not abolish the distinction between libel and slander. The court said: "It is true that the use of the expression 'words,' if construed without reference to the rest of the section, would probably lead us to that conclusion; but while the rule is undoubted that, in construing statutes, words must be given their ordinarily accepted meaning, yet that must be taken in consideration with, and made subservient to, another imperative and absolutely necessary rule, that 'the whole section must be construed together;' and considering the descriptive part of this section in connection with the latter part, which provides that every person who makes, composes or dictates a libel, or who publishes or willfully circulates such libel, etc., shall be punished, etc., plainly indicates that the expression 'words,' used in this section, has reference to written or printed words. This view is strengthened by the provisions of section 18, which define what publication of a libel is. There is no provision in said section for the publication of a libel by oral language, as there certainly would have been if it had been the intention of the legislature to incorporate spoken words into the definition of libel."

General Words.—By general words are meant such terms as, according to the common use of language, can, without doing them violence, be made to stand in agreement with the rest of the descriptive phrases. Evens v. Griscom, 42 N. J. L. 588.

Defamatory Words.—See LIBEL AND SLANDER, vol. 13, p. 297.

Insulting Words.—See INSULTING, vol. 11, p. 277.

2. Works, Mines, Manufactory.—A statute declared its purpose to secure money due "for labor and services rendered by any miner, mechanic, laborer or clerk, for any person or persons or chartered company employing clerks, miners, mechanics or laborers, either as owners, lessees, contractors or underowners of any works, mines, manufactory, or other business where clerks, miners or mechanics are employed." It was held that the statute contemplated a business complete and independent and of a fixed and permanent character, as opposed to a temporary employment, cutting sawlogs, for example. The court said: "The words 'works, mines, manufactory,' thus employed in the act, have a definite signification, well understood in their general and popular acceptance. Ex vi termini the branches of business intended to be described by them are, in a certain sense, complete and independent, and of a fixed and permanent character, as opposed to a temporary employment that is merely incidental to any particular branch of business. It will scarcely be pretended that either of these words fitly describes the business in which appellant was employed." Pardee's Appeal, 100 Pa. St. 412.

Stove Works—Burglary.—An allegation in an indictment charging defendant with breaking and entering "stove works" is not a sufficient allegation that he broke or entered a building, the words "stove works" not necessarily implying an inclosure or building. The court said: "The words 'stove works' do not necessarily imply a place inclosed by a fence. Still less do they imply of necessity a building. These words are used to mean all the grounds used by a manufacturer for the manufacture of stoves. They include the buildings, and also the grounds about the buildings, whether such grounds are fenced in or not. They are words of the most general meaning. Webster's Dictionary, under 'work.' One who entered into grounds used for the manufacture of stoves might, in the legal phrase, be said to break into the close of the owner. And plainly the allegation of the indictment does not necessarily include the breaking into any building, or even into any grounds inclosed by a fence." People v. Haight (Supreme Ct.), 26 N. Y. St. Rep. 33.

Works—Stipulation in Conveyance.—In South St. Joseph Land Co. v. Pitt, 114 Mo. 135, it was held that a stipulation that a company should transfer its works to a certain place, was fulfilled by the removal of the building and machinery, although the factory was not put in operation. The court said: "The word works is often used as meaning 'an establishment for manufacturing, or for performing industrial labor of any sort; generally, in the plural, including all the buildings, machinery, etc., used in the required operations, as iron works,' Century Dictionary. The word was, we think, used in this sense here, that is to say, meaning the buildings and machines of the Omaha plant. The parties could not have used the word in any other sense, when they say the works shall be transferred from Omaha; for the works at that place were not, and had not been, in operation for fourteen months."

In Price v. Kirk, 35 Leg. Int. 325, it was held that a claim by an architect, for preparing drawings and specifications for a house, was not subject to a mechanic's lien. The drawing of plans and specifications, of itself, is not "work" within the meaning of the statute. But in Pennsylvania Bank v. Gries, 35 Pa. St. 423, the court held that an architect who drew plans and specifications for a building, directed and superintended the work done in pursuance of them by the various mechanics, inspecting materials, examining accounts, countersigning orders, and generally occupying the builder's place, and discharging his duties throughout, performed "work about the erection or construction of the building," and included the drawing of plans and specifications necessary to enable him to perform this work within the act.

In Hughes v. Torgerson, 96 Ala. 346, an architect was held within the protection of the Alabama code. The court said: "Are such services by an architect, 'work or labor upon . . . a building or improvement on land,' within the meaning of the statute?

Code, § 3018. It is plain that a contractor for the construction of the building is within the protection of the statute. If he was also intrusted with the planning of the building, and with the sole supervision of its erection, we think it is equally plain that his services in these particulars could be regarded as properly a part of his work 'upon the building,' and that compensation therefor might be included in the amount, for the security of which he could acquire a lien under the statute. There is nothing in the circumstance that such services were rendered by another person to put them beyond the protection of the statute. Under a New York statute a lien was authorized in favor 'of any person who shall perform any labor, or furnish any materials, in building, altering or repairing any house, etc., by virtue of any contract with the owner,' etc. 'This language,' it was said in Stryker v. Cassidy, 76 N. Y. 50; 32 Am. Rep. 262, 'is general and comprehensive, and its natural and plain import includes all persons who perform labor in the construction or reparation of a building, irrespective of the grade of their employment, or the particular kind of service. The architect who superintends the construction of a building, performs labor as truly as the carpenter who frames it, or the mason who lays the walls, and labor of a most important character. . . . The language quoted makes no distinction between skilled and unskilled labor, or between mere manual labor and the labor of one who supervises, directs, and applies the labor of others. . . . The general principle upon which the lien laws proceed, is that any person who has contributed, by his labor, or by furnishing materials, to a structure erected by an owner upon his premises, shall have a claim upon the property for his compensation.' The claim of an architect was allowed in that case. What was there said seems eminently sound, and is equally applicable to the Alabama statute. An architect who prepares the drawings, plans and specifications for a building, and superintends the erection thereof, may as truly be said to perform labor thereon as anyone who takes part in the work of construction. That he is within the protection of the statute is a proposition well supported by adjudications upon other similar statutes." Phillipson Mechanics' Liens (2d ed.), § 158."

Loss of time for men was held, in Lee v. Brayton (R. I. 1893), 26 Atl. Rep. 256, not to be subject to a mechanic's lien, as it is not work or material.

Persons who occupy the positions of managing agent and superintendent of trains, but who also, on occasion, run trains, clean cars, repair track, and act as "general utility" men, must be considered as performing "work and labor," within the Montana railroad lien law (Comp. Stat. Montana, ch. 25, § 707); but it is not so with one who merely has charge of the office and of the receipts, and keeps in a book the time of the workmen as handed in to him. Mining Co. v. Cullins, 104 U. S. 176.

Works—Employers' Liability Act.—In the English Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict., ch. 42), § 1—defining the liability of employers for personal injury caused to their workmen "by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer"—the expression "works" must be taken to mean works already completed and not works in course of construction which are, on completion, to be connected with or used in the business of the employer. Howe v. Finch, 17 Q. B. Div. 187. See also the article WAYS.

Works—Charter of Railway.—A provision in the charter of a railway company providing that the "works hereby required" should be finished within ten years, does not restrict the right, also contained in the charter, to construct branch roads after the expiration of ten years; the "works required" were the building and equipping of the main stem. Blanton v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 86 Va. 618; 43 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 617.

Work or Supplies—Highest Bidder.—In Davies v. New York, 83 N. Y. 207, it was held that the renting of chambers for the city recorder did not fall within the provision requiring work or supplies to be let by contract to the lowest bidder.

So, the statute does not apply to a contract for carriage hire of aldermen or councilmen while engaged in public duties. Smith v. New York, 21 How. Pr. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 1.

Nor does it apply to professional services, for example, those of a surveyor in preparing a map. People v. Flagg, 5 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 232.

Working the Quarry.—The words "working the quarry," in a lease providing for forfeiture for "not working the quarry for a space of three successive months," include the work of removing water which has flooded the mine. Miller v. Chester Slate Co., 129 Pa. St. 81.

Working Hours—Charter Party.—This term, as used by a charter party, was construed in The Principia, 34 Fed. Rep. 667. The court said: "In the absence of special proof of some different meaning, the words of the contract must be construed in their ordinary sense. Twenty-four working hours in this view would mean those hours during which work was ordinarily done about the business to which the clause relates. If, for instance, it was the usual practice in this port to work day and night consecutively, during good weather, the words would be construed to mean consecutive hours during such weather. Holidays would be admitted or excluded, according as by usage they were deemed, or were not deemed, a ship's working hours in port. The burden of proof is upon the libelants to establish the fact that 'working hours' in this port means consecutive hours day and night; because, without that construction, the damage in this case, and the repairs on the ship, did not prevent the working of the steamer for so many as twenty-four working hours."

Wagon Work.—In Johnson v. Seymour, 19 Ind. 24, an action upon a note, payable in "wagon work," the court thus construes the term "wagon work": "The appellant argues that the 'wagon work' mentioned in the note should not be regarded in the light of specific articles, but as labor, and hence, that the plaintiff or holder of the note should have made some designation of the labor to be performed. Whether or not the conclusion would follow from the premises, we need not determine, as we cannot adopt the premises thus assumed. The terms 'wagon work,' as used in the note, unexplained by circumstances or otherwise, evidently do not mean labor, as hauling or otherwise, with a wagon or wagons; nor do they mean simply labor or work to be performed by the maker of the note in the construction of wagons. But they do mean, as we think, wagons, or, perhaps, parts of wagons; wagons either complete or incomplete, including both the materials and the labor bestowed upon them."

Work in the Sense of Duty.—In Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Bragonier, 119 Ill. 63, it was held that in an action involving the question of a brakeman's negligence, either party has the right to prove what were the customary and usual duties of brakemen. And where counsel proved what was termed the "work" of brakemen, the court said: "It may also be further remarked, in this same connection, that while plaintiff's counsel disclaimed any purpose to prove what were the customary or usual duties of brakemen on defendant's road, he was permitted to and did prove what was termed the 'work' of brakemen. The word 'work,' in the sense used, could mean nothing else than 'duty.' As used, the words are convertible terms, and obviously mean the same thing. Either party has the right to prove what were the customary and usual duties of brakemen, as to the inspection of the brakes, but that privilege was denied, by the rulings of the court, to defendant. In this there was error."

Exemption — Working Tools. — (See also TOOLS, vol. 26, p. 69.)

In the 8th section of the Rhode Island "act prescribing the forms of writs and the manner of serving them," which exempts from attachment, in favor of the housekeeper, "the working tools necessary for his usual occupation," to the value of fifty dollars, and, in favor of any debtor, "his working tools," to the same value, the same meaning is to be attached to the language in both instances, and should be construed to include not only such tools as are indispensably necessary to the mechanic, or even such as are in general use by individuals of the same craft, but also such as the individual in question has adopted to facilitate and diminish his labor, and not only working tools so called in the dictionary and by learned men, but such as are so called by the craft, such as the individual uses and has set apart as tools for the advantageous prosecution of his business. Healy v. Bateman, 2 R. I. 454.

A threshing machine is not exempt. The court said: "It is insisted by the plaintiff that this threshing machine is a 'working tool,' within the definition of that term as used by the act of 1842. That act has received a liberal construction from the courts. The word team has been held to embrace a buggy, wagon or gig used by a physician in his practice; a horse and cart used by a carman in his business; a single harness necessary in the business of the owner; and the single horse of a physician. (Wheeler v. Cropsey, 5 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 288; Lockwood v. Younglove, 27 Barb. (N. Y.) 505; Eastman v. Caswell, 8 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 75; Harthouse v. Rikers, 1 Duer (N. Y.) 606; Hutchinson v. Chamberlain, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 248.) And it is undoubtedly the duty of the court, since these acts 'concern the public good,' to give them an enlarged and liberal construction. (Carpenter v. Herrington, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 370; 37 Am. Dec. 239.) I have examined the question involved in this case, in the spirit of the rule laid down by the courts in the several cases cited, but have been unable to bring my mind to the conviction that the complicated machine described in the case is within the most liberal definition of the words 'working tools,' or that the legislature intended these words should have a signification broad enough to cover it. The common understanding of those words would never embrace such a machine. If the plaintiff were to sell to another all his working tools, by that description, it would not be thought by him or the purchaser that it included his threshing machine. The word 'tool' is never applied to such a machine. No lexicographer can be found who gives such a signification to the word, or defines it in any way that would justify its use in that sense. The courts, so far as I am able to find, have not enlarged the sense of those terms sufficiently to include the machine in question.

"In Buckingham v. Billings, 13 Mass. 82, it was held that a printing press was not a tool, and therefore not exempt under the statute of that state, which provided 'that the tools of any debtor, necessary for his trade or occupation, shall be altogether exempted from attachment and execution.'

"In Danforth v. Woodward, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 423; 20 Am. Dec. 531, it was held that printing types and forms were not tools, and were not exempt from attachment; and Wilde, J., said: 'The word tool is not understood, either in its strict meaning or popular use, as designating complicated machinery, which, in order to produce any useful effect, must be worked by combining distinct parts, or separate pieces, the aid of more hands than one being necessary to perform the operation.'

"In the case at bar, the machine required 'a horse power,' and the use of eight or ten horses and ten men, for its propulsion. Without all these it could be applied to no practical use, and would be valueless as a means to provide for the support of the plaintiff's family."

I. DEFINITION.—A working contract is one under which work or labor is to be performed in the erection, construction, or repairing of some edifice, structure or other work.¹

II. FORMATION OF THE CONTRACT—1. Generally.—In all contracts there must be a proposal and acceptance—an agreement of minds—and a valuable consideration.² The general principles

See CONTRACT, vol. 3, p. 825; Lloyd's Law of Building (2d ed.), § 1. General Contractor.—The term "general contractor" includes all persons furnishing materials for, or doing work upon, a building, under a contract made by such persons directly with the owner. Merchants', etc., Sav. Bank v. Dashiell, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 616.

2. Talmadge v. Spofford, 41 N. Y. Super. Ct. 428.

A promise by a building contractor to put another coat of oil on the inside of a house, made after he had fully complied with his contract, and without any additional consideration, is a mere gratuity; and his failure to put on the additional coat will not preclude touching the formation of contracts are treated elsewhere.¹ A mere bid in answer to an advertisement for proposals does not constitute a contract.² There must be an unconditional acceptance of the proposition as made, even an innocent mistake in the him from recovering the full amount due under the contract. Widiman v. Brown, 83 Mich. 241.

A contract by which a party building a house for his own occupancy upon land of another is to receive, on surrender of the house to the owner of the land, the cost of the materials used in its construction, is not void for want of consideration. Stevenson v. Robertson, 55 Iowa 689.

A joint contract was made by two persons to erect a church, at a certain price, which contract was by them abandoned. A contract was then made by one of the building committee, in his own right, with one of the contractors to erect said house, at the same price, and he to pay the additional actual cost, and it was held that this contract was founded on a good consideration, and would sustain an action. Morrison v. Heath, 11 Vt. 610.

Contractors to grade the roadbed of a certain railway, sublet a portion of the contract to one D., who was insolvent, and had taken the contract for less than cost. The contractors, finding the amount due for labor exceeded the estimates, and to prevent the filing of liens against the railway, which they had agreed to prevent, demanded and obtained from D. the pay rolls, and undertook to pay the hands employed by him. It was held that they were liable to the full amount of their wages to such hands, since the prevention of liens was a sufficient consideration for their agreement. Carlile v. Dauchy, 26 Neb. 337.

The agreement of a railroad construction company to commute its contract rate of compensation for finished work to a lower rate, because of the work not being completed as agreed, in consideration of which the other party consented to accept the work in its unfinished condition, afforded a sufficient consideration to sustain the stipulated reduction. Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, etc., Constr. Co. (Neb. 1894), 59 N. W. Rep. 838.

A mere schedule of prices for work and materials, signed by the parties, is not a written agreement to erect a building. Eyser v. Weissgerber, 2 Iowa 463.

Where one party to a contract at the time he executes it so conducts himself as to lead a reasonable man to believe that he understands and assents to its terms, and the other party, so believing, executes and performs it on his part, the former is precluded from asserting that he did not so understand and assent, and is bound by it. Phillip v. Gallant, 62 N. Y. 256.

Delivery of Contract.—Where the contract was signed and left with the architect, who held it for the benefit of both parties, it was held to be a sufficient delivery. Coey v. Lehman, 79 Ill. 177; Blanchard v. Blackstone, 102 Mass. 343.

2. Doyle v. Desenberg, 74 Mich. 79.

Advertising for bids is not an offer; it merely asks for offers, and does not agree to accept any. Howard v. Maine Industrial School, 78 Me. 230.

A person asking bids from contractors for the construction of a house, has a right to inquire into the fitness and skill of the respective bidders to fulfill the contract, and is not bound to award it to the lowest bidder. The fact that on the opening of the bids either the person letting the contract or his architect said to one of the bidders, "you are the lucky man," is merely a recognition that he is the lowest bidder, and is not equivalent to awarding the contract to him. Leskie v. Haseltine, 155 Pa. St. 98.

In an action for the breach of an alleged contract to accept the lowest bid for the construction of a brewery, the president of the defendant company testified that he informed the plaintiff that the company would not bind itself absolutely to accept the lowest bid, but that if it concluded to let out the work by contract it would accept the lowest bid. The plaintiff asserted positively that no reservation was made. His bid was for forty-one thousand dollars, but this sum did not include the cost of iron-work, which was estimated at twelve thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars. The testimony of the company's architect, which was corroborated by the president and one of the directors,

was that he had put in a bid for fifty-two thousand dollars, including their iron-work. It was held that a judgment for the defendant would be affirmed. Reusch v. American Brewing Assoc., 44 La. Ann. 1111.

A, a railway contractor, met B and several others, in order to receive tenders with reference to certain work. A read a specification with reference to the work; after which B and the others handed in their tenders. B's tender was signed with his name; but there was no evidence that it was in his handwriting. It was held, notwithstanding, that such tender, taken with the specification, sufficiently proved the contract. Allen v. Yoxall, 1 C. & K. 315.

1. Thus, a building committee advertised for proposals for labor and materials, as per plans and specifications, for the erection of a school-house. Certain parties proposed to do work for "forty-five hundred and fifty dollars," which the committee found to be the lowest bid, and awarded them the contract. The record of the committee showed, however, that the contract was awarded to them for "forty-five hundred and twenty-five dollars," and that it was "voted that the committee require a bond from the contractors to the amount of contract, for fulfillment; also forfeiture for delay in completing the work." Upon a controversy subsequently arising as to the erection of the building, it was held that no contract had ever existed between the parties. Howard v. Maine Industrial School, 78 Me. 230. And see Hughes v. Clyde, 41 Ohio St. 339.

A contract is completed upon an acceptance of the proposal and notice to the bidder. Highland County v. Rhoades, 26 Ohio St. 411.

Where a village advertised for bids for building a town hall according to plans and specifications, and the council ordered that the bid of plaintiff "be accepted and the job awarded to him," it was held that the acceptance of the bid gave to the bidder only a right to a contract embracing the stipulations expressed or implied in the records, or files relating to the improvement, including amongst them the notice, the plans and specifications, the bid and the resolution of acceptance. Hughes v. Clyde, 41 Ohio St. 339.

Where an engineer, with the approval of the county commissioners, advertised for sealed proposals for a certain improvement on the roads, and accepted the proposal of the lowest bidder, and notified him thereof, and afterwards tendered him a formal written contract for his signature, which contained certain stipulations not before named, it was held that the contractor was justified in refusing to sign it. Highland County v. Rhoades, 26 Ohio St. 411.

Where A proposed by letter to B to put the gutter of a mill "in proper shape," which B accepted, stating the proposal in his letter of acceptance to be "to repair and renew, so far as necessary, the gutter," it was held that the contract contained in the letters only required A to make such repairs and renewals that the gutter should do all that it was capable of doing, when in good condition, according to its original plan of construction, and not to build a new gutter of a different construction, even if the original plan was defective. Dwight v. Ludlow Mfg. Co., 128 Mass. 280.

In Bull v. Talcot, 2 Root (Conn.) 119; 1 Am. Dec. 62, where a written promise was made to pay a certain sum to such persons as should build a courthouse of a particular description, it was held that the plaintiffs, having erected the courthouse according to the proposals, were entitled to recover the sum proposed.

A contract for sinking wells recited that defendant called for proposals for bids for sinking "one or more" wells, and that plaintiff's assignors filed a bid to sink "said wells," and were awarded the contract for sinking "five wells." It provided that they should furnish material to complete "said five wells," that no payment was to be demanded on "any well" until it was sunk 200 feet, and that 25 per cent. of the price was to be detained until "each well" was completed, etc. It was held that the contract was for the sinking of five wells. Sandford v. East Riverside Irrigation Dist., 101 Cal. 275.

2. Burch v. New Lindell Hotel Co., 7 Mo. App. 583. In this case A was

A written contract, though signed by only one party, is valid, if acted upon by the other party and treated by him as binding.¹

Parties may be bound to a working contract through the action of a duly authorized committee;² but a majority of the committee must concur in making the contract.³

2. Parol Contracts.—Parol working contracts are perfectly valid and binding save where affected by the Statute of Frauds,⁴ though the most important classes of such contracts, such as building directed by B to do certain work which A had proposed to do on certain terms specified in his written bid. The work was done as directed, and it was held that A was entitled to recover according to the terms of his written proposal.

1. Where the contract, by which one party was to build a dam and the other to pay therefor in certain installments, was signed only by the first party, but it appeared that the other party had paid his installments as provided, and that both had acted upon the contract as binding, it was held that a finding of the district court that it had been executed and was binding on both parties, would not be disturbed. Reedy v. Smith, 42 Cal. 245. And see Methodist Episcopal Parish v. Clarke, 74 Me. 110. But the presumption which naturally arises from the failure of one party to sign, is that the contract has been entirely abandoned, and to overcome this presumption the party signing it should show that the other party in some way authorized or encouraged him to proceed with the work. Keller v. Blasdel, 1 Nev. 491.

2. Kerfoot v. Cromwell Mound Co., 115 Ill. 502.

3. Where one party, as a corporation, acts through a building committee, a majority of the committee must concur in making any contract, or in varying one already made. Howard v. Maine Industrial School, 78 Me. 230. But a majority of the committee may act. McNeil v. Boston Chamber of Commerce, 154 Mass. 277.

A major part of the committee is necessary to constitute a quorum, and the act of a majority of a quorum is the act of the committee. Damon v. Granby, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 345.

Where a contractor made and executed on his own part, an agreement under seal, to slate the roof of the plaintiffs' meetinghouse in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, and to warrant the same against leaking for ten years from the completion of the job, and the instrument was executed by only one of the plaintiffs' building committee of three, and there was never any vote authorizing the committee to enter into a contract under seal, but the plaintiffs paid the sum agreed to the defendant, and allowed it in the settlement of its treasurer's accounts, it was held that the defendant was liable for any breach of his covenants, notwithstanding the contract was not so executed by the plaintiffs in the outset as to enable him to maintain an action of covenant against them thereon, and that he could not take exceptions to instructions authorizing the jury to find that the plaintiffs had ratified the contract, and made it a valid and binding contract between the parties, if their acts and doings satisfied the jury that such was their intention. Methodist Episcopal Parish v. Clarke, 74 Me. 110.

4. Central Lunatic Asylum v. Flanagan, 80 Va. 110. A building contract need not be in writing, although the contractor may, at his option, perform the agreement after the expiration of one year. It is only where it appears by the whole tenor of the agreement that it is to be performed after the year that a note in writing is required. Plimpton v. Curtiss, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 336. See Baughart v. Flummerfelt, 43 N. J. L. 28. And see FRAUDS, STATUTE OF, vol. 8, p. 685; Talmadge v. Spofford, 41 N. Y. Super. Ct. 428.

Where a contract is to be reduced to writing, it is not binding upon the parties until reduced to writing and signed by them. Congdon v. Darcy, 46 Vt. 478.

A parol promise by defendant to pay for the lumber which had been furnished a contractor and used in the construction of his house, if the plaintiff would not file a statutory lien, is a promise to answer for the debt of another, and void under the Statute of Frauds. Clark v. Jones, 85 Ala. 127. And so much the more when the and construction contracts, are usually made in writing.¹ Where the consideration of a working contract is the conveyance of land, it must be in writing or it will be void under the statute,² though promise is to pay if the principal contractor does not. Warner v. Willoughby, 60 Conn. 468.

So, also, is a promise by the owner, after the work has been completed, to see that the workmen of a subcontractor are paid. Dirringer v. Moynihan (C. Pl.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 540. And see Preston v. Zekind, 84 Mich. 641.

An instruction to the effect that if the jury find from the evidence that the agreement "was a mere guaranty to answer for the debt of another previously incurred, such a guaranty is a collateral contract, and within the Statute of Frauds," is not rendered erroneous by the insertion of the words in italics. Stoelker v. Chicago Bldg. Supply Co., 22 Ill. App. 625.

But if, during the progress of the work, the supply of lumber is about to stop because the contractor is not considered safe, and the owner of the building procures its continuance by promising to pay the bill, his undertaking is not collateral but original, and he will be bound thereby. Sext v. Geise, 80 Ga. 698; Yeoman v. Mueller, 33 Mo. App. 343; Parkes v. Stafford (Supreme Ct.), 16 N. Y. Supp. 756; Bayles v. Wallace (Supreme Ct.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 191. And see Wiggins v. Guthrie, 101 N. Car. 661; Holmes v. Shands, 26 Miss. 639.

In Indiana, it is held that where a specific lien or substantial benefit is surrendered upon an express promise by a third person to pay for the materials furnished, or work done, the promise is an original undertaking, and not within the statute. Parker v. Dillingham, 129 Ind. 542; Luark v. Malone, 34 Ind. 444; Spooner v. Dunn, 7 Ind. 81; 63 Am. Dec. 414; and see the dissenting opinion of Stone, C. J., in Clark v. Jones, 85 Ala. 127.

A verbal promise by the owner to the contractor, before the completion of the house, to pay the outstanding claims of laborers and material men, if the contractor will surrender the contract, is supported by a sufficient consideration, and is not within the statute. But if the contractor has already abandoned the contract, and there is nothing due him, the promise is without consideration, and will not support an action against the owner by such laborers and material men. Clark v. Jones, 85 Ala. 127.

In Parker v. Dillingham, 129 Ind. 542, it is said that a verbal agreement by the owner of the property to pay the debt of a contractor to the material man, in a case where the owner owes the contractor nothing, is within the Statute of Frauds, and void, even where, by reason of such verbal promise, the material man furnished the materials, completed the improvements, and forbore to file his lien within the allotted time; but that if the owner was indebted to the contractor, his agreement to pay for the materials will in such case be an agreement to pay his own debt to a third person, and is not within the statute.

Recording.—A contract between the owner of land and one agreeing to construct a building thereon for him is void, if not filed for record as provided for by California Code Civ. Proc., § 1183, and therefore it follows that no recovery can be had for damages for prevention of performance of such a contract, which has not been recorded. Palmer v. White, 70 Cal. 220.

Burden of Proof.—The burden of proof is upon the party setting up an informal contract, to show that both parties acted upon it. Lloyd on Building and Buildings (2d ed.), § 2.

1. "Building agreements are almost invariably reduced to writing. Great care should always be exercised in the preparation of these contracts. The contingencies to be provided for, the technicalities of many branches of the builder's trade, and the numerous stipulations as to quantities and qualities of materials, as to extras, alterations, etc., are confusing, besides which there are many important factors apt to be overlooked." Lloyd's Law of Building and Buildings (2d ed.), § 3.

In an action for work done on a building, where defendant pleads a special contract in writing, and full performance under it, and plaintiff claims to recover on a verbal contract, and the evidence is conflicting as to whether the contract was verbal or in writing, the question is for the jury. Jones v. Sherman, 34 Neb. 452.

2. Where plaintiffs entered into a a parol promise to pay for work and improvements upon land is not within the statute.¹ After the partial performance of a parol contract the parties may reduce it to writing, thereby merging the parol contract in the written one;² and the written contract may be waived and a parol agreement substituted.³

3. Contracts with Corporations.—A corporation, if acting within the legitimate scope of the purposes of its institution, may enter into working contracts,⁴ and will be bound by such contracts made by its authorized agents, whether in writing or by parol;⁵ but one entering into a contract with a corporation should see to it that the work to be performed is within the province of the corporation, or can be reasonably implied from its charter,⁶ that parol agreement to prepare the plans of a building for defendants, and to superintend its construction, in consideration of the conveyance of a certain lot, it was held void under the Statute of Frauds. Koch v. Williams, 82 Wis. 186.

Where labor is performed under an agreement that it shall be applied to the purchase price of land which the employer agrees to convey, or where, after the performance of the work, it is agreed that the amount due therefor shall be applied on the purchase price, if the employer fails or refuses to convey the land, the servant must sue for the breach or to enforce the performance of the special agreement, and cannot maintain an action to recover payment for the work done. Cameron v. Austin, 65 Wis. 652. If, however, the workman enters into possession of the land under the contract and makes improvements, and the amount due for his work is applied to the purchase price, the contract will be enforced. Cameron v. Austin, 65 Wis. 652.

1. Improvements upon land, distinct from the title or possession, are not an interest in the land within the meaning of the statute. They are only another name for the work and labor bestowed on the land, and a parol promise to pay for the work already done or to be done upon the land never has been held to come within the statute. Lower v. Winters, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 263; Frear v. Hardenbergh, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 272; 4 Am. Dec. 356; Benedict v. Beebee, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 145; Scoggin v. Slater, 22 Ala. 687; Thouvenin v. Lea, 26 Tex. 612. See also Keyser v. School Dist. No. 8, 35 N. H. 477; Clark v. Shultz, 4 Mo. 235; FRAUDS, STATUTES OF, vol. 8, p. 698.

2. Cable v. Foley, 45 Minn. 421.

3. A written contract may be annulled and a parol one substituted. Lawall v. Rader, 24 Pa. St. 283; Church v. Florence Iron Works, 45 N. J. L. 129; Cooke v. Murphy, 70 Ill. 96.

The right to contract includes the right to modify, change, or abrogate a preëxisting contract; therefore, any contract not under seal, whether in writing or verbal, may, by a subsequent verbal contract, be annulled or changed, and the last contract, if supported by a consideration, will bind the parties. Bishop v. Busse, 69 Ill. 403.

Where a contract has been reduced to writing, a party thereto is not authorized to rely upon the statements of the agent of the other party to the contract, varying or modifying its terms. Grimes v. Simpson Centenary College, 48 Iowa 208.

4. Barry v. Merchants' Exch. Co., 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 280.

5. Columbia Bank v. Patterson, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 299. Where the charter of a company provides that all contracts and engagements must be entered into under seal, no recovery can be had upon a contract not under seal. Crampton v. Varna R. Co., L. R., 7 Ch. 562. And see Frend v. Dennett, 4 Jur. N. S. 897.

6. Lloyd's Law of Building and Buildings (2d ed.), § 5; Chicago v. Shober, etc., Lithographing Co., 6 Ill. App. 560. And see CORPORATIONS (PRIVATE), vol. 4, p. 184; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, vol. 15, p. 1080. Every one dealing with corporations must be taken to know what are their powers of contracting, and must make a contract accordingly. Crampton v. Varna R. Co., L. R., 7 Ch. 568.

One contracting with a city through its officers, is bound at his peril to take it has been duly authorized,¹ and that its representative, with whom he executes the contract, is acting within the scope of his authority.² If the work is a public one, he should also see that notice of their powers, and also of the legality of its ordinances. Keating v. Kansas City, 84 Mo. 415.

Where a corporation has the right, under its charter, to make all contracts necessary for the erection of a specified building, it has the power to accept for payment an order in favor of a material man, drawn by the contractor for the erection of the building, payable out of the money due the latter by the corporation. Prairie Lodge v. Smith, 58 Miss. 301.

1. Where work is ordered by the corporate authorities, it must be shown that the order was regularly adopted with proper formalities, and the authority of a board of county commissioners cannot be shown by proving the separate individual assent of the members of the board. Eigemann v. Posey County, 82 Ind. 413; Campbell v. Brackenridge, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 471; Archer v. Allen County, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 501. But in order to make a private corporation liable upon a working contract it is not necessary to show an express resolution passed at a meeting of the directors. Cunningham v. Massena Springs, etc., R. Co., 63 Hun (N. Y.) 439.

If a paving contract with a city is void through a defect in the ordinance, there can be no right of action against the city. Keating v. Kansas City, 84 Mo. 415. And see Baltimore v. Eschbach, 18 Md. 276, where it was held that a paving contract made by the city commissioner upon the application of the owners of a majority of feet fronting on a street not formally condemned, was invalid, and that no action could be maintained against the city by the contractor.

Where Congress authorizes the secretary of the treasury to erect a building, but expressly limits the cost to a fixed amount, and the whole of that amount is paid to one contractor, he cannot charge the defendant with any further liability. A contractor doing all the work under such a statute is chargeable with notice of the restriction set upon the cost of the building by Congress, and cannot set up a breach of contract which will, in effect, do away with the restriction. Trenton Locomotive, etc., Mfg. Co. v. U. S., 12 Ct. of Cl. 147.

2. Chicago v. Shober, etc., Lithographing Co., 6 Ill. App. 560; and see Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Worthington (Ala. 1893), 10 So. Rep. 839; Travers v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 329; Thompson v. U. S., 9 Ct. of Cl. 187; Southworth v. Flanders, 33 La. Ann. 190.

A person contracting for the construction of a building, with a committee appointed by a town to procure plans and estimates for a public schoolhouse, and to contract for the erection of the building, is bound to take notice of a limitation on their power, and where the cost is limited to fifty-five thousand dollars, the committee has no power by its contract to render the town liable for a larger sum. Turney v. Bridgeport, 55 Conn. 412. And one contracting with a city commissioner to build a jail, in pursuance of a resolution of the mayor and city council, must see to it that the commissioner does not exceed the powers granted him by the resolution. Baltimore v. Reynolds, 20 Md. 1; 53 Am. Dec. 535.

The authority of the president of a corporation will not be presumed. Ashuelot Mfg. Co. v. Marsh, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 507; Lyndon Mill Co. v. Lyndon Literary, etc., Inst., 63 Vt. 581. In this last case it was held that the president of the defendant literary and biblical institution had no authority, either from the corporation or its trustees, to bind it by a purchase of materials for repairs of its building.

Where a county board, by resolution, directed a party to build so much of the dome of a courthouse being erected as was necessary to inclose the building, under the architect's supervision and subject to his valuation of the same, it was held that the architect, under such resolution, had authority only to supervise the work directed to be done and make a schedule of prices for the same, and that any order of his for work outside of the terms of the resolution was not binding on the county. Sexton v. Cook County, 114 Ill. 174.

In McNeil v. Boston Chamber of Commerce, 154 Mass. 277, a building committee of five, appointed by the defendant's directors to procure plans and specifications and to make all contracts for the erection of a building subject to the directors' approval, sent, to selected builders, plans and specifications, with a "notice to builders" attached, containing the terms of the bidding, and reserving the right to reject any and all bids. All the builders save one declined to submit bids, and a conference was held between them and four members of the committee. There was evidence, which was contradicted, that among other changes the committee orally agreed to accept the lowest bid, in case the building was erected substantially in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted, without reserving the right to reject bids in that case, and that the fifth member subsequently consented to the agreement. There was also evidence that the committee assumed to make changes in the terms of the competition at its own will, and that the directors, though informed of their proceedings and holding monthly meetings as a board, did not object to their action, nor inform the bidders that they could not safely deal with the committee. It was held that a finding was warranted that such an oral agreement, varying the terms of the notice to bidders, was entered into by the committee, and that such an agreement was within their ostensible authority, and was valid.

all statutory requirements have been complied with.¹ The representative of the corporation should be careful not to sign the

A committee chosen by a town "to procure a master builder and superintend the building of a meetinghouse for the town," and with authority to borrow money if necessary, has the power to make contracts for the building where no special committee is appointed for that purpose. Damon v. Granby, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 345.

Where the contractor for the construction of a county building abandons his contract after a material portion of the work has been performed, a board of county commissioners has incidental power to take charge of the work and complete the building without adopting new plans, and specifications or making a new contract, and the county is liable for money, labor, or materials furnished at the request of the board and used in the construction of the building; but the board has no power to assume any indebtedness of the contractor for materials furnished to him, and for such indebtedness the county cannot be made liable. Bass Foundry, etc., Works v. Parke County, 115 Ind. 234.

Legislative ratification of a contract can be shown only by some action of both houses, by statute or resolution, and appropriations of money for the prosecution of a public work will not be deemed a ratification of engagements entered into by the commissioners in charge of it, merely because the engagements are set forth in previous reports of their doings, made by the commissioners to the governor or to the legislature. Shipman v. State, 42 Wis. 377.

1. Thus, where a city charter provided that contracts for certain work should be subjected to a public competition, and given to the lowest bidder, it is a violation of the statute if the bids are tested by a comparison which omits a substantial part of the work to be contracted for, since the lowest bidder by that means cannot be ascertained, and no recovery can be had upon a contract entered into under such circumstances. Brady v. New York, 20 N. Y. 312, aff'd 2 Bosw. (N. Y.) 173.

Where the plaintiff entered into a contract with the commissioner of public works, for laying water pipes in the city of New York, and performed work and furnished materials thereunder, and the contract was not founded upon sealed bids or proposals, made in compliance with public notice, as required, New York Laws of 1870, ch. 133, § 104, the contract was held void. Greene v. New York, 3 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 753; 1 Hun (N. Y.) 24.

Where public agents are required to let public work to the lowest responsible bidders, upon notice of the work or material required, such notice should give all the necessary information to enable the parties desiring to bid to make estimates. Resort cannot be allowed to merely verbal explanations to ascertain substantially all that is contemplated to be done, as that might lead to favoritism, or other mischief intended to be avoided by the statute. Littler v. Jayne, 124 Ill. 123.

Where the contract is with a state for the construction of a building or other public work, the state stands in the same position as an individual, and contract in such a manner as to render himself personally liable,¹ though even if the contract is so executed as to bind the representative personally, or is one which he has no authority to make, may at any time abandon the enterprise and refuse to allow the contractor to proceed, or it may assume control and do the work embraced in the contract by its own immediate servants and agents, or enter into a new contract for its performance by other persons, without reference to the contract previously made, although there has been no default on the part of the contractor. The state, in such case, would violate the contract, but the obligation of the contract would not be impaired by its refusal to perform it, and it cannot be compelled to proceed with the prosecution of the work at the instance of the contractor; the latter would have a just claim against the state for any damages sustained by him from the breach of the contract, and, although the claim could not be enforced through an action at law, he would have the remedy by appealing to the legislature, which can, and it must be presumed will, do whatever justice may require. Lord v. Thomas, 64 N. Y. 107.

Where all municipal contracts are required to be in writing, all variations of such contracts must also be in writing. Malone v. Philadelphia, 147 Pa. St. 416.

1. Merely affixing his official title after his signature, is not sufficient to relieve him from personal liability. In Sharp v. Smith, 32 Ill. App. 336, certain school directors entered into a contract for the erection of a school-house, and in the body of the contract described themselves as "Directors of District No. 2," and in signing the contract simply wrote "Directors" after their names. They were held personally liable.

Where the contract read, "We, the undersigned, a committee chosen by the town of A to finish the basement of their town house, do hereby agree to pay," etc., for the finishing of said basement, and was signed and sealed by the committee as "A committee for the town," it was held to be a contract of the individuals who signed it and not the contract of the town. Fullam v. West Brookfield, 9 Allen (Mass.) 1.

A contract, not under seal, purporting to be a "specification for building a town way in A," and providing that the same be to the "acceptance of the road commissioners of A," together with a provision, appended thereto, that "the subscribers, road commissioners aforesaid, agree to pay to C. the price," etc., signed "M., W., commissioners of A," was held to be the contract of the town of A. Cutler v. Ashland, 121 Mass. 588.

Where individuals subscribed their proper names to a promissory note given in payment of building materials, it was held that prima facie they were personally liable, although they added a description of the character in which the note was signed as "Trustees of Baptist Society," but that such presumption of liability might be rebutted by proof that the note was in fact given by the makers as agents of the corporation for a debt of the corporation due the payee, and that they were duly authorized to make such note as agents of the corporation; and that such facts might be pleaded in bar of an action against the makers personally, averring knowledge on the part of the payee. Brockway v. Allen, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 40.

Where a corporation duly appointed certain parties its building committee, and authorized them to contract for materials for erecting a building in which to conduct its business, who entered into a written contract under their respective hands and seals, describing themselves therein as the "building committee," and signing it as such, for the purchase of a quantity of brick, it was held that the corporation was liable on the contract, notwithstanding the seals of the defendants were affixed thereto. Haight v. Sahler, 30 Barb. (N. Y.) 218. And see, to the same effect, Randall v. Van Vechten, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 60; 10 Am. Dec. 193; Dubois v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 285; Damon v. Granby, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 345.

In Randall v. Van Vechten, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 60; 10 Am. Dec. 193, it is said that there is a distinction between the contracts of public agents, who assume to act on behalf of the government, and the contracts of private agents, who represent individual persons or corporations; that, in the first case, although the government cannot be sued, yet the

if it is for the exclusive use and benefit of the corporation, and the latter subsequently recognizes the contract as existing, and accepts the benefit thereof, it may be held responsible.¹

One contracting with an unincorporated religious association should remember that it cannot be sued.²

4. Implied Contracts.—Where one party requests another to perform certain work, or even, without such request, stands by and sees him working and accepts the benefit of his labor, the law will raise an implied contract on his part to pay for it.³ But where agent is not personally liable, the public faith being the only security; but that in the latter, the person who assumes to contract as agent for an individual or a corporation, must see to it that his principal is legally bound by his act, for if he does not give a right of action against his principal, the law holds him personally liable.

1. Columbia Bank v. Patterson, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 299; Randall v. Van Vechten, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 60; 10 Am. Dec. 193; Haight v. Sahler, 30 Barb. (N. Y.) 218; Bass Foundry, etc., Works v. Parke County, 115 Ind. 244; Bicknell v. Widner School Tp., 73 Ind. 501; Wallis v. Johnson School Tp., 75 Ind. 368; Clark v. Cuckfield Union, 1 B. C. C. 81; 16 Jur. 686. And see infra, this section, Implied Contracts.

Where a party does work or furnishes materials to a corporation under a contract with one assuming to act as its agent, with the knowledge of its officers and without dissent on its part, the corporation will be held to ratify the contract. Cunningham v. Massena Springs, etc., R. Co., 63 Hun (N. Y.) 439.

Where a corporation, having the power to contract for the erection of a certain building, has made the contract for such purpose, and received the benefit thereof by the erection of the building, it cannot avoid its liability in an action for money due upon such contract, by showing that the provision of its charter authorizing the erection of the building is invalid. Prairie Lodge v. Smith, 58 Miss. 301.

Where the president of a corporation ordered materials for repairs upon the understanding of the trustees that he was to furnish them as a gratuity, the fact that the corporation received and used them will not of itself make it liable as upon an implied contract. Lyndon Mill Co. v. Lyndon Literary, etc., Inst., 63 Vt. 581.

2. A religious society which is not incorporated according to law, or which has not recorded its name and objects as provided by Georgia Code, § 2347, cannot be sued as such on a working contract. Wilkins v. St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal Church, 52 Ga. 351.

Religious societies incorporated under the provisions of the Illinois Rev. Stats. 1845, and the Act of 1855, relating to such bodies, can only be reached by a suit through their trustees. Ada St. M. E. Church v. Garnsey, 66 Ill. 132.

Where a religious society contracts for the erection of a church, and the names of its members are stated in the body of the instrument, but one of them does not sign it, the one failing to sign cannot be held liable under the agreement, as merely stating his name in the body of the instrument does not make him a party to the contract. Thomas v. Caldwell, 50 Ill. 138.

In Wilkins v. St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal Church, 52 Ga. 351, it is said that the members of an unincorporated congregation may be charged as joint promissors, contracting through an agent, or as partners contracting in a firm name.

3. Blount v. Guthrie, 99 N. Car. 93; Holmes v. Shands, 26 Miss. 639; Reiser v. Stauer, 73 Wis. 477; Gilman v. Gard, 29 Ind. 291. And see Brady v. New York, 20 N. Y. 312; Tebbetts v. Haskins, 16 Me. 283.

Evidence that defendants knew that plaintiff was doing work under an incomplete contract, and made no objection, is admissible as tending to show that the parties intended such contract to be complete. Hodges v. Sublett, 91 Ala. 588.

In Hazard Powder Co. v. Loomis, 2 Disney (Ohio) 544, it was held that where a builder, or material man, has begun to furnish work or materials toward the erection or repair of a building without any agreement as to the amount of material or duration of his one enters upon another's land without color of right, and employment, but under a reasonable expectation that further work or material will be required of him to finish the undertaking, and he is afterward called upon, from time to time, to furnish the same until the building is completed, he may recover therefor as though acting under an original contract for the entire labor or materials so furnished.

If a person requests another to perform work for him, without specifying the compensation, or if he stands by and allows the work to be done by another, who is acting in good faith, and afterwards takes possession of the work, and converts it to his own use, he is liable on a quantum meruit. Thomas v. Walnut Land, etc., Co., 43 Mo. App. 653.

The employing of a professional person implies an undertaking to remunerate him, but the inference may be rebutted by circumstances. Manson v. Baillie, 2 Macq. H. L. Cas. 80.

In Holmes v. Shands, 26 Miss. 639, it was held that where material or labor was bestowed by contract with a third party and on his account, such third person being under contract with the owner of the property to do the work and furnish the materials, there was no liability on the part of the owner of the property but to the party with whom he contracted. And see Reed v. Baggott, 5 Ill. App. 257; Walker v. Brown, 28 Ill. 378; 81 Am. Dec. 287.

Where the owner discharged the builder for drunkenness before the plumbing work was done, and the plumber, who had made the subcontract with the builder to do the plumbing of the house, went on with his work, and when it was done sued the owner for the price, and it was proved that the owner had seen the work going on and given some directions about it, it was held that the jury, if they found the facts warranted it, might require the owner to pay the plumber at least the value of the work done by him after the discharge of the builder, and this although it seemed that money enough to pay the plumber under his subcontract had been paid over to the builder. Blount v. Guthrie, 99 N. Car. 93.

Where work is done under the direction of an agent, who has authority to direct its performance, it is immaterial whether he agrees to pay what it is reasonably worth, as the law will imply such a promise. Henderson Bridge Co. v. McGrath, 134 U. S. 260.

Where one, by fraudulently representing himself to be the owner of land, induces another to bestow labor upon it in the expectation of enjoying the property as a joint owner, the party performing the work may, upon the discovery of the fraud, abandon the contract and recover the value of the work done on the common count of indebitatus assumpsit. The law will imply a promise to pay for the labor. Rickard v. Stanton, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 25. And see Rumsey v. North Eastern R. Co., 32 L. J. C. P. 244.

Where a written contract, for work and materials in erecting a building, is void because not recorded as required by the California Code of Civ. Proc., § 1183, the one performing such labor and furnishing such materials may maintain an action on an implied contract for the value thereof. Rebman v. San Gabriel Valley Land, etc., Co., 95 Cal. 390. And it has been held that where the plaintiffs have rendered services under a contract, void under the Statute of Frauds, they may recover the value thereof upon a quantum meruit. Cadman v. Markle, 76 Mich. 448; Wonsettler v. Lee, 40 Kan. 367; Koch v. Williams, 82 Wis. 186; Springer v. Bien (C. Pl.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 530. But see M'Corkle v. Doby, 1 Strobb. (S. Car.) 396; 47 Am. Dec. 560.

United States Rev. Stat., § 3744, provides that the secretary of the interior shall cause all contracts made by him on behalf of the government to be reduced to writing, which shall be then signed by him; yet, although, in such case, a parol agreement enlarging the quantity of work required by the contract is not obligatory on the government, if the work be actually done thereunder, a recovery may be had upon an implied assumpsit. Wilson v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 77.

In a suit to recover for work done on a public street, defendant, an abutting owner, testified that he never authorized the work. It was held that the fact that he saw the work going on upon the street without further protest raised no implied promise or liability to pay for it. Nagle v. McMurray, 84 Cal. 539.

performs work, and makes improvements thereon, he cannot recover therefor, even though the owner subsequently promises to pay him;¹ nor can any recovery be had from a party for labor or services voluntarily performed without his privity or request, however meritorious or beneficial they may be.²

III. TENDERS—1. Definition.—A tender is a formal offer to undertake the performance of certain work for a price named, either directly or indirectly referring to some announcement or proposal requesting such offer.³

2. Acceptance of Tender.—Upon the acceptance of the tender, a binding contract results;⁴ but the acceptance must be before the tender is withdrawn and in the terms offered.⁵ After acceptance the tender cannot be withdrawn.⁶ If the tender is conditional, the completion of the contract is delayed until the condition is complied with.⁷

1. There is neither legal nor moral obligation on the part of the owner to pay for the work and labor done upon his land by one who has entered without consent, or under color of right, and held possession against him. Frear v. Hardenbergh, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 272; 4 Am. Dec. 356.

2. Such as saving his property from fire, or from water, securing boats astray, etc. Bartholomew v. Jackson, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 28; 11 Am. Dec. 237; Sheldon v. Sherman, 42 Barb. (N. Y.) 372; Binstead v. Buck, 2 W. Bl. 1117; 1 Esp. 86; 1 M. & S. 290. And see White v. Jones, 14 La. Ann. 692.

3. Lloyd's Law of Buildings (2d ed.), § 56.

The notice soliciting tenders should give all the necessary information to enable parties desiring to bid to make estimates. Little v. Jayne, 124 Ill. 123.

4. Great Northern R. Co. v. Witham, L. R., 9 C. P. 16. But an unaccepted proposal is not a contract. Forster v. Ulman, 64 Md. 523.

A contract for the construction of a road improvement at the expense of a county was awarded, under advertisement for sealed proposals, to R., as the lowest bidder, and the county commissioners notified him of their acceptance of his bid. It was held that the contract was then complete. Highland County v. Rhoades, 26 Ohio St. 411. But in Hughes v. Clyde, 41 Ohio St. 339, it was held that the acceptance of a legally made bid for a proposed building, did not, in itself, constitute a contract, but entitled the bidder to one in accordance with the proposals.

The acceptance of a bid made under an advertisement for sealed proposals for constructing a public work, if the bid is regularly made, and is the lowest one, creates a vested right to the contract, of which the bidder cannot be deprived by subsequent legislation, without compensation. Matter of the Protestant Episcopal School, 58 Barb. (N. Y.) 161; 40 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 139.

5. A mere bid, in answer to an advertisement for proposals, does not constitute a contract. Howard v. Maine Industrial School, 78 Me. 230.

Where, after the acceptance of a tender, the formal written contract, tendered to the contractor for signature, contained stipulations not in the advertisement and proposal and records, etc., relating to the improvement—in particular, a provision that the grade or line might be changed in a certain contingency—the contractor was held entitled to refuse to sign it. Highland County v. Rhoades, 26 Ohio St. 411.

Where a bid was made for certain work, and subsequently the bidder signed an agreement which covered the terms of the bid, with some additional provisions, the bid was held merged in the subsequent agreement. Taylor v. Fox, 16 Mo. App. 527.

6. Lewis v. Brass, 3 Q. B. Div. 667.

7. Howard v. Maine Industrial School, 78 Me. 230.

An intimation, in the written acceptance of a tender, that a contract will be afterwards prepared, does not render the acceptance conditional and prevent the parties from becoming bound to perform the terms in the tender and acceptance respectively mentioned, if the intention of the parties was thereby

3. Rights of Lowest Bidder.—There is no obligation upon a party requesting bids for the construction of work to accept the lowest bid tendered; he may consider the responsibility of the bidder, his judgment, skill, etc.,¹ and a request for bids often reserves the right to reject any and all bids.² But where public work is required to be let to the lowest responsible bidder, after advertisement for bids, a contract not so entered into is void.³ The term "responsible," in such cases, is used in a broader sense than mere pecuniary responsibility, and has reference to the skill, ability, and integrity of the one making the tender, and as to which bidder would be the most likely to do faithful, conscientious work, and to fulfill the terms of the contract.⁴ Where the tender is made to a building committee for the construction of some public work, the powers of the committee in deciding upon the responsibility of the bidder are deliberative and discretionary, and mandamus will not lie to compel a modification of their decision, even though erroneous, in the absence of clear proof of fraud or bad to enter into an agreement, and if the preparation of the contract was contemplated merely for the purpose of expressing the agreement already arrived at in formal language. Lewis v. Brass, 3 Q. B. Div. 667.

1. State v. Board of Education, 42 Ohio St. 374. And see Spencer v. Harding, L. R., 5 C. P. 561.

In Doyle v. Desenberg, 74 Mich. 79, the plaintiff sued for damages caused by the failure of defendants to carry out an alleged contract for the erection of a building for them by the plaintiff, alleging that he was the lowest bidder, and that there was an agreement that he should have the job. Defendants denied the employment or any agreement with plaintiff. The evidence showed no definite agreement; that plaintiff's bid was an unsigned memorandum, without reference to any building and without names of parties or specifications, and no mutuality of obligation was shown. It was held that the court properly ordered a verdict for defendants.

2. State v. Board of Education, 42 Ohio St. 374.

3. Littler v. Jayne, 124 Ill. 123.

If the lowest bidder for a contract for erecting public buildings, under 66 Ohio Laws 52, fails to give bond within a reasonable time, the right to the contract passes to the next lowest bidder, upon condition of his giving bond within a reasonable time. State v. Licking County, 26 Ohio St. 531.

4. Com. v. Mitchell, 82 Pa. St. 343; Hoole v. Kinkead, 16 Nev. 217.

One is not to be deemed a responsible bidder because he offers adequate security for the performance of the contract. He must be able to respond or answer in accordance with what is expected or demanded of him. People v. Dorsheimer, 55 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 118.

In Com. v. Mitchell, 82 Pa. St. 343, the court said: "It is scarcely open to doubt but that the word under consideration (responsible), as it is used in the statute, means something more than pecuniary ability. In a contract, such as the one in controversy, the work must be promptly, faithfully, and well done—it must, or ought to, be conscientious work; to do such work requires prompt, skillful and faithful men. A dishonest contractor may impose work upon the city, in spite of the utmost caution of the superintending engineer, apparently good, and even capable of bearing its duty for a time, which in the end may prove to be a total failure and worse than useless. Granted that from such a contractor pecuniary damages may be recovered by an action at law, this is, at best, but a last resort that often produces more vexation than profit—a mere patch upon a bad job; an exceedingly meager compensation, at best, for the delay and incalculable damage resulting to a great city from the want of a competent supply of water. The city requires honest work, not lawsuits. Were we to accept the interpretation insisted upon by the relators, the difference of a single dollar, in a bid for the most important con-faith.¹ All bids must substantially conform to the proposals made.²

4. Agreements to Stifle Competition in Bids.—An agreement between intending bidders to stifle competition in bids is against public policy and void,³ and if it results in the letting of the contract at an unreasonable price, the party defrauded may repudiate the contract and recover damages.⁴

tract, might determine the question in favor of some unskillful rogue as against an upright and skillful mechanic."

1. Com. v. Mitchell, 82 Pa. St. 343; Hoole v. Kinkead, 16 Nev. 217; Weed v. Beach, 56 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 470; People v. Contracting Board, 27 N. Y. 378. In State v. Board of Education, 42 Ohio St. 374, it is said: "If the lowest responsible bid be rejected, and any other be accepted, the action of the board may be controlled by mandamus without violating the rule that a matter of discretion is not subject to control by proceedings in mandamus. In order to entitle the relator to the relief prayed for, however, he must show a clear legal right in himself."

2. Weed v. Beach, 56 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 470. But in this case it was held further that where state officers have endeavored to obtain bids in a certain form and failed, they are at liberty, as against such faulty bidders, to examine all bids, and, according to their best judgment, award the contract to the lowest bidder.

3. People v. Lord, 6 Hun (N. Y.) 390; People v. Stephens, 71 N. Y. 527; Woodworth v. Bennett, 43 N. Y. 273; 3 Am. Rep. 706; Gulick v. Ward, 10 N. J. L. 87; 18 Am. Dec. 389.

Thus, where, in the case of a letting of work on a canal, certain persons agreed for a consideration of four hundred dollars, paid by a higher bidder, to withdraw their bids, the court held the agreement illegal, and refused to enforce a division of the four hundred dollars among the parties. Woodworth v. Bennett, 43 N. Y. 273; 3 Am. Rep. 706. And where the postmaster general had given notice of proposals for conveying the mail, and the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiffs, who intended to make proposals, one thousand dollars if they would not bid, the agreement was held illegal. Gulick v. Ward, 10 N. J. L. 87; 18 Am. Dec. 389.

But where two bidders for a public improvement agreed to become partners in doing the work in the event that the contract should be awarded to either of them, and that any benefit derived from the contract should inure to the firm, and the one to whom the work was awarded refused to perform it in partnership, and assigned the contract to a stranger for a valuable consideration, it was held that the agreement was valid, it not appearing that the intent, effect or necessary tendency of the contract was to stifle fair competition at the letting. Breslin v. Brown, 24 Ohio St. 565; 15 Am. Rep. 627. And see Whalen v. Brennan, 34 Neb. 129.

But see Atcheson v. Mallon, 43 N. Y. 147; 3 Am. Rep. 678, where an agreement between two bidders on a public work, whereby it was agreed that if the contract should be awarded to either, both should share equally in the profits, if any, and contribute equally to the losses, was held to be void as against public policy, although it did not appear that such agreement did really produce any result detrimental to the public interest.

4. People v. Lord, 6 Hun (N. Y.) 390; People v. Stephens, 71 N. Y. 527.

Where, however, the contracting board, having full power to act and reject proposals, in case they deem them disadvantageous, with full knowledge of all the facts, adjudges a proposal not excessive in price or disadvantageous, and accepts it and enters into a contract in pursuance thereof, in the absence of any evidence that the board acted corruptly or in bad faith, the contract will be held binding, and an action cannot be maintained to recover damages for an illegal combination. People v. Stephens, 71 N. Y. 527.

Substitution of Bidder.—An agreement whereby A is to enter into and perform a contract with the state for the construction of a swamp land state road, and to give B, who, at the public letting of the work, under the statute, had been the lowest bidder, as a bonus for being allowed to take his place in

IV. SPECIFICATIONS—1. Definition.—"The specification is the written statement containing a minute description of the particulars of the work to be executed, and is generally made with reference to the drawings and the building contract."¹

2. Binding on Contractor.—The contract usually refers to the plans and specifications for the details of construction, and they thus become constructively a part of the contract,² just as binding upon the contractor as if embodied in it, and the latter cannot justify any departure from them.³ But he is only bound by the

the contract, a portion of the swamp lands to be secured from the state for the performance of the work, is void as being against public policy. Besides, the provision of the statute that contracts to construct such roads shall "in all cases be let to the lowest responsible bidder," does not admit of the substitution of another person as contractor in place of such bidder; and any contract based upon such illegal substitution is void. Hannah v. Fife, 27 Mich. 172.

1. Lloyd's Law of Building (2d ed.), § 54.

In Gilbert v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 34, Casey, C. J., said: "Specifications in architecture embrace, as understood by the profession, not only the dimensions and mode of construction, but a description of every piece of material—its kind, length, breadth and thickness—the manner of joining the separate parts together."

Where an architect prepares specifications, they ought to be in detail to enable parties to judge not only of the gross quantities, but also of the quantity of labor to be employed. Kemp v. Rose, 4 Jur. N. S. 919.

2. The specifications, so far as referred to in the contract, become constructively a part of it. New England Iron Co. v. Gilbert, etc., R. Co., 91 N. Y. 153; Cook v. Allen, 67 N. Y. 578; Tonnele v. Hall, 4 N. Y. 140. And see White v. McLaren, 151 Mass. 553.

Admissible in Evidence.—Where specifications are embraced in an advertisement for proposals to do work, and a contract results on which suit is brought, the specifications, being the basis of the contract, cannot be excluded as evidence. Campbell County v. Youtsey (Ky. 1891), 12 S. W. Rep. 305.

Warranty.—The specifications not being signed, and being referred to only to show the kind of work and materials, a clause therein that the work is to be "warranted tight, including the roof, for two years," does not constitute a continuing warranty, but a stipulation as to the quality of the roof. White v. McLaren, 151 Mass. 553.

3. Coey v. Lehman, 79 Ill. 173.

Even with the assent of the superintendent. Adlard v. Muldoon, 45 Ill. 193. Thus, a specification in a building contract that the plastering should be done with K.'s cement, under the direction of a superintendent of K., followed by one that the cement and sand should be mixed in equal parts, merely relates to supervision of the manner of the work, and does not authorize the superintendent to direct a different mixture. Fitzgerald v. Moran, 141 N. Y. 419, affirming 65 Hun (N. Y.) 621. And see infra, this title, The Architect.

Where the owners consent to variations from the plans, the contractor is not liable for non-compliance with the specifications in those particulars. Beswick v. Platt, 140 Pa. St. 28.

Where a contractor agrees to perform work according to certain plans and specifications, and such directions as the supervising engineer may give, he is bound only by such directions as look to a completion of the work according to, and not different from, the plans and specifications. Burke v. Kansas City, 34 Mo. App. 570.

The plaintiff contracted to construct a building for defendant according to the plan and specifications which were made a part of the contract, and which expressly stipulated that he should not vary in any manner from the plan and specifications without the written consent of defendant. In an action for breach of contract, it was held that the specifications having fixed the character and size of the columns to be used, evidence that columns of a different size were more in accord with the plan

was immaterial. Linch v. Paris Lumber, etc., Co. (Tex. 1890), 14 S. W. Rep. 701.

Where the specifications of a building contract contained a general heading or title called "Plastering," under which, in subtitles called "Deafening," "Lathing" and "Plastering," the whole title was described, and a contractor undertook "to do the plastering and stucco work" according to the specifications, there was no ambiguity raised by the double use of the word "Plastering," and it was construed to mean all included under the general title, and not that alone described under the subtitle "Plastering," and this, although the specifications called for wire lathing, and not the ordinary wooden slip. Mellen v. Ford, 28 Fed. Rep. 639.

1. Sexton v. Chicago, 107 Ill. 323.

A contract to do grading did not fix the amount of work to be done, except by reference to the accompanying drawings and specifications. The drawings and specifications actually annexed to the contract did not fix the amount of such work. In an action on the contract it was held that a writing which was prepared by the agent of one party and furnished to the other party to estimate and bid thereon, and upon which he made his proposals, which were accepted, and which specified within limits the amount of such work, was properly admitted in evidence as an accompanying specification. Monmouth Park Assoc. v. Warren (N. J. 1893), 27 Atl. Rep. 932.

Where a contract for the construction of a house stipulates that the work shall be done according to the attached plans and specifications, and a dispute arises as to how part of the work should be done, the builder may put in evidence a plan not attached to the contract, but which was exhibited to him at the time he made the contract, as explaining how the work should be done about which the dispute subsequently arose. And he may also show that the architects who drew the plans and supervised the work explained the variance to him, and stated that the work should be done as indicated by the specification that was not attached to the contract. Myer v. Fruin (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 868.

Where a granite company agreed that it would work for an armory building "on trucks agreeably to the drawings and specifications made by L., architect, . . . and hereto annexed," would provide all proper and sufficient material for "finishing all the granite work for specification and plan figured on at the office of this company," it was held that the contract did not require the company to furnish all the granite work shown by the architect's drawings, but only such as was described in the specifications and plan figured on at the office of the company. Millstone Granite Co. v. Dolan (Super. Ct.), 18 N. Y. Supp. 791.

But see Harvey v. U. S., 8 Ct. of Cl. 501, where it was held that where a contract provides for the construction of piers and abutments for a bridge, in accordance with such plans and specifications as may be fixed by the proper authority acting for the United States, the contractors are bound by the terms of the contract, notwithstanding that the plans and specifications subsequently fixed upon by the officers of the government materially differ from plans and specifications exhibited to the contractors at the time they made their bid for the work, and materially affected the value thereof.

2. Where a contract to furnish the materials for the ironwork of a building, and do the work necessary, refers to plans and specifications which show only openings for skylights, giving no sizes, weights, or data to guide in their construction, so that the contractor cannot make them without additional plans and specifications, the construction of such skylight cannot be held to have been included in the letting and contract, and the contractor may well refuse to make the same. Sexton v. Chicago, 107 Ill. 323.

A contract for the repair of a building called for a combination passenger and freight elevator, without more particular specification. It was held that the contractor could not be made liable for a failure to put gates on the elevator, in the absence of proof that the understanding in the trade was to supply gates in the absence of specifications. The testimony of witness that, in his

They are frequently attached to the contract, thus making identification much easier, and more satisfactory,¹ but this is not necessary to their validity.² The contract, when once signed, merges all prior agreements respecting changes in the specifications.³ Where there are no plans or specifications in the contract indicating the character of the work, this may be shown by other evidence.⁴

3. Variance Between Specifications and Contract.—It is a general principle that where the specifications and contract differ, the latter instrument governs,⁵ but they should be reconciled if opinion, gates were proper and necessary was not sufficient. Horgan v. McKenzie (C. Pl.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 174.

Where specifications are attached to the contract and expressly made a part of it, a guaranty contained in the specifications becomes a part of the contract, and is binding upon the contractor. Lake View v. MacRitchie, 134 Ill. 203.

Where the plaintiff built a house for the defendant under a written contract and specifications which did not require him to do the papering, it was held, upon the defendant claiming there was an oral agreement made at the time allowing him to deduct $50 for doing the papering, that such oral agreement was inconsistent with the written one, and could not have the effect to vary it. McGuinness v. Shannon, 154 Mass. 86.

5. In Tischler v. Apple, 30 Fla. 132, the contract required cornices to be run in twenty-five rooms, and the specifications, in halls and all rooms. The owner of the building selected twenty-five rooms to be corniced under the contract, and the contractors ran cornices therein. In a suit by the contractors for extra work in running cornices in halls and other rooms, it was held that the testimony of one of them that the selection did not include the halls and storerooms in which the cornices were charged for as extra was admissible, as the contract, rather than the specifications, governed as to the amount of cornicing to be done.

As between the positive requirement of a written clause in the contract, and a plan referred to, which, though perfect in other respects, shows an omission to indicate thereon a certain matter of detail, the written clause must control the mere implication derived from the omission in the plan. Smith v. Flanders, 129 Mass. 322.

Where a building contract provides a mode of determining as to extras, and the specifications, referred to by and made a part of the contract, provide a different and inconsistent mode, the contract prevails. Meyer v. Berlandi, 53 Minn. 59.

A building contract provided that the work was to be done "without unnecessary delay as soon as ordered." The specification provided that "the building will be completed within three months from the date of the contract." The carpenter's work was all that defendant undertook. It was held that the specifications were controlled by the contract, and defendant was not obligated to finish his work in three months. Boteler v. Roy, 40 Mo. App. 234.

When a contract requires work to be done according to sample and specifications, and, the two being irreconcilable, the engineer in charge orders a modification to which the contractors assent, the modified work must be regarded as performed and accepted at the contract price. Gallagher v. District of Columbia, 19 Ct. of Cl. 564.

Variance Between Plans and Specifications and "Working Plans."—A bid for a building contract was made and

4. Implied Warranty.—There is some conflict of authority as to whether there is any implied warranty by the employer that the work can be successfully constructed according to the plans and specifications, a leading English case holding that there is none, and that the remedy of the contractor, if any, must be for compensation as upon a quantum meruit,² while a Wisconsin case holds that the employer assumes the risk of the sufficiency and efficiency of the plans and specifications, and must bear any loss resulting from defects therein,³ and it has been repeatedly held accepted solely on the plans and specifications, and the contractors began work. Soon afterwards the detailed "working plans" were handed them, whereupon they claimed there was a material variance therein from the original plans, involving much additional labor, and refused to continue the work at the contract price. The owner then procured others to do the work at an increased compensation, and afterwards sued the contractors for the difference. The latter counter-claimed for the partial work done by them, and it was held that if there was a material variance, the contractors were entitled to recover on their counter-claim, and there being a fair conflict of evidence on this point, a refusal to submit the same to the jury was erroneous. Williams v. Bohan (Super. Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 484.

1. In an action for a breach of a building contract, a charge that, "in deciding whether or not plaintiff was proceeding with said building in compliance with the contract, . . . there must have been a substantial compliance in every material particular, . . . as called for by a fair, reasonable, and practical construction of the contract, plans, and specifications taken together, and where there is a conflict, if any, in these, this should be reconciled in a practical, workmanlike manner, so as to arrive at the fair and reasonable intention of the same," is correct; and does not leave the construction of the written contract to the jury. Linch v. Paris Lumber, etc., Elevator Co., 80 Tex. 23.

2. T. contracted with a corporation to take down an old bridge and build a new one. Plans and a specification prepared by the engineer of the corporation were furnished to him, and he was required to obey the directions of the engineer. The descriptions given were stated to be believed to be correct, but were not guaranteed; and, in one particular matter at least, he was warned to make an examination for himself. Part of the plan consisted in the use of caissons. These turned out to be of no value, and the work done in attempting to use them was wholly lost, and the bridge had to be built in a different manner. In this way much labor and time were wasted. The contract contained provisions as to the payment for extra work, and that work had (with the contract work) been duly paid for. The contractor sought for compensation for his loss of time and labor occasioned by the failure of the caissons, and in his declaration alleged that the corporation had warranted that the bridge could be inexpensively built according to the plans and specification. There was no express warranty to that effect in the contract, and it was held that none could be implied. Thorn v. London, L. R., 1 App. Cas. 120; 45 L. J. Exch. Div. 487; 24 W. R. 932; 34 L. T. N. S. 545. See also Sharpe v. San Paulo R. Co., L. R., 8 Ch. 597.

3. An act of the Wisconsin legislature authorized the construction of wings to the state capitol, and required a board of commissioners to let the contract after procuring "suitable and proper plans, drawings, and specifications," and to employ an architect to superintend the work, the architect to certify to the board monthly estimates of all materials furnished and labor performed. The board procured and adopted plans and specifications, and entered into a contract with plaintiffs, whereby all the materials were to be furnished, and all the work done, according to the plans and specifications, and under the direction and to the entire satisfaction of the architect. The architect was authorized to vary from such plans, in the United States that a contractor constructing work in accordance with the plans and specifications furnished by the employer is not liable if it subsequently gives way by reason of defects in the plans.¹

the value of alterations to be added to or deducted from the contract price, and any doubt as to the quality of materials and workmanship, or as to allowances for extras, to be determined and adjusted solely by the architect. After the contractors had, in good faith, according to the plans and under the directions of the architect, constructed a large portion of one wing, and the materials and work had been approved and accepted by the architect, and by the board, the wing fell, owing to defects and inefficiency of the plans. It was held that the state warranted the plans, and was liable to the plaintiffs for the expense of restoring the portion of the building so destroyed. Bentley v. State, 73 Wis. 416.

Where a contractor is bound by contract to follow the specifications strictly in the construction of a tunnel, and they are so defective that when followed the arch of the tunnel falls, the contractor can recover under the contract. Byron v. New York, 54 N. Y. Super. Ct. 411.

1. The undertaking of the contractor is simply to do the work with reasonable skill, after the designs furnished by the architects. They are not guarantors as to the strength of the edifice when finished, or its capacity to withstand the violence of the winds. Clark v. Pope, 70 Ill. 128. And see Schwartz v. Saunders, 46 Ill. 18; Burke v. Dunbar, 128 Mass. 499; MacRitchie v. Lake View, 30 Ill. App. 393. A contractor working under the plans and direction of an architect only undertakes that his work shall be skillful and workmanlike, and if performed in accordance with the plans, he cannot be held answerable in damages for an accident which occurs from the falling of the building, owing to defects in the plan unknown to him. Daegling v. Gilmore, 49 Ill. 248.

A guaranty clause in a contract is not to be so construed as to make the contractors liable for the failure of the work to remain in good condition, by reason of defects in the plan or design, or of the work being done, in certain particulars, in accordance with the express direction of the supervising engineer. MacRitchie v. Lake View, 30 Ill. App. 393.

2. The mere employment of an architect to prepare plans and a specification for a house, and to procure a builder to erect it, does not render the employer responsible for the accuracy of the bill of quantities furnished by such architect to the builders. Scrivener v. Pask, 18 C. B. N. S. 785. Especially where the proposals for bids stated that "the quantities and amounts given in these forms of proposals must be verified by the proposer, as the company will not be responsible for any error resulting from their use. They can be verified by the plans." St. Paul, etc., R. Co. v. Bradbury, 42 Minn. 222. And see Sullivan v. Sing Sing, 122 N. Y. 389.

If a surveyor makes an estimate which turns out to be incorrect to a considerable amount, through his omitting to examine the ground for the foundation of the work, he is not entitled to recover anything for his plans, specifications, or estimates made for that work. *Money Penny v. BILL OF QUANTITIES.—The bill of quantities is the schedule of the materials to be furnished and of the work to be performed, several copies of which are usually prepared and submitted to the contractors bidding for the work.¹ Assigning the prices for the various items mentioned is called "taking out quantities."² It is customary in England to employ a person called a surveyor to take out the quantities, who is usually paid by the successful bidder,³ and the architect employed to furnish plans and specifications may have implied authority to engage

1. A written contract provided for the furnishing of material for certain houses and for the doing of work on these houses for a gross sum, the contract being silent as to quantities. It was held that it must be rejected as a contract for want of certainty, and that the recovery for furnishing the materials and doing the work must be on a quantum meruit. Isaacs v. Smith, 55 N. Y. Super. Ct. 446.

2. Lloyd's Law of Building (2d ed.), § 55.

Plaintiff agreed in writing to do all the fireproofing work to be done on defendant's building, according to the drawings and specifications made by the architects, "which said drawings and specifications shall be considered a part of, and equally binding with, the contract." The price stated was thirteen thousand dollars, the defendant reserving "the right to throw out any part of the work called for on the 'bill of quantities' and from the above amount to deduct at the rate of charge in said 'bill of quantities,' and extra work shall be charged in accordance with the figures on said 'bill of quantities.'" "For the several dimensions, the arrangement, and construction of said building, reference will be had by the contractor to the accompanying design, . . . which design consists of the following drawings, to wit, all necessary plans and specifications, and the hereto attached bid and bill of quantities." It appeared that plaintiff's bid had been larger, but he reduced it, it being understood that any deductions or extras were to be charged for at the rate mentioned in the bid, and for convenience the figures which accompanied the bid were attached to the contract. It was held that the "bill of quantities" was not intended to be a limitation upon, or express the amount of work to be done for thirteen thousand dollars, but merely to furnish a basis for computing deductions or extras. Haydnville Min., etc., Co. v. Art Institute, 39 Fed. Rep. 484.

3. The defendants employed an architect to draw a specification of a building, and he employed the plaintiff to make out the quantities; the plaintiff's work was to be paid for by the successful competitor for the building contract; but a dispute having arisen between the architect and the defendants, they refused to go on with the building, upon which the architect sent in his bill to them, together with the plaintiff's bill for making out the quantities. They paid the architect's account only, and it was held that as they had by their own acts rendered it impossible that the successful competitor should defray the plaintiff's charges, according to the understanding, they were liable to him for the amount of his charges. Moon v. Whitney Union, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 814; 5 Scott 1; 3 Hodges 206.

The defendant, a builder, contracted with the plaintiff, a building surveyor, that if he would supply the quantities for a certain projected building, the defendant would, if he was accepted as the building contractor, pay him out of the first installment. The plaintiff furnished the quantities, but the defendant subsequently abandoned the building contract; and it was held, first, that it was implied that the defendant should duly proceed with the building contract, and that the performance of his contract with the plaintiff having been rendered impossible by his own act, he him.¹ As has been seen, the owner is not responsible for the accuracy of the bill of quantities.²

VI. THE ARCHITECT—1. Definition.—An architect is a person skilled in the art of building; one who understands architecture, or whose profession it is to form plans and designs of buildings, and superintend the execution of them.³

2. Contract with—Submission of Plans.—By calling upon an architect to furnish plans and specifications, and receiving them, a party renders himself liable to pay the architect for them whether he uses them or not,⁴ unless it is clearly understood that was bound to pay him for the quantities furnished. M'Connell v. Kilgallen, 2 Ir. Q. B. D. 119.

The owner of a house, desiring to make alterations, employed an architect to prepare plans. The architect, having done so, employed the plaintiff, a surveyor, to take out the quantities, which were lithographed, and sent to various builders—including the defendant and his son, who were in partnership—to invite tenders, the circular informing them that the builder whose contract was accepted should pay the plaintiff's fees. The defendant and his son had themselves, previously to the employment of an architect, prepared a plan for the owner, but one with which he was not satisfied. The tender of the defendant and his son was the lowest; but, it being greatly in excess of the expenditure contemplated by the owner, the plaintiff prepared a bill of reduction, but this reduced plan the owner also considered too expensive, and then employed the defendant (whose son had since died) to execute a modification of the original plan prepared in his office. The works were eventually executed by the defendant under a contract, in which it was agreed between the owner and the defendant that the latter should not be liable for the plaintiff's fees. The plaintiff brought an action for his fees against the defendant, relying on a custom of the building trade, by which the builder whose tender is accepted, or who is employed to carry out the plans, or any modification of them, is directly liable for the surveyor's fees, the owner being liable if the work is abandoned altogether, or he adopts an entirely independent plan. Evidence to support this custom was given, but one of the plaintiff's witnesses stated that, in his opinion, the liability depended on the agreement between the owner and the builder. The defendant's foreman stated that the works were carried out according to the defendant's own original plan, and that the plaintiff's calculations were not used at all for them. The plaintiff's witnesses stated that there was the strongest similarity between the work as carried out and the plaintiff's reduced plan, and it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Taylor v. Hall, 4 Ir. R. C. L. 467.

"The architect is the recognized head of the building trade. He is supposed to be especially skilled in the art of planning and designing architectural structures of every description. His duty is to draw plans and make out specifications, and generally superintend the execution of the work." Lloyd's Law of Building and Buildings, § 7.

The Revenue Act of July 13, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 121, contains a provision that every person whose business it is to plan, design, or superintend the construction of buildings, ships, roads, bridges, canals, or railroads, shall be regarded as an architect and civil engineer; provided, that this shall not include a practical carpenter who labors on a building.

4. In Kutts v. Pelby, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 65, the plaintiff, having been requested by the defendant to prepare plans for a theater, drew a sketch of the front, which was presented to the defendant and kept by him a week, who being pleased with it, directed the plaintiff to make the plans. The defendant's master builder called at his request on the plaintiff and took the plans to make an estimate of the costs of the structure, kept them a week, made an estimate on them, and delivered it to the defendant. The defendant concluded not to build by those plans, and they were in the possession of the plaintiff and produced by him at the trial. It was held that the evidence proved a delivery of the plans to the defendant and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover compensation for his services. And see Nelson v. Spooner, 2 F. & F. 613; Marcotte v. Beaupre, 15 Minn. 152; Shipman v. State, 42 Wis. 377.

A committee appointed by a board of school directors to procure plans for a building, having selected one from plaintiff and directed some modifications, which he made, it was held that the directors were bound to pay for plaintiff's work, though they did not finally act on his plan. Driscoll v. Independent School Dist., 61 Iowa 426.

Where an architect, under the expectation of being employed to superintend the construction of a building, voluntarily draws plans, he cannot recover for the plans, if not employed as superintendent. Allen v. Bowman, 7 Mo. App. 29. In this case the plaintiff, learning that the defendant was about to build a house, solicited from him the superintendence, as an architect, of the intended building, calling on the defendant and having interviews with him, at which the defendant talked of the cost of the building, etc. The defendant went to the plaintiff's office on one occasion, when the plaintiff made a sketch for such a house as the defendant described. Sketches of ground-plans and a front elevation were made out, and were offered in evidence upon the trial. These were taken by the plaintiff to the defendant's place of residence, where the plaintiff asked the defendant's wife to make suggestions, who accordingly made some, which the plaintiff noted. The plaintiff left these sketches with the defendant for a few days, after which time they remained permanently in the plaintiff's possession, never having been used by the defendant. The plaintiff afterwards, finding that the defendant had employed another superintendent, sent in a bill for sixty dollars, telling the defendant that the bill would never have been presented but as he had employed another superintendent he was forced to send it. It was held that there could be no recovery.

An architect devoted several years to the preparation of plans for the construction of the congressional library building, but there was no contract entered into with him by any commission or officer empowered to adopt plans, employ architects, or enter upon the construction of the building, until Act April 15, 1886, ch. 50 (24 Stat. at L., p. 12), which adopted the architect's plan. It was held that the act did not constitute a contract, but only declared the legislature's intention, and might have been rescinded by either party, without liability, at any time before the architect entered upon the performance of the work. Smithmeyer v. U. S., 147 U. S. 342.

A county and city within its limits proposed to erect public buildings, the portion appropriated to the use of each to be paid for by them respectively. They jointly offered a premium for plans. A furnished one, and received the promised compensation; there was no further contract between the parties. The city and county severally adopted a resolution accepting his plans, subject to such modifications as should be thereafter determined upon, if his estimate as to the cost of construction should be verified. He brought suit against them to recover five per cent. of the estimated costs of the building, and it was held that the joint resolution did not amount to a contract, and that he was not entitled to recover, and that evidence of the value of his services in making the estimates was properly excluded, inasmuch as he failed to show that they had been rendered at the instance of the defendant. Tilley v. Cook County, 103 U. S. 155.

An architect, it seems, cannot recover for his plans, even though they have been accepted by the employer, where he recommends him to build upon soil which he has examined, and which his knowledge of such things should have told him is unsuitable for the purpose. Whitty v. Dillon, 2 F. & F. 67.

And see Moneypenny v. Hartland, 1 C. & P. 352; 11 E. C. L. 414, where a similar ruling was made in the case of an engineer who failed to examine the ground for the foundation of the work, and, as a result, made a considerable error in his estimates.

they are to be submitted subject to approval.¹ Where public buildings are to be erected, it is usually the custom to invite architects to submit plans in competition, the one deemed best to be accepted,² in addition to which premiums are frequently offered for the two or three next in order of merit.³ Plans are often accepted conditionally, usually that the building can be

Where an architect agreed with the committee of visitors of a lunatic asylum to prepare the requisite probationary drawings for the approval of the committee, and all other drawings and documents required to be submitted to the commissioners of lunacy, and afterwards to the secretary of state, pursuant to the statutes, and subsequently to prepare the whole of the working drawings, estimates, and specifications for an asylum to contain two hundred patients, for an agreed sum, it was held that the term "probationary drawings" meant drawings to be approved of by the committee, and, if approved, then to be submitted to the commissioners of lunacy and secretary of state, and that, it appearing that the committee had disapproved of the drawings submitted to them, there could be no recovery. Moffatt v. Dickson, 13 C. B. 543; 76 E. C. L. 543.

Where an architect agrees to submit plans for the approval of a committee he must do so within a reasonable time, and after he has submitted several plans, which are rejected, the committee are justified in procuring plans elsewhere. Moffatt v. Dickson, 13 C. B. 543; 76 E. C. L. 543.

2. Where architects are requested to submit plans in competition, the one deemed best to be accepted and its designer made architect and superintendent, the architect whose plans are accepted as the most meritorious has a right of action for a refusal to employ him as architect and superintendent. Walsh v. St. Louis Exposition, etc., Assoc., 90 Mo. 459, affirming 16 Mo. App. 502.

Failure of Carrier to Deliver Plans in Time for Competition.—Where a committee for the erection of a public building advertised for the submission of plans and specifications, and offered a premium to the successful competitor who should present the same on or before a given date, and an architect prepared and forwarded a set of plans and specifications by an express company, but in consequence of the latter's negligence they were not delivered until after the specified time, it was held that the measure of damages, in an action against the express company, was not the value of the time and labor expended in making the plans and specifications, but the value of the plaintiff's chance in obtaining the premium; and that in the absence of proof of any probability that he would have obtained the premium had his plans and specifications been delivered in time, only nominal damages could be recovered. Adams Express Co. v. Egbert, 36 Pa. St. 360; 78 Am. Dec. 382. See also Watson v. Ambergate, 15 Jur. 448.

Agreements to Stifle Competition.—Flanders v. Wood, 83 Tex. 277, was a suit between architects for an accounting. It appeared that each had put in plans and specifications for the erection of a courthouse; that there was competition between the plans offered, and that it was unknown whose plan would be accepted. The architects agreed among themselves to abstain from further advocacy of their plans and to divide the proceeds should the plan of any one of them be accepted. It was held that the promises of the parties, being mutual and simultaneous, constituted a valuable consideration for the agreement, and that it was not against public policy, nor to prevent rivalry, etc., since, as the plans were not withdrawn and each competed, it was not calculated to stifle competition.

Ownership of Plans Where Prize Is Offered.—In order to obtain a number of plans from which to select, prizes are frequently offered to the several deemed the most meritorious. When such is the case, a question sometimes arises as to the ownership of the successful plans. In Tilley v. Cook County, 103 U. S. 162, the plaintiff offered to prove a custom of architects that when prizes were offered, the successful competitor remained the owner of his own designs, and that, if they were adopted, erected for a certain sum, in which case there can be no recovery for them unless the condition is complied with.¹ Nor, it seems, can there be any recovery where the architect submits estimates of the probable cost of the work, unless the estimate is reasonably near the actual cost;² but architects' fees cannot be

he was entitled to compensation therefor in addition to the prize, but the evidence was rejected, on the ground that in that case the building was never erected and the plans never used. But in Walsh v. St. Louis Exposition, etc., Assoc., 101 Mo. 534, where an association invited architects to submit designs for a building, the seven deemed most meritorious to be accepted and awarded five hundred dollars each, except the one selected as the best of all, the designer of which was to be engaged as the architect, it was held that, upon the tender of the award of five hundred dollars to the successful competitors, the association became the owner of their plans and entitled to use them as they chose.

1. Where various plans were drawn and presented for a church building, and that of the plaintiff was accepted upon condition that the building under his plans should be built for a certain sum, and when it was ascertained that it could not be built for such sum the plans were rejected, and the evidence failed to show any promise to pay for the plans, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for them. Ada St. M. E. Church v. Garnsey, 66 Ill. 132.

Where plans are accepted on condition that a bid is received from a reliable party to construct the building in accordance with the plans for the amount limited, and who is willing to enter into a sufficient bond therefor, it is not necessary to the fulfillment of the condition that the bids be actually accepted. Hall v. Los Angeles County, 74 Cal. 502.

An association invited architects to submit designs for a building, the cost of which was not to exceed four hundred thousand dollars. Of the designs submitted, the seven deemed most meritorious were to be accepted and awarded five hundred dollars each, except the one selected as the best of all, the designer of which was to be engaged as architect and superintendent. The directors selected seven from the designs submitted, and invited the architects to explain their plans. The plaintiff offered his bond that his plan would not cost over four hundred thousand dollars. The directors resolved to select the favorite plan by ballot, with the understanding that the plan should be so modified or changed as to suit the wishes of the board, the cost not to exceed four hundred thousand dollars. The vote resulted in the selection of the plaintiff's plans. The plaintiff was selected as architect, to become so in fact when his amended plans, and the contract and bond under which the building was to be erected, were approved by the board. The alterations desired added to the cost of the building, and the plaintiff demanded that the limit be fixed at four hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. After much negotiation, he notified the board that, unless this concession could be made, he declined entering into the proposed contract. The board then employed another architect, who made new plans. It was held that the selection of the plaintiff's designs was conditional only, and did not entitle him to be employed as architect of the building, and that there was evidence that he had waived the right to have a selection made in accordance with the terms on which the competition was invited. Walsh v. St. Louis Exposition, etc., Assoc., 101 Mo. 534.

2. Money Penny v. Hartland, 1 C. & P. 352; 11 E. C. L. 414.

In an action by an architect whose plans, after having been accepted, are rejected on the ground that the work cannot be done for the amount of his estimates, it is for the jury to say whether the estimates are reasonably near the actual cost. Nelson v. Spooner, 2 F. & F. 613. In this case an architect made plans for a schoolhouse for a board of trustees who had only one thousand three hundred and fifty pounds in their hands to pay for it. After making the plans the architect estimated the cost at one thousand five hundred and forty-five pounds, and repeatedly assured the trustees that his buildings "never exceeded the contracts" unless changes were authorized by the owners themselves. He afterwards suggested regarded as part of the estimate.¹ A contract with an architect may be rescinded if procured through fraudulent representations.²

3. The Contract a Personal One.—The contract with an architect is one strictly personal in its nature; it rests upon the confidence of the employer, in the ability and skill of the architect in his profession, and hence, the performance cannot be delegated to another without express authority, or undertaken by his assignee in bankruptcy.³ The contract is terminated by the death of the architect, and the right to execute it does not survive to his executor, nor can he be compelled by the other party to perform it.⁴

some changes which he said he thought could be included in the estimated price. Upon submitting the plans to builders for bids, the lowest bid received was for two thousand and fifty-six pounds. The trustees then refused to do anything further about the matter and returned the drawings to the architect, who sued them for his pay. Upon the question being submitted to the jury, they disagreed as to whether the estimate was reasonably near the bids.

In Smith v. Dickey, 74 Tex. 61, which was an action by an architect for preparing plans and estimates for a hotel building, the defendant testified that the plans were to be for a building to cost not more than seventy-five thousand dollars, while the architect testified that it was to cost "about one hundred thousand dollars." The estimates amounted to a little more than one hundred and two thousand dollars, which, if the architect's fees were added, would have been increased to one hundred and seven thousand five hundred and eighty-nine dollars. The court charged the jury that if the defendant stipulated that the plans should be made for a hotel that would not cost more than seventy-five thousand dollars, the plaintiff could not recover, but that if the building was to cost "about one hundred thousand dollars," estimates of a building to cost one hundred and two thousand dollars, exclusive of the architect's fees, or even with the fees included, was a sufficient compliance with the contract, which charge was held correct.

2. A board of county supervisors who have adopted the plans of an architect for the erection of a county jail, are justified in rescinding the contract, if they have been induced to execute it through the fraudulent representation of the architect; but cannot rescind it on the ground that the architect has slandered certain members of the board. Hall v. Los Angeles County, 74 Cal. 502.

An architect to whom is given the sole power of arbitration of all matters concerning the materials and character of the work, cannot delegate this power to his partner without the consent of the parties. Wright v. Meyer (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 1122.

Where the performance is personal, the executors are not liable. Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826; 113 E. C. L. 826.

Where the contract is dependent upon the personal skill of the artist, it is, though no condition is expressed in words, based on the presumption of sufficient health, and is subject to an implied condition that if the artist is, without any fault of his own, disabled by illness, to perform, he will be excused. Robinson v. Davison, L. R., 6 Exch. 269; 40 L. J. Exch. 178.

In Hall v. Wright, El. Bl. & El. 746; 96 E. C. L. 746, Crompton, J., said: "Where a contract depends upon personal skill, and an act of God renders it impossible, as, for instance, in the case of a painter employed to paint a picture, who is struck blind, it may be that the performance can be excused."

But although a contract involving personal confidence is put an end to by

4. Degree of Skill and Care Required.—An architect is presumed to possess the requisite ability and skill for the practice of his profession,¹ and will be liable in damages for a failure to furnish good and sufficient plans and specifications.² When required by contract to supervise the construction of a building, he will be held to the exercise of reasonable care and diligence in seeing that the work is properly performed;³ and he will be held to the death of the party confided in, it is not thereby rescinded so as to take away the right of action already vested; as where S. was employed as consulting engineer for fifteen months to complete certain works, to be paid five hundred pounds for his services in equal quarterly installments, and before the work was finished, and whilst two quarterly installments, which were due him, were still unpaid, he died, it was held that his personal representative was entitled to recover them. Stubbs v. Holywell R. Co., L. R., 2 Exch. 311.

1. In Harmer v. Cornelius, 5 C. B. N. S. 246, Willes, J., said: "The public profession of an art is a representation and undertaking to all the world that the professor possesses the requisite ability and skill."

Expert Evidence—Qualification of Architect.—An architect who testifies that he has had experience in the erection of a large number of buildings, and has been in the habit of observing the length of time required to procure materials and do the work, will be deemed competent to answer the question whether or not it would have been safe to run up the brick walls of a building in six weeks, and where he swears that he has had practical personal experience in removing the débris of buildings destroyed by fire, has himself had débris removed, and has seen it removed by others, he is shown competent to testify how long, in his opinion, it should have taken to remove débris to permit rebuilding to commence. Chamberlain v. Dunlop (Supreme Ct.), 8 N. Y. Supp. 125.

2. See Erskine v. Johnson, 23 Neb. 265.

An architect may be held to reasonable skill as such, both in planning the building and superintending its construction; and may be liable for defects in his plans or superintendence resulting from his lack of reasonable skill and diligence, notwithstanding the adoption of his plans or a ratification of his superintendence by the acceptance of the building without objection, if the defects are patent to an expert, but latent to a non-expert. Shipman v. State, 43 Wis. 381. And see Money-penny v. Hartland, 1 C. & P. 352; 2 C. & P. 378.

Where, in the building of apartment houses to be heated by steam, it appeared that the sectional area of the boiler flues for the steam heating apparatus was largely in excess of the sectional area of the chimney flues designed to receive the smoke and gases from the boiler fires, thus preventing proper combustion in the furnace, and entailing on defendant the cost of building new chimney flues, it was held that the architects were bound to know how to proportion the chimney flues to the boilers, and could not excuse themselves by proof that they conferred with the contractor for the steam heating apparatus and obtained from him the dimensions of the chimney flues. Hubert v. Aitken, 15 Daly (N. Y.) 237.

Where an action is brought against an architect, to recover damages alleged to have resulted from a defect in the plans and specifications furnished by him, the plaintiff must prove a substantial compliance with the plans and specifications, and when a variance appears, involving the integrity of the mode of construction of the affected part, and so far material that it would have been the direct cause of the injury complained of, the architect is not liable, and a submission to the jury of the question as to whether or not the variance did or did not cause the injury, is error. Lake v. McElfatrick, 139 N. Y. 349, reversing (Supreme Ct.) 19 N. Y. Supp. 494.

3. It is the duty of the architect to exercise proper vigilance and skill in the supervision of the work; to see that it is done in the manner contemplated by the specifications, and in a good, workmanlike and substantial manner. Gilman v. Stevens, 54 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 197.

An architect in the supervision of the work is bound to exercise only reasonable care, and to use reasonable means of observation and detection, and where he appears to have done this, the mere fact that inferior material has been used by the contractor in some instances, and that the plumbing has been carelessly done, does not establish, as a matter of law, that he has not fully performed his contract. Hubert v. Aitken, 15 Daly (N. Y.) 237. Larremore, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court in this case, said: "The learned counsel would not claim that an architect is bound to spend all his time at a building which is going up under his professional care, so that no fraud or negligence can be committed by any of the contractors. The counsel would not contend that the architect is an insurer of the perfection of the mason work, the carpenter work, the plumbing, etc. He is bound only to exercise reasonable care, and to use reasonable powers of observation and detection in the supervision of the structure. When, therefore, it appears that the architect has made frequent visits to the building, and, in a general way, has performed the duties called for by the custom of his profession, the mere fact, for instance, that inferior brick have been used in places, does not establish, as matter of law, that he has not entirely performed his contract. He might have directed at one of his visits that portions of the plumbing work be packed in wool; upon his next return to the building the pipes in question might have been covered with brick work in the progress of the building; if he had inquired whether the wool-packing had been attended to and had received an affirmative answer from the plumber and the bricklayer, I am of opinion that his duty as an architect, in the matter of the required protection of said pipes from the weather, would have been ended. Yet, under these very circumstances, the packing might have been intentionally or carelessly omitted in fraud upon both architect and owner, and could it still be claimed that the architect had not fully performed his work? The learned counsel for appellant is, in effect, asking us to hold that the defects of the character above named establish, as matter of law, that plaintiffs have not completely performed their agreement. An architect is no more a mere overseer, or foreman, or watchman, than he is a guarantor of a flawless building; and the only question that can arise in a case where general performance of duty is shown, is whether, considering all the circumstances and peculiar facts involved, he has or has not been guilty of negligence. This is a question of fact and not of law."

In Petersen v. Rawson, 34 N. Y. 370, the plaintiff agreed to furnish the plans, etc., and superintend the construction of the building. The contract with the mason provided that he should "lay out his work himself." The sills of the front first story windows were set two and three-quarters inches higher from the floor than those of the rear windows on the same story, although they were intended to be at the same level. The balcony in front of the house, possibly in consequence of the mistake in the sills, was set too high, and the first step to the front door was set too low. When the finish was put in, the trim of the front first story windows cut into the plaster cornice, injuring the appearance of the room. The plaintiff refused to give the mason his final certificate, amounting to one thousand nine hundred dollars, on account of these mistakes, but the owner paid the mason in full without a certificate, and refused, on account of these mistakes, to pay the balance to the architect who brought suit for it. The referee found by the witnesses that the architect was "diligent in his attendance upon the building." Several architects testified, their evidence being conflicting, as to when the error should probably have been discovered. It was held that the architect was not liable.

In Newman v. Fowler, 37 N. J. L. 89, it was held that where a house was badly built in consequence of the joint neglect of the contractor performing the work and the architect employed to supervise the construction, a suit founded on such neglect would lie against the architect alone, nor would the fact that the owner of the house refused the contractor part of the money due him, on the ground that the house was badly built, bar such suit.

In Schreiner v. Miller, 67 Iowa 91; 56 Am. Rep. 339, it was held that an architect employed to furnish the plans for the building and superintend its construction, is liable for damages if, through his lack of skill or care, the foundations are so defective as to cause the walls to fall.

Where the contract of employment

the same degree of care and diligence in regard to issuing certificates as to the work done.¹

The negligence or want of skill of the architect is a question of fact and not of law,² and the burden of proof is upon the party seeking to establish it.³

5. Architect as Agent of Employer.—The employer, by empowering an architect to superintend the construction of a building, constitutes him his agent for all purposes necessary to secure the erection and safety of the building.⁴ Where found necessary, was oral, and the nature and extent of the architect's duties as superintendent were in controversy, an instruction which virtually left the whole matter as to what it was "proper" for the architect to do, to the judgment and caprice of the jury, unrestrained by the evidence in the case, was, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, held erroneous. Vigeant v. Scully, 20 Ill. App. 437.

In Lottman v. Barnett, 62 Mo. 159, an architect, having the general charge and superintendence of the construction of a building, was held responsible for the killing of a workman, caused by the falling of a wall which resulted from the giving way of supports on which it rested under the working of a jackscrew, although the appliance was put to work under the immediate direction of another person employed by the owner of the building, while the architect was absent, where it appeared that the manager of the jackscrew was employed on the advice of the architect, and subject to his direction, and that he knew and approved of the method adopted for effecting the raising. It was said that whether the wall fell because the plan for raising it was a bad one, or because the supports were inadequate, in either case the disaster was attributable to positive misfeasance for negligence in the work which the architect undertook, but in which he failed to exhibit the care and skill which the law imposed upon him; that for such negligence he was responsible, not merely to his employer, but to those injured in consequence, and that the question whether and in what respect he was guilty of negligence was one for the jury under proper instructions.

1. Error in Certificate of Work.—Where, by his contract, an architect is required to give certificates from time to time for a certain per cent. of the value of the work done by the contractor, it has been held in Canada that he will be liable to the owner for any loss resulting from his negligence in certifying for too much work. Irving v. Morrison, 27 U. C. C. P. 242. But in Vigeant v. Scully, 20 Ill. App. 437, it was held that an instruction was erroneous in announcing that the duty was imposed upon the architect to make a special inspection of the work before issuing any certificate sufficient to satisfy himself that the particular work for which the certificate was asked was done properly and in accordance with the plans and specifications; that no such duty was imposed by the terms of the contracts.

Where the superintendent is required to make monthly estimates of the work done, he cannot be required to furnish "correct and accurate estimates," monthly "estimates" being in their nature mere approximations. Shipman v. State, 43 Wis. 381.

2. Hubert v. Aitken, 15 Daly (N.Y.) 237.

3. The burden of proof is upon the party seeking to show that the architect failed to exercise ordinary care and diligence. Gilman v. Stevens, 54 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 207.

4. A private agent, acting within the scope of his general authority, may bind his principal. Baltimore v. Eschbach, 18 Md. 276.

An architect has authority to proceed in the usual way, and where an architect employed to draw plans and specifications for a proposed building, employs a surveyor to make out the quantities, which work is to be paid for by the successful competitor for the building contract, the owners, having refused to allow the building to proceed, will be held liable to pay the surveyor for making out the quantities. Moon v. Witney Union, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 814.

therefore, in order to render the building secure, he may bind the employer for extra work and materials, or even vary from the strict letter of the original contract;¹ but otherwise he cannot, unless constituted the employer's agent generally for all purposes connected with the building² or specially authorized, make

Notice of Assignment of Building Contract.—An architect whose authority is specially conferred in a written contract for a building, is not authorized to receive notice of an assignment of the building contract so as to bind the owner of the building by such notice, unless such authority is expressly conferred. Renton v. Monnier, 77 Cal. 449.

No Authority to Supervise Employment of Men.—An architect employed to "superintend the construction of" a building, and "to see that the same is built in strict conformity to the specifications and plans," has no authority to supervise the letting of subcontracts and the employment of men. Lewis v. Slack, 27 Mo. App. 131.

1. Where an architect, appointed by the board of county commissioners to supervise the construction of a courthouse, ordered the substitution of eight-inch iron pillars in place of six-inch pillars as called for by the contract, which caused an increase in the expense, and the commissioners accepted the building, it was held that the county was liable for such extra work, although there was no agreement as to the price, and the contract was not in writing and attached to the original contract with the contractor, as provided for in such original contract. Gibson County v. Motherwell Iron, etc., Co., 123 Ind. 364.

An architect employed only to supervise and direct the work done by a contractor, has no authority to employ another to do work on the building which the contractor has undertaken to do; thus, where the architect, upon finding that the brick piers were giving way owing to bad workmanship, ordered a subcontractor who was furnishing stone for the building, to put in stone piers in place of the brick ones, without knowing that he was a subcontractor, and supposing that the order was really given through him to the principal contractor, it was held that the architect had no authority to engage another to do the work of the principal contractor, and the fact that the owner saw the stone piers being built but made no objection, did not amount to an acceptance of the benefit of his labor, as he had a right to suppose that it was being done by the principal contractor. Campbell v. Day, 90 Ill. 363.

The mere employment of an architect to prepare plans and specifications for a house, and to procure a builder to complete it, does not make him the agent of the employer to the extent of rendering the employer responsible for the accuracy of the bill of quantities furnished by the architect to the builder, and the builder having expended much more time and materials than contemplated, cannot recover from the owner more than the contract price. Scrivener v. Pask, 18 C. B. N. S. 785; 114 E. C. L. 785.

2. The employer may constitute the architect his agent generally for all purposes connected with the building, and that without any limitation as to the price. Kimberley v. Dick, L. R., 13 Eq. 1.

But where a person who has employed an architect to make plans and specifications for a house, and do such other acts as architects usually do as such, and has engaged a contractor to do all the work and furnish all the materials, and has placed the money which has become due to the contractor in the hands of the architect, to be paid on the contractor's order, these facts do not warrant a jury in finding that the architect was made the general agent of the employer, and authorized to bind him by new contracts for purchases with other persons. Dodge v. McDonnell, 14 Wis. 533.

It has been held in Indiana that where the board of county commissioners has power to appoint a superintendent to act for them in the supervision of work, he becomes the agent of the county for the purpose of constructing the work, and may bind the county for work done beyond that contemplated by the written contract. Clinton County v. Hill, 122 Ind. 215; Gibson County v. Motherwell Iron, etc., Co., 123 Ind. 364; Harris County v. Byrne, 67 Ind. 21.

In Benton County v. Patrick, 54

alterations in the plans and specifications, or change the original contract.¹ But where the architect is authorized to order extras, and the employer specifies the manner in which it is to be done,

Miss. 240, where a contract had been duly made for the erection of a courthouse, and a commissioner regularly appointed by the board of supervisors to superintend the work and see that it was done according to the contract and specifications, it was held that the county would not, under Mississippi Code 1871, §§ 1389, 1394, be bound for the alterations or extra work made or authorized by such commissioner, although the board accepted the building so completed upon the report of the commissioner stating that he had authorized the extra work, and recommending payment for it, but at the same time refused to receive that part of the commissioner's report relating to such extra work, and denied their liability therefor.

1. Woodruff v. Rochester, etc., R. Co., 108 N. Y. 39; Rex v. Peto, 1 Y. & J. 37; Cooper v. Langdon, 9 M. & W. 60; Jones v. Reg., 7 Can. Supreme Ct. 570; Reg. v. Starrs, 17 Can. Supreme Ct. 118.

He has no right to excuse the contractor from any of the provisions of the contract.

In Adlard v. Muldoon, 45 Ill. 193, certain newel posts, brackets and cornices were not finished according to the specifications, and gas pipes were not put in some of the bedrooms, as required by the contract. The architect claimed that he had deducted these omissions, or set them off against extra work done. It was held, in an action by the contractor for the balance claimed to be due upon the contract, that the architect could not, unless specially authorized, change the terms of the contract, and that there could be no recovery until the specifications were complied with. And see Bonesteel v. New York, 22 N. Y. 162; Burke v. Kansas City, 34 Mo. App. 570; Bond v. Newark, 19 N. J. Eq. 376.

The acceptance, by the architect, of a different class of work from that called for by the contract, or of inferior materials, does not bind the owner nor relieve the contractor from the agreement to perform according to plans and specifications. Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145; 10 Am. Rep. 449.

In Bond v. Newark, 19 N. J. Eq.

376, the court said: "An architect to whom, by the contract, everything was to be referred, could not hold that a brick house was a compliance with a contract to build one of marble; or that steps of blue flag were brown stone steps; or that a wall twelve inches thick complied with a contract to make one of sixteen inches. He could determine whether the marble front, the brown stone steps, or the sixteen-inch wall were put up in a workmanlike manner, but could dispense with no substantial matter expressly required by the contract. Such approval would not entitle the contractor to recover at law."

A letter from an architect to a subcontractor employed in constructing a building, complaining that he is not doing his work according to contract, or following the instructions of a designated superintendent, does not authorize such subcontractor to follow the instructions of the superintendent in respect to matters expressly fixed by the specifications. Fitzgerald v. Moran, 141 N. Y. 419.

A superintending architect has no power, merely by virtue of his position, and without authority from his employer, to authorize one who has a contract for the plastering, to have the mortar carried to the premises instead of having it made there, or to so vary the contract as to make the employer liable to pay a higher price for the mortar than that contemplated in the contract. McIntosh v. Hastings, 156 Mass. 344.

He has no authority to substitute a subcontractor for the principal contractor, either in the performance of the work or the payment therefor. Bouton v. McDonough County, 84 Ill. 384; Campbell v. Day, 90 Ill. 363.

In Baltimore Cemetery Co. v. Coburn, 7 Md. 202, a contract was entered into for the erection of a cemetery gateway according to a certain specified plan, it being agreed in the contract that should any alteration be contemplated from the design it could be done, provided the parties agreed upon the price beforehand and indorsed it upon the contract, and that unless such agreement was entered into it was to be taken the terms of his power should be strictly complied with, and unless the extras are ordered in the manner specified, the employer will not be bound.¹

An architect falsely representing himself as having authority to bind his employer for work and materials, may be held personally liable therefor.²

6. Must Act with Good Faith.—The position of an architect is one of trust and confidence, and he should act with the greatest good faith towards both his employer and the contractor.³ It is exceed-to be an agreement to make the alteration without making any change in the price of the original contract. Two windows not contemplated in the original contract were afterwards placed in the gateway by direction of the architect; the agreement and price therefor not being indorsed upon the contract, and there being no evidence of a promise by the owners to pay for the same, it was held that the architect had no authority to order the alterations and bind the owners by promising in their name to pay for them.

The architect of a church was authorized by the contract "to order works omitted or overlooked in the specification, and to provide for contingencies which might arise during the execution of the work," and the contractor was bound by the contract to obey the architect's orders. The architect, without consulting the officials of the town, at whose expense the church was to be built, practically substituted a new plan for that which had been officially approved of, increasing all the dimensions of the building after the contract was made, thereby adding twelve thousand six hundred and seventy-five francs to the cost, and ordering changes in details of construction and decoration to the value of five thousand francs. Upon the town refusing to pay the bills for these extras, it was held that if the enlargement of the building did not better adapt it to the requirements of public worship so that the commune received some benefit from the change, the architect must pay the cost himself. In regard to the extra charge of five thousand francs, the court found that a part of it was for "changes in details fully justified by the necessities of good workmanship," but that two thousand francs "had been incurred through the exaggerated importance attached by the architect to the interior decoration, and the details of the tower, the entrance door, and the windows." On the cost occasioned by the increased size of the edifice it was found by experts that the commune should bear a part, as being to a small extent benefited by the change, and the architect was condemned to pay a total of ten thousand five hundred francs. Commune de Colombier-Saugniere v. Duchez et Savoye, Dalloz, 1883, 392.

1. A provision in the contract that before any extra work shall be done, the contractor and superintendent shall agree thereto, and stipulate the price to be paid therefor, in writing, cannot be waived by the superintendent of the building, and there can be no recovery for extra work in such case, unless such written agreement is entered into. Ahern v. Boyce, 19 Mo. App. 552. And see, to the same effect, Woodruff v. Rochester, etc., R. Co., 108 N. Y. 39. See infra, this title, Extra Work.

2. In Randell v. Trimen, 18 C. B. 786, the defendant, an architect employed by A and others to superintend the building of a church, falsely represented that he was authorized to order, and did order, stone of the plaintiffs for the building of the church, on account of and to be charged to A. The plaintiffs, relying on these representations and believing that the defendant had authority to order the stone, delivered the same, and it was used in the building of the church. The architect, in point of fact, had no authority to order materials for the building. Upon A's refusing to pay for the stone, the plaintiffs, trusting to the architect's representation, sued him for the price, and failed in the action, and had to pay A's costs and also the cost incurred by their attorneys; and it was held, in an action by them against the architect, that the plaintiffs were entitled not only to recover the value of the stone, but also the costs they had incurred and paid in a former action.

3. It is the duty of an architect superintending the erection of a building, ingly improper, therefore, that he should have a pecuniary interest in the performance of the contract,¹ and the fact that an architect has accepted commissions from the contractor has been held good ground for his dismissal.²

7. Compensation.—The compensation of the architect should be stipulated for in the contract, and is usually a fixed commission or percentage on the cost of the structure.³ Where nothing to act, in all things relating to his principal, solely for the latter's interest, and with fidelity to his employer and his trust. The law does not recognize or tolerate conduct on the part of the architect, which is hostile to his principal and in the interest of an adverse party with whom he is dealing for his principal. Lewis v. Slack, 27 Mo. App. 119.

Where the architect is empowered by the building contract to take possession of the building if the contractor fails to comply with the conditions of the contract, such power does not depend upon the architect's mere arbitrary discretion. White v. Harrigan, 41 Minn. 414.

The duties of a building superintendent are in their nature such that it would be improper that he should be appointed or controlled by the contractor; and the two positions being inconsistent, a contract will not be implied for the employment of the contractor as superintendent of his own work. Friedland v. McNeil, 33 Mich. 40.

1. An architect is entitled to no other profit from his transactions in his employer's behalf than the agreed compensation or reasonable fees. Lloyd's Law of Building and Buildings (2d ed.), § 11.

Where an architect has guaranteed his employer that the total cost of the work shall not exceed a certain sum, of which agreement the builder has no knowledge, he is an improper arbitrator, and the builder is not bound by a submission to his arbitration. Kimberley v. Dick, L. R., 13 Eq. 1; 41 L. J. Ch. 38; 25 L. T. N. S. 476; 20 W. R. 49. And the same ruling has been followed where the architect merely assured the owner that the building would not cost over a certain sum. Kemp v. Rose, 1 Giff. 258. But where the defendants employ an architect to superintend the construction of a building of which he is one of the contractors, they cannot plead that it is against public policy that he should occupy two positions, of which the interests are in conflict, in defense of an action brought by him for services as superintendent. Shaw v. Andrews, 9 Cal. 73.

2. An architect cannot at one and the same time be employed by the proprietor and builder, and receive pay from them both; and the fact that an architect has covenanted with the builder to receive payment from him is sufficient to discharge the proprietor. Tahrland v. Rodier, 16 L. C. i. Rep. 473. And see Norris v. Day, 4 Y. & C. Ex. Eq. 475; 10 L. J. N. S. 43.

The supreme court of Missouri held that an agreement by a lumber dealer to pay the superintendent of a building, whose duty it was to pass upon accounts for materials furnished, but not to make purchases, a commission on all sales of lumber made to his employers through his influence, was against public policy and void. Atlee v. Fink, 75 Mo. 100; 42 Am. Rep. 385. But the same court held that words written of a supervising architect, charging him with having given work upon the building to certain parties who paid him a commission therefor, are not actionable per se. Legg v. Dunleavy, 80 Mo. 558; 50 Am. Rep. 512.

It has been held that advances or loans made to the architect by the builder can be proved by the owner as bearing upon the question of negligence alleged in the answer, fraud not being claimed. Gilman v. Stevens, 54 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 197.

3. It is often provided that the architect shall receive a fixed commission or percentage on the whole contract price of the work. See Irving v. Morrison, 27 U. C. C. P. 242; Shipman v. State, 43 Wis. 381; Raeder v. Bensberg, 6 Mo. App. 445.

Where a party agrees to pay for certain plans and specifications for buildings, a percentage on their "estimated cost," and there is nothing in the contract to determine the matter, the "estimated cost" will be taken to mean the reasonable cost of buildings erected is said upon the subject, he will be allowed a reasonable compensation.¹ It may be stated as a general principle that the obliga-in accordance with the plans and specifications. Lambert v. Sanford, 55 Conn. 437.

Where there is a contract for the plans and superintendence of a building, at a percentage on the cost, and the architect is prevented by the owner from superintending, he may treat the contract as rescinded and sue for the value of the plans furnished. Marcotte v. Beaupre, 15 Minn. 152.

Suit for Compensation.—The plaintiff, who was an architect, sued for remuneration in respect of employment under a contract made in 1877, and for damages for an alleged wrongful dismissal from such employment in 1880. The plaintiff was adjudicated bankrupt in 1878, and had never obtained his discharge. It was held that the cause of action for remuneration and damages passed to the trustee, and that the proper course was to add him as co-plaintiff in the action, and give him the conduct of the action. Emden v. Carte, 17 Ch. Div. 768; 51 L. J. Ch. 41; 44 L. T. 636, affirming 17 Ch. Div. 169; 50 L. J. Ch. 492; 44 L. T. 344; 29 W. R. 600.

An architect, under a contract to plan and superintend the building of seven houses, having completed three and been paid for them, and having agreed to wait a reasonable time for the erection of the other four, for which he had made his plans and specifications, may, in a suit for the payment of his services on such four, declare the original contract, the other being merely an extension of time of payment. Maack v. Schneider, 51 Mo. App. 92.

Promise to Pay—Consideration.—Where the architect engaged in the erection of a brewery declines to proceed with his undertaking upon discovering that the contract for the refrigerating plant has been awarded to a business rival of the refrigerating company of which he is president, takes away his plans, and calls off his superintendent in charge of the building, a promise by the president of the brewery company, who was in great haste to have the building completed, to pay him a commission of five per cent. upon the cost of the refrigerating plant as an inducement to resume work, is void for want of consideration. Lingenfelder

v. Wainwright Brewery Co., 103 Mo. 578.

He will be allowed a reasonable compensation for his services, taking into consideration their professional character and the attendant circumstances. Lloyd's Law of Building and Buildings (2d ed.), § 8.

In Knight v. Norris, 13 Minn. 473, a charge of five per cent. on the estimated cost was held customary and reasonable. And to the same effect see Mulligan v. Mulligan, 18 La. Ann. 20.

An architect who has performed part of his contract according to its terms, and is prevented from completing it by the failure of the other party, is entitled to compensation for the work performed. Chicago v. Tilley, 103 U. S. 146.

In Gilman v. Stevens, 54 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 197, the schedule charges of the American Institute of Architects, namely, two and one-half per cent. upon the contemplated cost of the building, was recognized as showing the customary legitimate rate of compensation for an architect's services.

In Smithmeyer v. U. S., 147 U. S. 342, it was held that the acts of the parties in accepting salaries, one of eight thousand dollars per year as architect, and the other of three thousand dollars per year as principal draughtsman, indicated that the services of the plaintiffs should be estimated according to the rule of quantum meruit, and not according to the schedule of charges of the American Institute of Architects.

Usage Among Architects.—A usage among architects, especially if unknown to customers, will not entitle them to be paid for preliminary sketches and estimates on the basis of a percentage on their own estimates. Such services, unless volunteered, should be paid for, if at all, according to the time spent upon them, or according to such understanding as was had or was fairly implied from the circumstances. Scott v. Maier, 56 Mich. 554.

Change of Contract—Quantum Meruit.—Where an architect enters into a contract to furnish the plans and superintend the erection of a house for an agreed price, and the contract is afterwards changed so as to provide for tion of paying for the plans rests upon the party ordering them.¹

8. Lien of Architect.—The question often arises whether an architect is entitled to a lien upon the building for his services, similar to that allowed mechanics and material men. The decisions upon this point are not uniform, depending in many instances upon the wording of the local statutes.² The Pennsylvania decisions allow him a lien where he furnishes plans and specifications, and superintends the erection of the building,³ but decline to allow it where such supervision is not given, but only plans and specifications provided;⁴ and in all the instances in which the lien has been allowed, the architect also acted as superintendent.⁵ In Kentucky, plans for a more expensive house, with no price agreed on for the plans, the architect, in an action upon the quantum meruit for his services, may prove the value of such plans and additional services rendered by him not included therein. Marcotte v. Beaupre, 15 Minn. 152.

1. The obligation of paying for the drawings of an architect usually rests on the employer, and not on the mechanics or contractors employed in executing them. Webb v. School, 3 Phila. (Pa.) 125.

2. See MECHANICS' LIENS, vol. 15, p. 44.

3. In Pennsylvania Bank v. Gries, 35 Pa. St. 423, it is said that it seems that a mere architect, who only furnishes the plans and drawings, and performs no services in the construction of the building, is not entitled to a lien. Thompson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The contract in this case denominates the plaintiff an architect. That he was at the same time a mechanic, is evident from the requirement not only to draw plans of the work to be done, but the duty of explaining and directing its proper execution. This is work often done by the master mechanic, and is as essential to the due construction of a building as is the purely mechanical part; for, without it, shape, symmetry, and proportion would be wanting—elements, not of beauty alone, but of strength and convenience, in every superstructure. To preserve these elements, some architectural skill is required, but is generally exercised, in ordinary buildings, by a mere mechanic by occupation. This would certainly not impair his right to a lien as such mechanic. A mere naked architect, and who may be such without being an operative mechanic, who draws plans in anticipation of buildings usually, to enable the builder to determine the kind he will erect, could hardly be supposed to be within the act which provides a lien for work 'done for or about the erection or construction of the building.' But very distinguishable from this, is the case of a party employed to devote his entire time to a building, and who draws plans for every part of the work, and directs its execution according to such plans and specifications. This is labor—mechanical labor of a high order—contributing its proportionate value to the beauty, strength and convenience of the edifice."

4. An architect who simply provides the plans and specifications for a building is not entitled to a lien against the building for his labor. Price v. Kirk, 90 Pa. St. 47. And see Rush v. Able, 90 Pa. St. 153.

See Pennsylvania, etc., R. Co. v. Leuffer, 84 Pa. St. 168; 24 Am. Rep. 189, as to the right of a civil engineer to a lien upon a railroad for services rendered in its construction.

Claim Must Be Set Forth Distinctly.—In Rush v. Able, 90 Pa. St. 153, it was held that where an architect claims to have a lien for charges and fees, he must show work done for which the statute gives a lien, and such work is not shown by the name of his calling. Especially should the kind of work be set forth distinctly when it is claimed as extra work by the contractor, and a mere claim for "architect's charges and fees" is insufficient.

5. Pennsylvania Bank v. Gries, 35 Pa. St. 423; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Rowand, 26 N. J. Eq. 389; Hubert v. Aitken, 15 Daly (N. Y.) 237; Stryker v. Cassidy, 76 N. Y. 50; 32 Am. Rep. 262; Knight v. Norris, 13 Minn. 473;

Mulligan v. Mulligan, 18 La. Ann. 20; Arnoldi v. Gonrin, 22 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 314.

Under a statute providing that "whoever performs labor or furnishes materials or machinery for erecting, constructing, altering, or repairing any house . . . or other building, . . . by virtue of a contract or agreement with the owner or agent thereof, shall have a lien to secure the payment of the same," it was held that an architect had a lien for furnishing plans and specifications for, and superintending the construction of, a building. The court said: "We are of opinion that services of the kind for which the plaintiff seeks the lien are embraced in the meaning of the statute. In rendering such services a party certainly 'performs labor' and furnishes labor and skill. The labor is performed and the labor and skill furnished 'for erecting' and 'constructing' a building. . . . The labor and skill of an architect and superintendent of the work upon a building are a part of the expense of erecting a building, and not unfrequently an indispensable and highly valuable part. As an item of such expense they enter into and help to form the value of the building, and we can conceive of no sound reason in the nature of things why the person who performs such labor and furnishes such skill should not receive the same protection as the carpenter, the mason, the lumber dealer, or the hardware merchant." Knight v. Norris, 13 Minn. 473. In this case it was also held that where an architect is to receive what his services are reasonably worth, and, before his contract is wholly performed, work on the building is without his fault suspended, he may file his account and claim a lien for his services up to that time, without waiting for the work to be resumed or completed.

In Hubert v. Aitken, 15 Daly (N. Y.) 237, the right to the lien was not questioned. And in Stryker v. Cassidy, 76 N. Y. 50; 32 Am. Rep. 262, Andrews, J., said: "The architect who superintends the construction of a building performs labor as truly as the carpenter who frames it, or the mason who lays the walls, and labor of the most important character. It is not any the less labor, within the general meaning of the word, that it is done by a person who is fitted by a special training and skill for its performance."

Ericsson v. Brown, 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 390, may at first glance seem to be in conflict with the New York cases cited above, but is easily distinguishable from them. It was there held that a consulting engineer, who rendered services as such, was not within the language or reason of a clause of a steamship company's charter, providing that the stockholders should be individually liable for debts due and owing to their "laborers and operatives" for services performed for the corporation. See Gurney v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 58 N. Y. 358, where this case is distinguished; and see also Stryker v. Cassidy, 76 N. Y. 50; 32 Am. Rep. 262.

In Taylor v. Gilsdorff, 74 Ill. 359, the claim was not for services as mere architects, but as architects and superintendents. The jury found in favor of the claimant, and the court, without saying how it might be with the mere architect, who simply draws a plan for the building, declined to disturb the verdict.

Under the Louisiana statute providing that "every mechanic, workman, or other person, doing or performing any work towards the erection, construction, or finishing of any building in the state, erected under a contract between the owner and builder, or other person, whether such work shall be performed as journeymen, laborer, cartman, subcontractor, or otherwise," should be entitled to a lien upon the building to secure the payment therefor, it was held that a supervising architect had a lien for his fees. Mulligan v. Mulligan, 18 La. Ann. 20.

In Canada, under the Mechanics' Lien Act of 1874, it is also held that an architect is entitled to a lien for moneys due him for making plans and specifications for, and superintending the erection of, buildings for the owner. Arnoldi v. Gouin, 22 Grant's Ch. (Ont.) 314; Proudfoot, V. C., in delivering the opinion of the court in this case, said: "The duties of an architect in preparing elevations, working plans, specifications, superintending the construction of the building according to the plans, and seeing that proper material is used, etc., are essential things to be done in the construction of the work, and the architect seems to me, if not comprehended under the designation of 'builder,' to come under that of 'other person.' There is nothing to show that the person to be protected must have actually carried the stone or brick, or hewn the wood used in the building. The man who designs the building and superintends its erection, as actually

Maine, and Missouri, a lien has been refused the architect, even though he superintended the construction of the building.¹

VII. PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—1. Implied Conditions.²—There is an implied condition in every working contract that the work shall be performed in a proper and workmanlike manner,³ within a reasonable time,⁴ and that it will be serviceable for the purpose for which it is constructed.⁵ It is also implied that the employer does work upon it as though he had carried the hod.⁶

1. Foushee v. Grigsby, 12 Bush (Ky.) 75; Ames v. Dyer, 41 Me. 397; Raeder v. Bensberg, 6 Mo. App. 445.

In Ames v. Dyer, 41 Me. 397, plaintiffs sought to recover the value of their labor in making a set of moulds, by which the ship upon which the lien was claimed was constructed, and for materials used in making the same, and it was held that the plan of the house, the model of the ship, or the mould by which the ship's timbers are formed, do not enter into the structure, and cannot be regarded as within the statutes by which liens are given, in certain cases, to the material man and the laborer.

2. Place of Performance.—A covenant to make bricks and build a house, no place being appointed in the covenant, is to be performed wherever the obligee shall appoint, in the state. Trabue v. Kay, 4 Bibb (Ky.) 226.

3. Lucas v. Godwin, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 737; 32 E. C. L. 300; Pearce v. Tucker, 3 F. & F. 136. And see Hunt v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 51 Pa. St. 475.

Work, under a contract which omits to specify the manner of its being done, is, by implication of law, to be done in a workmanlike manner. And the fact that the price agreed to be paid was grossly inadequate, makes no difference. Smith v. Bristol, 33 Iowa 24.

Where one contracts to do all the millwright work necessary in the construction of a gristmill, he is bound to do it in a workmanlike manner, so that it will answer the purpose for which it is intended. Wade v. Haycock, 25 Pa. St. 382.

A workman being bound to do his work in a workmanlike manner, it is no excuse for his doing it so as to be useless, that it was not possible to do it otherwise, unless he told his employer so. Pearce v. Tucker, 3 F. & F. 136.

Where the work turns out to have been done in a negligent or unwork-manlike manner, damages may be recovered. See Van Buskirk v. Murden, 22 Ill. 446.

Where a builder agrees to build a house and have it "fit for use and occupation," he is responsible for everything; but where he agrees to complete a partially existing building, his responsibility for the fitness of old walls, which he did not contribute, must depend upon a specific provision to that effect. Gibbons v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 174.

4. See infra, this section, Time of Performance.

5. Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108.

Where the contract calls for the erection of a drawbridge upon which the cars of a railway company can cross, it implies that the bridge will be serviceable for that purpose and capable of being used with like facility as similar bridges properly constructed. Florida R. Co. v. Smith, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 255.

An agreement to dig a well does not imply that water other than surface water shall be obtained. Littrell v. Wilcox, 11 Mont. 77.

Where a plaintiff declares on a quantum meruit for work and labor, and materials, the defendant may reduce the damages by showing that the work was improperly done, and may entitle himself to a verdict by showing that it was wholly inadequate to answer the purpose intended. Farnsworth v. Garrard, 1 Campb. 38; Grounsell v. Lamb, 1 M. & W. 352.

See American Well-Works v. Rivers, 36 Fed. Rep. 880, where it was held that a written contract, by which plaintiff agrees to sink an artesian well for defendant, supplying a given quantity of water, does not require that the water should be potable and fit for washing and for making steam, though plaintiff knew defendant was an hotel keeper, and desired water of that character for hotel purposes.

will do all things necessary to be done by him for the completion of the contract, and within a reasonable time.¹

2. Substantial Performance.—A substantial performance of the contract is all that the law requires, and the employer will not be permitted to avoid payment because the strict letter of the agreement has not been carried out.² Slight deviations, there-

The employer impliedly undertakes that the place shall be free from danger and fit for the work to be done there. Sinnatt v. Mullin, 82 Pa. St. 333.

Although a contract appears, upon its face, to be obligatory upon one party only, yet if the act to be done by the party binding himself can only be done upon a corresponding act being done or allowed by the other party, an obligation by the latter to do, or allow to be done, the act or things necessary for the completion of the contract, will be necessarily implied. Black v. Woodrow, 39 Md. 194.

Place for Materials.—Under a building contract, unless especially provided, the owner is not required to furnish the contractor with a place to store the building materials. Wright v. Meyer (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 1122.

2. Goldsmith v. Hand, 26 Ohio St. 101; Rose v. O'Riley, 111 Mass. 57; Cullen v. Sears, 112 Mass. 299; Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648; Smith v. Gurgerty, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 614; Hunt v. Elliott, 77 Cal. 588; Miller v. Phillips, 31 Pa. St. 218; Woodruff v. Hough, 91 U. S. 596. And see Brabazon v. Seymour, 42 Conn. 551; Woodworth v. Hammond, 19 Neb. 215.

A literal performance of a building contract in every detail is not a condition precedent to the right of the contractor to require payment. Heckman v. Pinkney, 81 N. Y. 211; Woodward v. Fuller, 80 N. Y. 312; Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145; 10 Am. Rep. 449.

The performance need not in all cases be literal and exact to enable the contractor to recover the consideration due upon performance; it is sufficient if, acting in good faith and intending and attempting to perform, he does so substantially. He may then recover, notwithstanding slight or trivial defects for which compensation can be made by an allowance to the other party. Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648.

In an action on a contract, an instruction to find for the plaintiff the contract price, if the jury believe that he substantially complied with the contract, is not erroneous, though it fails to define what is meant by "substantial compliance." Johnson v. White (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 174.

Where one agrees to do work as an entirety, as, for instance, to lay pavement at a certain sum "per square yard, which shall include two feet of grading," he is entitled to the amount, notwithstanding that, in certain places, no grading was done. Cranford v. District of Columbia, 20 Ct. of Cl. 376.

A contract to well and sufficiently heat a building about to be erected is performed when the machinery and equipments furnished are sufficient in quality, size and power to heat the building as the same was exhibited in the plans shown to the contractor. Phoenix Iron Co. v. The Richmond, 6 Mackey (D. C.) 180. And a contract to rebuild a mill "to be furnished with machinery in all respects similar to that in the mill burned," is substantially performed by placing in the mill the machinery in actual use at the time of the fire. Ellis v. Lane, 85 Pa. St. 265.

A contract to construct an "adjustable stern dock" does not require a dock which is automatically adjustable, but one which is adjustable by cutting and filling in its gates so that they will conform to the contour of the hull of the vessel, especially where the term is treated as a technical one, and the experts agree upon that definition of it. International Bow, etc., Dock Co. v. U. S., 60 Fed. Rep. 523.

A contract to erect a building of "the best lumber" means the best lumber of which buildings were ordinarily constructed at that place. McIntire v. Barnes, 4 Colo. 285.

A contract is substantially performed where the price of the work to be done is twenty-one thousand dollars and all had been done except small matters, which could be completed for one hundred and fifty dollars. Monteverde v.

Queens County (Supreme Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 918; 78 Hun (N. Y.) 267. And the finding of a referee that a contract to build a house to cost seven thousand dollars, was substantially performed, though there were defects amounting to two hundred and seventy-five dollars, will be sustained on appeal, where it plainly appears that the builder intended to fulfill the contract. Valk v. McKeize (Supreme Ct.), 16 N. Y. Supp. 741.

The plaintiff contracted to erect a building for six thousand dollars. When he finished the work there were certain defects which it cost six hundred and fifty-six dollars and twenty-nine cents to remedy. Under a condition of the contract, the owner remedied the defects to the amount of four hundred and thirty-nine dollars and twenty-nine cents. It was held that a finding by the referee, debiting the contractor with the amount expended by the owner on remedying the defects, that the damage was not sufficiently great to show wanton neglect and that the contract was substantially performed, need not be set aside. Crouch v. Gutmann, 10 N. Y. Supp. 275; affirmed 134 N. Y. 45.

But in Flaherty v. Miner, 123 N. Y. 382, an allowance by the jury of six hundred dollars for uncompleted work, upon a contract for three thousand five hundred dollars, was considered to show a failure of substantial performance.

A provision in a contract, "all flooring to be laid smooth and level, and free from knots," means free from all kinds of knots, both hard and soft. Rush v. Wagner (Brooklyn City Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 2.

A contract for repairs to a building called for an "O. gas engine of best capacity" to run the elevator, but no rate of speed or weight to be moved was specified. The engine was put in perfect, and was approved by the owner, but subsequently, not being considered strong enough, a larger one was substituted by the owner. It appeared that both sizes were used in running elevators of the kind in question, and it was held, in an action against the contractor for breach of the contract, that a finding for the defendant should not be disturbed. Horgan v. McKenzie (C. Pl.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 174.

The plaintiffs, in their contract with the defendant for drilling a well, guaranteed to get "the water from the bed rock," unless they should find good water, acceptable to the defendant, at a less depth. It was held that the contract was satisfied by getting bed rock water, and could not be construed as guarantying good water, or as presenting a case of ambiguity admitting of evidence of the circumstances under which it was made to give such a meaning to the words. Book v. New Castle Wire Nail Co., 151 Pa. St. 499.

In an action to recover the contract price for drilling and sinking a well, the plaintiffs testified that water in sufficient quantity was not reached until at the depth of two hundred and sixty-two feet, and was then obtained in abundance; that it was only requisite then to put on a screen at the bottom and clean out the sand; that in putting it down the screen got caught, and the defendant ordered them to stop work. It was held that the jury were warranted in finding a substantial compliance with the contract. Madden v. Oestrich, 46 Minn. 538.

In Bohrer v. Stumpff, 31 Ill. App. 139, the plaintiff sued to recover a balance due on a contract for sinking a well, under an agreement to continue the work until water should be found or the owner satisfied. It was held that under such agreement, a reasonable depth, considering the means to be used, need only be attained.

"Available" Work. — The plaintiffs agreed to manufacture for the defendants, out of material to be furnished by the latter, "available phosphoric acid." The defendants sold some of the acid to a third person, who, on examination, refused to accept it because of its inferior quality, but he afterward took it at a reduced price. It was held that the acid, being salable, was "available" within the meaning of the contract. Clark v. Adams (Super. Ct.), 3 N. Y. Supp. 819; 55 N. Y. Super. Ct. 560.

Evidence. — See Lange v. Johnson (Wis. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 1109.

In an action for breach of building contract, which, after specifying by numbers various materials to be used, recited: "The above numbers refer to P. Bros.' catalogue," evidence that a certain portion used by the builder, for which the contract called for "No. 47," was substantially like "P. No. 47," is admissible, as the contract meant simply that P. Bros.' materials of the specified numbers should be used as models. Linch v. Paris Lumber, etc., Elevator Co., 80 Tex. 23.

fore,¹ or technical, unimportant, or inadvertent omissions or defects, will not bar a recovery.² The ornamentation of a building, however, is a matter of substance, and variations or omissions from the specifications have been held to constitute a breach of the contract.³

Where the contractor has substantially performed his part, but the result does not come up to the requirements of the contract owing to defects in the plans,⁴ or to defective work or machinery furnished by the employer, or some error or omission of the latter, the contractor cannot be held liable;⁵ nor is he chargeable with

In an action by contractors on a building contract, evidence to prove work done in a manner or with material essentially different from that specified in their contract is inadmissible, as contractors are bound to construct the building substantially as specified in the contract; but evidence that the work done in the manner specified in the contract was done in a workmanlike manner is admissible, especially when the defendant has pleaded that the work was not done so, and that by reason thereof she has suffered damage. Aldrich v. Wilmarth (S. Dak. 1893), 54 N. W. Rep. 811.

There is a substantial performance of a building contract where the only deviation from the plans was an error in measurement, by which the roof of the rear addition of the house was built five inches too low, and it is undisputed that this deviation did not affect the appearance or value of the house. *Oberlies v. When building contractors have in good faith substantially complied with their contract, though there be slight defects caused by inadvertence or unintentional omissions, they may recover the contract price, less the damage sustained on account of such defects. Aldrich v. Wilmarth (S. Dak. 1893), 54 N. W. Rep. 811.

Where an oil well drilled under contract is so far perfected in accordance with the contract as to answer the intended purpose, and is taken possession of and turned to that purpose, no mere imperfection, which is not willful, will prevent a recovery therefor; but the damage caused by such imperfection will be deducted from the contract price. Holmes v. Chartiers Oil Co., 138 Pa. St. 546.

Small and unimportant portions of the work, remaining undone by the plaintiff, are not sufficient to preclude his right to a payment which is not a final payment, where such work could have been done readily thereafter, and there was no proof but that it would have been done had the payment been made. *Highton v. In Waggoner v. Stocks, 41 Ill. App. 151, the plaintiff agreed to bore a well on the defendant's land that would permanently furnish sufficient water for his cattle, sixty days to be allowed in which to test the capacity of the well, and the permanency of the water supply. The well was dug, and the defendant put in a pump which lacked thirty-five feet of reaching the bottom. It was held that the fact that the flow defects resulting from changes made during the progress of the building with the owner's consent.¹ If the contractor is to have the right to remedy defects in the work, and the employer refuses to permit it, he may also recover.²

But there must be a substantial performance of the contract before there can be any recovery;³ and where performance is of water was not sufficient to supply the cattle did not show that the plaintiff had not complied with the contract.

If an owner interferes with a contractor, and subjects him to his command, the contractor is not liable for injuries to his work occasioned thereby. Rohrman v. Steese, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 185.

Where there has been a substantial compliance with a building contract, by the contractor, he is not chargeable with certain repairs and changes subsequently made by the employer, which are not due to defective work. Coon v. Citizens' Water Co., 152 Pa. St. 644.

A contractor is not responsible for defects in the work arising out of the unfitness of the materials furnished him by the employer. True v. Bryant, 32 N. H. 241.

Where the defendants contracted to erect a cofferdam, to enable the plaintiffs to prosecute their work, they were not thereby required to raise or strengthen a contiguous dam, nor rendered liable for water coming through or over it. Skelsey v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 61.

Under a contract for the erection of a monument, the inscription to include four lines of verse, it is the duty of the persons ordering the monument to furnish the verse, and, failing in this, the contractor may omit the verse, and recover the contract price, less the cost of the inscription. Eastern Granite Co. v. Heim (Iowa, 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 437.

In Strack v. Hurd (Supreme Ct.), 16 N. Y. Supp. 566, it was held that the question whether the employer had failed to perform his part of the contract was properly submitted to the jury, on conflicting evidence.

In a suit by a contractor for the price to be paid him for building a house, it is error to charge the jury that, if the building does not come up to the requirements of the contract, and any deficiency was on account of the acts or interference of the defendant, the plaintiff is not at fault, and is entitled to recover, where the declaration fails to allege that the failure to build the house according to the contract was caused by the acts or interference of the defendant, and the testimony totally fails to show any act or interference on his part. Livingston v. Anderson, 30 Fla. 117.

Defects in soil do not excuse performance of a contract to erect a building. Stees v. Leonard, 20 Minn. 494.

1. It must clearly appear that such consent was fairly obtained, and given with knowledge of all material circumstances. Bryant v. Stilwell, 24 Pa. St. 314.

Modification of Contract.—Although a contract for constructing a building is made under seal, and a performance of it, according to its terms, cannot be shown, yet, if there has been a modification of it by parol, and the contractor was prevented by this modification, and the acts of the employer, from performing according to the sealed contract, and has performed according to the parol modification, he may maintain an action for the reasonable value of his labor and materials. Siebert v. Leonard, 17 Minn. 433.

2. In an action to recover on a contract for digging a well, there was evidence that the plaintiff was to have the right to fix the well if it did not work, and that defendant refused to permit him to do so. It was held that a verdict for the plaintiff should not be disturbed. Bennett v. Teetzel, 34 Ill. App. 295.

Before one can recover for work done under a special contract, he must show that he has done substantially that which the contract required that he should do. Moll v. Foery, 43 Hun (N. Y.) 476.

A party being entitled to receive certain bonds (left in escrow), on completion of a truss railway bridge within three years, must perform the condition strictly to entitle himself to the bonds. It is not enough that he builds a different kind of bridge, though as good as or better than a truss bridge, or that he builds the truss bridge after the three years. Winona v. Minnesota R. Constr. Co., 27 Minn. 415.

No action will lie on a contract to furnish materials and work of a specific character to be paid for on performance, unless it is done substantially in the manner stipulated. Lewis v. Yagel (Supreme Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 833; 77 Hun (N. Y.) 337. And a defect in the construction of a building may be a substantial defect, though it does not run through the entire structure, and can be remedied without disturbing or interfering with the main building. Oberlies v. Bullinger (Supreme Ct.), 27 N. Y. Supp. 19; 75 Hun (N. Y.) 248.

Where the jury allowed six hundred dollars for uncompleted work upon a contract for thirty-five hundred dollars, thus probably showing a want of substantial performance, the judgment will not be reversed nevertheless, where there is evidence that the defendants waived full performance. Flaherty v. Miner, 123 N. Y. 382.

The contractor cannot show that the work could not have been done in a workmanlike manner for the price. Williams v. Keech, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 168. But if the employer has the work done over, and in doing so uses the materials of the contractor, he must pay for them. Elliott v. Wilkinson, 8 Yerg. (Tenn.) 411.

What Is Not a Substantial Performance.—A contract for the erection of a building provided that a certain payment should be due "when the plastering was finished." The contractor abandoned the job, leaving the hall and parlor without their last coat of plaster, and the stairs, under which there should have been plastering, not put up. It was held that there was such a substantial failure to complete the plastering that the payment was not due. Van Clief v. Van Vechten (Supreme Ct.),

8 N. Y. Supp. 760; modified 130 N. Y. 571.

In an action for services rendered under a contract, it appeared that the plaintiff agreed to construct a stable floor so as to be water-tight. The ground floor below was to be used as a repository for carriages, and it was necessary that the stable floor be absolutely water-tight. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover where it appeared that the floor was not water-tight. Sherwood v. Houtman (Supreme Ct.), 26 N. Y. Supp. 150; 73 Hun (N. Y.) 544.

A contract to build a mill fifty feet by one hundred and fifty, is not substantially complied with by building one that is seventy-eight feet by one hundred; though the purpose of the contract was to give the vendor security for the purchase-money of the lot, and though the mill built costs more, and is better adapted to the purposes for which it was intended, than the one agreed to be built. Swain v. Seamens, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 254.

An agreement that subsills of sidewalks shall be of oak and two inches by six, is not complied with by putting in subsills of pine two inches by four, it appearing that those required would last twice as long as those furnished; nor can there be a recovery on a quantum meruit, the city for which the sidewalks were furnished refusing to accept them, and not having waived a performance of the contract. Denton v. Atchison, 34 Kan. 438.

In an action on a contract for putting parquet floors in the defendant's house, the work to be "first-class," the evidence showed that first-class work required the blocks to be so seasoned and so well laid that there would be no space between them; that after being laid the blocks shrank, and the plaintiff repeatedly repaired the work; and that after it was repaired the defendant expressed satisfaction with the work, but the blocks again shrank. It was held that a nonsuit was proper though the plaintiff gave evidence that the floors were of the best material and workmanship. Boughton v. Smith, 142 N. Y. 674.

The plaintiff contracted to construct a building for the defendant according to the plan and specifications which were made a part of the contract. Moreover, the contract expressly stipulated that the plaintiff should not vary in any manner from the plan and specifications without the written consent of

made a condition of payment and there is an important and voluntary deviation or omission, the contractor can have no remedy for the materials furnished and the services performed.¹ It is only where there is an honest intention to go by the contract and a substantial execution of it, or the work and materials are of value and benefit to the employer, and enjoyed by him, that he can be allowed to recover upon a quantum meruit or quantum valebat.²

the defendant. It was held, in an action for breach of contract, that the contract having called for a particular kind and make of columns, and it appearing that they could have been procured, evidence that the columns substituted for them were substantially like them was immaterial and irrelevant. Linch v. Paris Lumber, etc., Co. (Tex. 1890), 14 S. W. Rep. 701.

In Zimmerman v. Jourgensen (Supreme Ct.), 24 N. Y. Supp. 170, the plaintiffs agreed to make certain alterations in the defendant's building. The contract provided for three payments, the last ten days after completion, and further that, should the contractor refuse or neglect to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen, the owner could provide them, after three days' notice in writing to finish the work, the expense to be deducted from the amount of the contract. After the first two installments had been paid, the defendant elected, under such provisions, to complete the work himself. The plaintiffs sued for the third installment, less the value of completing the building, alleging that the work was substantially completed when the defendant took possession. It appeared that at that time the floors were not laid; that portions of the building were exposed to the weather; that some of the work had to be done over, and that more was expended in completing the building than remained unpaid under the contract. It was held that the plaintiffs could not recover. The fact that the defendant, in completing the building, departed from the plans by introducing additional work, made no difference where the contract provided for alterations in the plans and it was not shown that such changes were made in bad faith.

Where a plaintiff agreed to dig a well for the defendant at a certain rate per foot, and to furnish him a sufficient quantity of water for his stock and family, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover where the supply of water is altogether insufficient for the purposes intended. Genni v. Hahn, 82 Wis. 92.

Where a requirement of a building contract, that the cellar be made watertight (its situation making it subject to the flowing of water), is not performed, and the omission is not shown to have been unintentional, there is not a substantial performance of the contract; and the refusal of an architect to give the certificate required by the contract as a condition precedent to the last payment thereon is not unreasonable, and the builder cannot recover such payment. Weeks v. O'Brien (Super. Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 720.

Evidence.—The employer may show in what particulars the contractors have done their work poorly, and how much it cost him to reconstruct their work and to complete the building. Schuler v. Eckert, 90 Mich. 165. And it is error to exclude testimony as to the difference between the buildings constructed, and others built in a good and workmanlike manner. Kilbourne v. Jennings, 40 Iowa 473.

The doctrine of "substantial compliance" with building contracts does not apply when the omissions or departures from the contract are intentional, and so substantial as not to be capable of remedy, and that an allowance out of the contract price would not give the owner essentially what he contracted for. *Elliott v. The burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff, in an action upon the contract, to establish substantial performance of the contract.¹ Whether the defects are substantial, or technical and unimportant, is a question of fact for the jury,² and, where the

In Pinches v. Swedish Lutheran Church, 55 Conn. 183, it was said that courts of eminent authority in England and United States have held that no recovery can be had for labor or materials furnished under a special contract, unless the contract has been performed according to its terms, or its performance has been dispensed with by the other party, but that the hardship of this rule upon the contractor who has undesignedly violated his contract, and the inequitable advantage it gives to the party who receives and retains the benefit of his labor and materials, has led to its qualification, and the weight of authority is now clearly in favor of allowing compensation for such services and materials, where the deviation was not willful and the other party has availed himself of and been benefited by, such labor and materials. And see Hayward v. Leonard, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 181; 19 Am. Dec. 269; Smith v. First Cong. Meetinghouse, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 178; Moulton v. McOwen, 103 Mass. 587; Ingle v. Jones, 2 Wall. (U. Hence, where a schoolhouse, erected on the land of a district, was of real and substantial value for the purposes intended, and the builder had attempted in good faith to comply with his contract, it was held that he could recover what the building was reasonably worth, though it did not comply with the contract. School Dist. No. 2 v. Boyer, 46 Kan. 54.

Where one party has contracted to perform work for another and furnish materials, and the work is done and the materials are furnished, but not in the manner stipulated, so that he cannot recover the price agreed upon, if the work and materials are of any value and benefit to the other party, he may recover for the work done and the materials furnished. School Dist. No. 46 v. Lund, 57 Kan. 731.

The fact that some departures from the contract for erecting a school building have been made without the consent, express or implied, of the district officers, architect, or superintendent, and in disregard of their directions, will not bar a recovery for other portions of the work which have been duly approved; but the district would have a right to insist on the proper changes in the work to make it conform to the contract, and to recover any damages sustained by the failure; and this even after taking possession of the building and occupying it for school purposes. Such occupancy would not import an acceptance constituting an estoppel. Willey v. Fractional School Dist. No. 1, 25 Mich. 419.

But though slight deviations or imperfections will not bar a recovery, a just allowance for such defects, trivial though they are, must be made to the owner. A party is entitled to compensation for small or slight injuries as well as those of larger extent,² and the cost of supplying the omissions or making the alterations necessary to comply with the contract, will be deducted always.³

South Cong. Meetinghouse v. Hilton, 11 Gray (Mass.) 407.

1. The question, where the evidence is contradictory, is peculiarly one for a jury, and motions to dismiss and for the direction of a verdict, are properly denied. Gibbons v. Russell (Brooklyn City Ct.), 13 N. Y. Supp. 879.

In an action on a contract to lay a floor "free from knots," where the evidence as to the number of knots was conflicting, it was for the jury to determine whether such knotty condition was a trivial or material violation, of the contract. Rush v. Wagner (Brooklyn City Ct.), 12 N. Y. Supp. 2.

In an action for work done under an express contract, where the evidence shows that the work was not done originally in accordance with the contract, but that the plaintiffs, with the defendant's permission, undertook to remedy the defects, until finally the defendant expressed himself satisfied, it is proper to submit to the jury the question whether the plaintiffs substantially performed their contract. Boughton v. Smith (Supreme Ct.), 22 N. Y. Supp. 148; 67 Hun (N. Y.) 652.

In an action for the price of putting a tin roof on the defendant's house, it appeared conclusively that the proper manner of fastening it was to place cleats on it as near as possible to the seams, and to nail each cleat with two nails. There was evidence that much of the work was not so done, and that consequently the roof was torn off by the wind. As against this evidence, two of the workmen testified that they did all their work in the proper manner, and that, as far as they knew, it was all done so; but there was another workman, who was not a witness, and there was no evidence that his work was properly done. It was held that judgment should be rendered for the defendant without giving the case to the jury. Muth v. Frost, 75 Wis. 166.

A contractor is entitled to recover where there has been a substantial performance, but not necessarily the whole contract price. American Iron Bridge Mfg. Co.*, 83 Pa. St. 517.

In an action on a special contract for work done under the contract, and for work, labor, and materials generally, the defendant may give in evidence that the work has been done improperly, and not agreeably to the contract; and the plaintiff in that case will only be entitled to recover the real value of the work done and the materials supplied. Chapel v. Hickes, 2 C. & M. 214; 4 Tyr. 43.

The law does not require a party to pay for imperfect and defective work the price stipulated for a perfect structure; and, when that price is demanded, will allow him to deduct the difference between that price and the value of the inferior work, and also the amount of any direct damages flowing from existing defects, not exceeding the demand of the plaintiffs. The deduction is allowed in a suit upon the contract to prevent circuity of action. Florida R. Co. v. Smith, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 255.

taking possession of one's own land upon which a building has been erected, or permanent erections made, does not necessarily imply a waiver of strict performance.¹ A distinction exists

By continuing in possession and using a building in which alterations have been made, the owner does not waive a condition precedent as to payment. Gove v. Island City Mercantile, etc., Co., 16 Oregon 93; Crane v. Knubel, 43 How. Pr. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 389.

But taking possession and using a building may be considered, in connection with all the facts and circumstances of the case, as tending to show a waiver. Boteler v. Roy, 40 Mo. App. 234.

If the owner is satisfied to receive the house, if not at the contract price, at what it is reasonably worth, he is bound to pay the value received to an amount not exceeding the contract price. Becker v. Hecker, 9 Ind. 497.

In Davis v. Badders (Ala. 1892), 10 So. Rep. 422, it was held that where a contract for a building is not entirely performed, but the owner moves in before completion, and remains in possession after it is finished, he is liable for the labor and materials on an implied contract.

And in Taylor v. Williams, 6 Wis. 363, it was held that if a party enters into possession of a completed house, not built according to contract, he thereby admits that it is of some value, and he must pay the builder on a quantum meruit. And see Gouldsmith v. Hand, 26 Ohio St. 101.

The acceptance of work done under a non-apportionable contract to erect an addition to a building must be unequivocal, and cannot be presumed from ordinary acts done as owner of the realty. Fildew v. Besley, 42 Mich. 100; 36 Am. Rep. 433.

In an action for digging a well under a contract that the water furnished should be sufficient for defendant's stock and family, where defendant used such well only to test its capacity to afford sufficient water for the purpose intended, it was error to instruct the between a permanent work erected on the land of the employer and a portable article that may be returned to the maker.¹ The acceptance of permanent erections, however, will operate as a waiver of any right to object to the location.² By accepting the work the owner does not waive his right to recoup damages growing out of the breach of contract.³

A contractor relying on an acceptance of the work as a waiver of substantial performance must both plead and prove it.⁴

4. Part Performance—a. GENERALLY.—Where the contract is entire and it appears to be the intention of the parties to require a full performance before any liability to pay arises, a contractor cannot recover for a partial performance of the contract,⁵ but jury that, if defendant used the well to any extent, they should find for plaintiff. Genni v. Hahn, 82 Wis. 92.

1. Hartuppee v. Pittsburgh, 97 Pa. St. 107.

Where work and labor and materials have been expended in the production of an article not connected in any way with property belonging to the party at whose instance the work has been done, the latter is at liberty to accept it or not, and if he does accept, such acceptance is a waiver of any defect in performance. But where the work is done on property of the other party, so that its results cannot be separated from the necessary consequences of ownership, as work done on another's house or farm, the continued possession and use of such property by the owner is not a waiver of any such defense. Yeats v. Ballentine, 56 Mo. 530. See Conery v. Noyes, 17 La. Ann. 201, as to the effect of the acceptance of a steamboat.

2. Where one party contracts with another to fix on a proper location and erect a mill, the acceptance of the mill is a waiver of any objection to the location. Emerson v. Coggs, 16 Me. 77.

3. Adlard v. Muldoon, 45 Ill. 193; Mitchell v. Wiscotta Land Co., 3 Iowa 209; Wilkey v. Fractional School Dist. No. 1, 25 Mich. 419; Trowbridge v. Barrett, 30 Wis. 661.

Where the work and materials upon a building are not as good as contracted for, the contractor can only recover their reasonable value, not exceeding the contract price, notwithstanding an acceptance of the building, unless it be in full discharge of the contract. Estep v. Fenton, 66 Ill. 467.

In De Lambre v. Williams, 36 La. Ann. 330, it was held that an owner who had accepted a contractor's work, and settled therefor without objection, was estopped to claim damages for non-fulfillment in the quality of the materials used.

5. See CONTRACT, vol. 3, p. 916; Bowery Nat. Bank v. New York, 63 N. Y. 336.

To entitle a party to recover for part performance of a contract, his contract remaining open and unperformed, the circumstances must be such that a new contract may be implied from the conduct of the parties to pay a compensation for the partial performance, and the mere fact that the partial performance is beneficial to a party is not enough from which to imply a promise to pay for it. Elliott v. Caldwell, 43 Minn. 357.

Where plaintiff agreed to construct a creamery and cold-storage building, and to furnish a patent deed conveying the rights under a certain patent, he cannot recover on the contract without proof that the deed was furnished, as that stipulation was a part of the contract. Davis v. Jeffris (S. Dak. 1894), 58 N. W. Rep. 815, 928.

In Sullivan v. Grass Valley Quartz Milling, etc., Co., 77 Cal. 418, the defendant employed the plaintiff to do work at a specified price per foot, but inadvertently let the same work to L. on the same terms, and, on discovery of the mistake, arranged with plaintiff and L. that they do the work together, and agreed that, if plaintiff should find other work, he might terminate the contract. It was held that he having found such work, and notified defendant of the termination, and defendant having measured the work and promised to pay, could not object that the contract was entire, and that there was not a complete performance.

otherwise he can recover the agreed price less the amount required to carry the work to completion.¹

1. Wells v. Board of Education, 78 Mich. 260; Beha v. Ottenberg, 6 Mackey (D. C.) 348; Scofield v. Graw, 63 Vt. 283.

In Bush v. Jones, 2 Tenn. Ch. 190; Wolf v. Gerr, 43 Iowa 339, it was said to be the settled law of those states that a person who performs work and furnishes material under a special agreement may recover compensation for a partial performance, equal to, and limited by, the value of the benefit conferred; in estimating which, the damages sustained by the failure to perform according to contract must be taken into consideration. And in Linnenkohl v. Winkelmeyer, 54 Mo. App. 570, it was held that a party who had performed work of value under a building contract could maintain an action of quantum meruit therefor, notwithstanding that he had failed, without justification, to complete his contract; nor would such right of action be affected by a provision of the contract that his compensation should be payable on the completion of the work and its acceptance by the architect.

Death of Contractor.—If a building contract has been dissolved by the death of the contractor, and the proprietor accepts the work done and materials furnished, he must account to the heirs for their value in the proportion such value bears to the price agreed upon for the construction of the entire building. Thomas v. L'Hote, 22 La. Ann. 73.

Rate of Recovery.—Where there has been only a part performance of a special contract for work at a specified price, the recovery on a quantum meruit (if any) cannot be at a higher rate than that stipulated; and defendant is entitled to offset his damages by reason of breach of contract on plaintiff's part. Bishop v. Price, 24 Wis. 480.

Entire Contracts.—A contract may be entire although payments are to be made periodically as the work progresses. Quigley v. De Haas, 82 Pa. St. 267.

If a contractor agrees with a railroad company to grade a section of its road, and do all necessary to make the road ready for the cross-ties and iron equipments, and to receive a fixed sum for the work, to be paid from time to time as the work progresses, at the prices fixed and estimates of work done made by an engineer, the contract is entire. The provision for payments from time to time as the work progresses does not make it severable. Cox v. Western Pacific R. Co., 44 Cal. 18.

A contract for the digging of an artesian well, which, in express terms, provides that the contractor shall be entitled to be paid for work done thereunder "only on the completion of the whole work," is an entire contract. Simonds v. Pearce, 31 Fed. Rep. 137.

A contract to deliver a certain quantity of timber at so much per foot, to be inspected, and to be delivered as fast as water will permit, and to be completed not later than a time specified, payment cash on handling specifications, is an entire and not a severable agreement. Stokes v. Baars, 18 Fla. 656.

Severable Contracts.—A contract for work consisting of separate items, the price being apportioned to each item or left to implication of law, is severable. So, also, if the price is clearly apportionable to the several parts of what is to be performed, though this be single and entire. Dibol v. Minott, 9 Iowa 403.

The plaintiff agreed to bore five wells for the defendant at one dollar per foot, and to furnish pipe at thirty-five cents per foot, and pumps and other appliances at prices specified for each separately. It was stipulated that, "in case of failure to get a good supply of water," plaintiff should have "no pay." It was held that the agreement was not an entire one, and that by failure to get a good supply of water from one of the wells the plaintiff did not forfeit his right to payment for the rest. Spear v. Snider, 29 Minn. 463.

A contract to repair a vessel is not entire, and a recovery can be had although the whole of the work has not been performed. Baeder v. Carnie, 44 N. J. L. 208.

Where one contracted to build a railroad to be paid for by installments as the work advanced, the contract was held not entire, and the contractor entitled to recover a ratable portion of the contract price, according to the

b. EMPLOYER PREVENTING PERFORMANCE.—Where the completion of the contract is prevented by the employer, the contractor may treat it as rescinded and recover as upon a quantum meruit the value of the services performed, irrespective of the rate of compensation specified in the contract,¹ together with any amount of work done whenever the contract might be abandoned. Wright v. Petrie, 1 Smed. & M. Ch. (Miss.) 282.

When the party for whom the service is to be rendered, willfully delays and embarrasses the performance of the contract by the other party, who endeavors to complete it, and who is finally compelled to abandon the work, the rule that the special contract must control the rate of compensation no longer prevails, and the party is entitled to the actual value of his services, even though it is in excess of the measure of damages fixed by the contract. Doughty v. O'Donnell, 4 Daly (N. Y.) 60.

But see Clark v. Scanlan, 33 Ill. App.

48, and Koon v. Greenman, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 121, where it was held that he could only recover according to the rate specified in the contract. See also Rathbun v. Thurston County, 8 Wash. 238, where it was held that in an action on a special contract, plaintiff's testimony that he was not permitted to do the work, justified a finding against him.

If the employer either prevents the contractor from completing the work, or refuses to permit him to complete it except on such conditions as he has no right to impose, he may recover the price of the work actually done. Clark v. Franklin, 7 Leigh (Va.) 1.

In Jones v. Judd, 4 N. Y. 411, it is said that where the completion of a job is arrested by the act or omission of the party for whom the work is done, the contractor has an election to treat the contract as rescinded, and recover on a quantum meruit the value of his labor, or he may sue upon the agreement and recover for the work completed at the stipulated price, and the loss in profits or otherwise sustained by the interruption. In this case a subcontractor was prevented from completing his contract to perform a portion of the work in constructing a canal by the work being stopped by the state officers and the original contract terminated by the legislature, and he was held entitled to recover the price agreed on for the work actually performed.

Where a person employed to move a building and place it upon a certain city lot is prevented by the city from fulfilling his contract, because no permission to place the buildings on said lot has been obtained from the city officers, he is, nevertheless, entitled to recover for the services actually rendered by him in attempting to move the building. Theobald v. Burleigh (N. H. 1891), 23 Atl. Rep. 367. But if the contractor is prevented from proceeding by the want of a license from the public authorities, he cannot pay the expense of the license and recover it from the employer without the latter's request. Thorp v. Ross, 4 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 416.

damages he may have sustained by such action,¹ and need not

In Cargain v. Everett, 62 Hun (N. Y.) 620, the plaintiff agreed to paint a house for defendant for one hundred dollars, material to be supplied by the defendant. When the work was partially done the material gave out, and defendant neglected to supply more, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover a per diem compensation for the work done.

Where the special contract is in existence and open, the contractor cannot sue on a quantum meruit, but where the employer prevents performance, the contractor may treat the contract as abandoned. Planche v. Colburn, 8 Bing. 14; 21 E. C. L. 203.

Where the employer prevented the plaintiff from completing his contract to put in an elevator, the latter was allowed to recover the value of his work and materials, Ellithorpe Air-Brake Co. v. Sire, 41 Fed. Rep. 662; and where the completion of a contract to remove a building was prevented by the failure of the employer to secure a permit, the contractor recovered the value of his services. Theobald v. Burleigh (N. H. 1891), 23 Atl. Rep. 367.

Where a party abandons his contract in pursuance of notice from his employer, and seeks other employment, he cannot be forced to abandon such employment by a subsequent notice from his employer to proceed to perform the first contract. Rayburn v. Comstock, 80 Mich. 448.

In Gastlin v. Weeks, 2 Ind. App. 222, the plaintiff contracted to clear and grade a certain tract at so much per acre. After part performance, the parties disagreed as to the contract, and defendants refused to pay for the work, unless plaintiff would perform it according to their interpretation. It was held that when the work had been accepted plaintiff was entitled to prove under a quantum meruit that it was worth more than the contract price.

In Curlee v. Reiger, 45 Ill. App. 544, the plaintiff contracted to work for defendant for a certain time for a certain price. He left work with defendant's consent, and when he returned was told to go home, and when wanted he would be notified. He held himself in readiness to return to work, but received no notice from defendant, and it was held that full performance was waived.

Where, in an action on building contracts, it appeared that defendants had refused to permit plaintiff to complete the work, it was held that questions as to the time defendant expended in supervising the completion of the work, or its value, introduced with the view of sustaining a counterclaim for the same, were inadmissible. Stone v. Assip (Brooklyn City Ct.), 18 N. Y. Supp. 441.

A charge that if there were a specific contract to perform certain labor, and defendants failed to perform their part of it, plaintiff would be entitled to the contract price for the work done; that, if plaintiff failed of his own fault, he would still be entitled in the same way, but would also be liable for any sum defendants would have to pay in excess thereof to have it completed; and that, if there were no contract, plaintiff would be entitled upon a quantum meruit, was held correct in Gastlin v. Weeks, 2 Ind. App. 222. See Yarborough v. Davis (Tex. App. 1891), 15 S. W. Rep. 713, where the evidence was held insufficient to sustain a verdict for the contractor.

But where the contract provides that a suspension of the contract by the employer shall give the contractor no claim for damages, a suspension, in good faith, will not relieve the contractor from his undertaking. Snell v. Brown, 71 Ill. 133.

Where an agreement between D and E stipulates that E is to do certain work on D's house, who is to furnish the materials, and the work is commenced, but suspended through failure of materials, and E leaves work promising to return and complete the job as soon as D shall notify him that he has materials ready, such notice is ineffectual to support an action for breach of contract, unless, in fact, D had the materials ready; but E would not be entitled to recover the whole contract price, on D's failing to supply materials, but only damages for loss of the job, loss of other work, etc.; and where the contract price has been paid in advance, he is not entitled to retain it after abandonment of the contract for such breach, but only so much as will indemnify him in damages. Hood v. Raines, 19 Tex. 400.

prove readiness and ability on his part to perform.¹ The fact that the employer afterwards gives the contractor notice to proceed with the work does not affect his right to recover.²

Plaintiffs contracted to cut and remove a quantity of wood from grounds to be used by defendants as a reservoir, agreeing to accept the wood in part payment for their undertaking. The whole of the work was to be completed on or before November 1, 1889. Plaintiffs sued to recover the value of cord-wood lost, and increased cost in clearing the land by reason of defendants prematurely flooding the same, and it was held that the defendants had no right to interfere with plaintiffs' performance of their contract by flooding the ground before the end of the prescribed time, and were liable to the plaintiffs for the damages caused them thereby. Pennell v. New York (Super. Ct.), 14 N. Y. Supp. 376.

Where a water company contracted for work to be done, and afterwards, because of a rise in the river and danger to some of its buildings, it desired to stop the work, it could do so only subject to liability for any injury thereby done to the other party. Vicksburg Water Supply Co. v. Gorman (Miss. 1892), 11 So. Rep. 680.

In an action for a breach of contract in refusing to permit the plaintiffs to complete a tunnel they had agreed to construct for the defendant, it appeared that, with the plaintiffs' consent, work thereon was suspended for a period as to the proposed length of which the evidence was conflicting; but, on February 11th following, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant, asking whether they were to be allowed to complete the work. The defendant's notification in reply thereto, that the plaintiffs might begin work, was not given until the 19th of the same month, and the plaintiffs refused to do so, unless compensated for the unreasonable suspension of the work, having in the meantime secured other employment. It was held that the plaintiffs' letter was a waiver of the defendant's acts or omissions prior thereto, and it is a question for the jury whether the defendant's delay in answering it was unreasonable. Sullivan

v. New York, etc., Cement Co., 119 N. Y. 348.

Evidence.—In an action by a contractor for the balance due on a contract to build a house, which he was not allowed to complete, evidence that he had bought material which, by reason of its design, could not be used anywhere else, and had therefore been compelled to sell it at a loss, is admissible. Wells v. Board of Education, 78 Mich. 260.

Measure of Damages.—The contract price for the whole work—a job of hay pressing—was held to be the true measure of damages, where, through defendant's fault, the plaintiff had been prevented from full performance, and put to the same expense in time and money as if he had fully performed. Wood v. Schettler, 23 Wis. 501.

In Meyer v. Hallock, 2 Robt. (N. Y.) 284, it was held that the measure of damages should be determined by the price fixed in the original contract.

Prospective Profits.—The contractor cannot recover for prospective profits, unless he is absolutely prohibited by some act or omission of the employer from completing his part of the contract. Christian County v. Overholt, 18 Ill. 223.

In Nourse v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 7, the plaintiff contracted with the government for the conversion of smooth-bore into rifled cannon. Work on the contract was suspended by order of the government, and a supplementary contract was entered into, compensating the contractor for the work already done, and allowing him to have the completion of the contract, if the government should decide to have it done. Several years after, the plaintiff brought suit to recover for damages sustained by not being permitted to complete the work, and it was held that such supplementary contract did not supersede the original, but kept it alive, and that he was entitled to the profits he would have realized under the original agreement.

1. Howell v. Gould, 2 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 418.

2. Rayburn v. Comstock, 80 Mich. 448. In this case the contractor had in the meantime employed all his means and teams under another contract.

Where the employer, prior to the commencement of the work, refuses to carry out the contract, the contractor cannot proceed with the work and recover the contract price, but must leave matters as they stand and sue for a breach of contract.¹

c. DESTRUCTION OF WORK.—One contracting to furnish the materials and labor, and construct an entire work, is not excused from the performance of the contract by the destruction of the work, whether from his own negligence or unavoidable accident, and not only can he recover nothing for the value of his labor and materials,² but is liable to an action by the employer for money

The suspension of work by the party for whom it was to be done, until after the time when the work was to be completed, releases the other parties from obligation to complete the work under the contract, and puts an end thereto; but the party thus suspending the contract is liable for a breach of it. Kugler v. Wiseman, 20 Ohio 361.

1. In McGregor v. Ross, 96 Mich. 103, it was held, where the employer first broke the contract, that the contractor could not perform so much of it as he saw fit, and recover the value of the work he did, but must either abandon the contract altogether, and sue for the work already done, and damages for the breach, or continue, under the contract, to do as much work as he was permitted to do, and recover damages for the interruption.

Where a person contracts to do a certain amount of work, at a stipulated price, upon materials to be furnished by his employer within a specified time, and is ready and willing to perform, but is prevented by the failure of the employer to furnish materials as promised, he is entitled to only compensatory damages. And if, during such time, he was offered other employment of the same kind, he cannot claim the amount of profits he would have had if the contract had been fully performed by both parties. Heavilon v. Kramer, 31 Ind. 241.

Where one contracts to build an addition to a house, and both the house and addition are destroyed by fire before the work is completed, the contractor cannot recover for the work done and materials furnished. Fildew v. Besley, 42 Mich. 100; 36 Am. Rep. 433. And if one contracts to erect a building upon a certain lot, and by reason of a latent defect in the soil the building falls down before it is completed, the loss falls upon the contractor. School Trustees v. Bennett, 27 N. J. L. 513; Ingle v. Jones, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 1; Stees v. Leonard, 20 Minn. 494.

The loss falls on the contractor if the building is destroyed before completion and delivery to the owner, unless the latter accepts the house when nearly but not entirely completed. Galyon v. Ketchen, 85 Tenn. 55.

Where there is no provision in a building contract against accident or inevitable necessity, the contractor cannot recover a sum retained by the owner as security for the faithful completion of the work, though the house, when nearly completed, was destroyed by fire without the contractor's fault. Cutcliff v. McAnally, 88 Ala. 507.

One who contracts to build a house, the last installment of the cost to be paid him "on completion of the work," cannot claim such installment if the house was destroyed by fire before the second coat of paint was on the house, all the doors hung, the fastenings put on the front doors and windows, or the building delivered to the owner. Clark v. Collier, 100 Cal. 256.

The plaintiffs contracted with the defendant to erect machinery upon his buildings and premises, and in his occupation, for a specified sum, and to keep the whole in order under fair wear advanced upon the contract,¹ and for damages for its non-performance.² But this rule can have no application to a subcontractor, who has simply undertaken to do a distinct portion of the work, and, where he has substantially performed all the work his contract calls for, he can recover therefor from the principal contractor, notwithstanding the destruction of the building before the entire work is completed.³ So, also, where one contracts to do a specific portion of the work, such as the carpenter work in the

and tear for two years. When the machinery was only partly erected, a fire accidentally broke out in the buildings, and, without any fault by either party, destroyed both the buildings and machinery then erect thereon. It was held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover anything in respect of any portion of the machinery which had been erected and destroyed, as the whole work contracted to be done by them had not been completed. Hughes v. Lenny, 5 M. & W. 183; 2 H. & H. 13.

Where a contract for erecting a building provides that payment shall be made in installments, as successive portions of the work are completed, if the building is destroyed by inevitable accident before finished, the builder is entitled to be paid such installments as have been fully earned; but he cannot claim any portion of the next installment not fully earned. Richardson v. Shaw, 1 Mo. App. 234.

In Appleby v. Myers, L. R., 2 C. P. 651, the plaintiffs had contracted to erect certain machinery on the defendant's premises, at specific prices for particular portions, and to keep it in repair for two years, the price to be paid upon completion of the whole. After some portions of the work had been finished and others were in the course of completion, the premises, with all the machinery and materials thereon, were destroyed by fire, and it was held that both parties were excused from further performance, but that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue in respect of those portions of the work which had been completed, whether the materials used had become the property of the defendant or not.

E. agreed with M. to do all the carpenter's work upon his dwelling at a stipulated rate; the lumber was furnished by M., sent to the workshop of E., and there prepared to be put into the house, when it was destroyed by fire. The lumber destroyed was insured in the name of M. Other lumber was furnished by M. and prepared and placed in the building, which was duly completed and paid for. Upon an action being afterwards brought by E. for the value of his work and labor upon the lumber destroyed, it was held that he was not entitled to demand payment for any carpenter work until the same was put into the dwelling; that the fact that M. had received the amount of the insurance upon the lumber did not render him liable to E. on account for money had and received; and that E. had also an insurable interest in the lumber as bailee, to the value of his work done upon it, and, having failed to effect an insurance thereon, must bear the loss. Eichelberger v. Miller, 20 Md. 332.

It is immaterial that, by the terms of the contract, payment is to be made in installments as the work progresses. School Trustees v. Bennett, 27 N. J. L. 513.

In School Trustees v. Bennett, 27 N. J. L. 513, Whelpley, J., said: "No rule of law is more firmly established by a long train of decisions than this, that where a party, by his own contract, creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract."

erection of a building, which he completes before the work is entirely completed by the other contractors, and it is destroyed, he may recover.¹

Where work is to be done upon a building which is not wholly the property of, or in the control of, the contractor, or for which he is not solely accountable, as where repairs are to be made, or he is to do only certain portions of the work, the agreement upon both sides is upon the implied condition that the building shall continue in existence, and its destruction without the fault of either party will excuse performance, leaving to neither party the right of recovery of damages against the other,² and the contractor may recover for the work and labor performed under the contract.³ So, also, if the work is destroyed through the

1. In Garretty v. Brazell, 34 Iowa 100, the plaintiff contracted to do the carpenter work in the erection of a building and furnish the materials therefor. Having performed all the work except a minor part which was to be done after the plastering, the building was turned over to the employer for that purpose, and while thus in his possession was blown down, and it was held that as he had performed his work in a workmanlike manner, he was entitled to recover therefor, and that the loss resulting from the accident fell upon the owner.

But the contractor cannot recover for carpenter's work until it is put into the building, and hence, where lumber was destroyed while being prepared for the building at the shop of the contractor, it was held that he could not demand payment therefor. Eichelberger v. Miller, 20 Md. 332.

In Schwartz v. Saunders, 46 Ill. 18, a distinction is drawn between a case where one contracts to erect an entire building and where he merely contracts to do a certain portion of the work, and hence, where one contracted to do the carpenter work upon a brick building, the masonry to be done by another, and after the brickwork was nearly completed and the carpentry partly done, the brick walls were blown down, it was held that the loss as to the carpenter work fell upon the employer. And see, to the same effect, Hollis v. Chapman, 36 Tex. 1.

Where there is not an absolute and indivisible contract to build a complete house for a specified sum, but only a contract to do a portion of the work and furnish a portion of the materials, the remainder to be otherwise provided for from time to time by the employer, although the price is a fixed aggregate sum and no payment is to be made until after the house is complete, and the building is destroyed by fire before the completion of the whole, the contractor may recover for the work and materials actually done and furnished by him. Cook v. McCabe, 53 Wis. 250; 40 Am. Rep. 765.

the building was destroyed by fire, without fault of the contractor, the owner was in default and the contractor could recover for all that was done up to the time of the fire.

In Rawson v. Clark, 70 Ill. 656, the contractors agreed to manufacture, and put into a building then in process of construction, certain ironwork, but were prevented from completing their contract by the building being destroyed by fire without their fault. The court held that they could recover pro tanto, and without performing the balance of the contract.

In Cleary v. Sohler, 120 Mass. 210, a workman who had contracted to lath and plaster a building for a certain sum, had lathed the building and put on the first coat of plaster, when, without his fault, it was destroyed by fire. It was held that he could recover for his work under a count for work done and materials furnished. And in Hollis v. Chapman, 36 Tex. 1, the plaintiff, a carpenter, undertook to furnish materials and do the woodwork necessary to finish defendant's brick building, and to turn the building over to him complete by a given day for a specified gross sum; when the work was nearly completed the building was destroyed by fire without his fault, and it was held that the contract was apportionable, and that he was entitled to recover for the materials furnished and the work done.

In Butterfield v. Byron, 153 Mass. 517, a builder and a landowner entered into a contract by which the former was to make, erect, build, and finish a hotel upon the land, and the latter was to do the grading, excavating, stonework, brickwork, painting, and plumbing, and to pay each month seventy-five per cent. of the value of the work of the preceding month, the balance in thirty days after completion. Upon the building being destroyed by lightning shortly before completion, it was held that the contract was upon the implied condition that the building, when begun, should continue in existence until completed, and that neither party could recover damages for nonperformance, but that each might recover from the other, the landowner for what he had paid on account, the builder for what he had done and furnished under the contract.

An action lies by a shipwright for work and labor done and materials delivered in repairing a ship, though burnt in dock before the repairs are completed. Menetone v. Athawes, 3 Burr. 1592.

Where a carpenter contracted to do the carpenter's work upon a wooden house, at certain specified prices per piece, the materials to be furnished by the employer as they should be wanted, and the building was destroyed before completion, it was held that the contractor could recover the price of the work actually done. Clark v. Franklin, 7 Leigh (Va.) 1.

Where the contract is for the builder to furnish material and perform labor in altering a structure already erected, according to specifications already agreed on, there being no agreement as to when payment should be made, and, without fault of either contracting party, the structure itself is destroyed by fire when the work of altering has been but partially performed, the owner must pay the builder a full compensation for the work done and materials furnished before the fire. Weis v. Devlin, 67 Tex. 507.

1. In an action to recover for labor and materials furnished under a contract to build four houses, which were destroyed before completion by the falling of a stone wall on another part of the defendant's lot, it was held that the contract itself implied an undertaking, on his part, that the place chosen was free from danger, unless the plaintiff had assumed the risk of danger from the condition of the property. If the loss was occasioned by an accident that could have been prevented by reasonable care, skill and expense, it should be borne by defendant. Sinnott v. Mullin, 82 Pa. St. 333.

e. ENTIRE CONTRACT—ABANDONMENT.—Where the contract is an entire one and the work is voluntarily abandoned by the contractor without fault on the part of the employer, it is well settled that he cannot recover a pro rata compensation for the amount of labor actually performed,¹ but if the employer completes the work, and in doing so makes use of the materials of the a pump, and drain certain grounds for a certain sum, he cannot recover if he only drains part of the grounds, though it may turn out to be impossible to drain the rest. Brinkerhoff v. Elliott, 43 Mo. App. 185.

A contractor agreed to bore a well, "barring bad weather or other unavoidable hindrances," till a certain depth was reached or impenetrable rock was encountered. When about half the agreed depth was reached, his auger broke near the lower end, and became fastened in the well. It was held that he was not entitled to recover for the number of feet bored, at the contract price, since he was not prevented by the employer, nor by encountering impenetrable rock, from performing his contract. *Barrett v. Where a building contract is entire, the work cannot be considered done nor the materials furnished until the contract is executed. Edwards v. Derickson, 28 N. J. L. 39; Derrickson v. Edwards, 29 N. J. L. 468; 80 Am. Dec. 220.

A contract to bore a well at the rate of one dollar a foot for the first five hundred feet, two dollars and seventy-five cents for the next one hundred feet, five dollars per foot for the next one hundred feet, and eight dollars per foot for the remaining distance necessary to obtain water, the well to be put in the same finished order as the contractor's best finished wells, does not authorize the contractor to abandon the work so long as it is practicable for him to continue boring, and the other party is willing that he should continue; and if the contractor abandons it before completion, he cannot recover for the work performed. Stewart v. Weaver, 12 Ala. 538.

If a builder abandons his contract in November, without justification, and does not offer to complete the same until the following spring, the delay in making such offer is too great to entitle him to recover anything on the contract. Scheible v. Klein, 89 Mich. 376.

Nothing is due upon an entire contract until the work is fully performed, and hence, until then, the creditors of the contractor cannot enforce an attachment against his demand for compensation. Coburn v. Hartford, 38 Conn. 290.

Where the contractor, failing, leaves the building incomplete, the owner, to exercise the right of applying any unpaid installment to its completion, need not have the remaining work estimated by disinterested parties. Nothing in the Louisiana Act of March 18, 1844, No. 66, requires it. Hall v. Wills, 3 La. Ann. 504; St. Louis Church v. Kirwan, 9 La. Ann. 31.

percentage, and that the residue of the value of their work was due to them. Miller v. Hubbard, 4 Cranch C. C. 451.

The plaintiff contracted to fit up for the defendant a brewery at the house of a third person, the whole to be fixed complete for a certain sum, nothing being said about the time or mode of payment. When a portion of the work was done, the plaintiff refused to complete it without security, which the defendant refused to give. In an action against the defendant for not permitting the plaintiff to proceed with or complete the work, or paying for what was done, it was left to the jury to say by whose default the work was stopped. The jury having found a verdict for the defendant, the court declined to interfere. Pontifex v. Wilkinson, 2 C. B. 349.

Where a building contract provided that the contractors should furnish all materials, and complete the building by a specified day, or forfeit ten dollars for each day's delay, and that during the construction the owner might require alterations, for which a reasonable valuation should be added to or deducted from the contract price, it was held that the contractors were not justified in abandoning the contract after the date fixed for completing the building, on account of disputes respecting the kind of work being done, and materials used, and the alterations required, and because the owner refused to release them from liability on the forfeiture clause, though the latter was in error as to her claims. Hutton v. Gordon (Rockland County Ct.), 23 N. Y. Supp. 770; 2 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 267.

Where a subcontractor proposes to contractors to excavate a trench of certain dimensions under water for a specified sum, "the material so dredged to be deposited inshore, so as not to interfere with said trench," and the latter simply accept the offer, it is not the duty of such contractors to furnish such shore as a place of deposit for such dredged material, and the subcontractor is not justified in abandoning the contract because the shore inspector prevented him from depositing such material thereon. Cronin v. Tebo (Supreme Ct.), 24 N. Y. Supp. 644; 71 Hun (N. Y.) 59; Barnard, P. J., dissenting.

If the employer has accepted the part performance and derived benefit therefrom, he will be compelled to pay the value of the work, not exceeding the contract price, to the extent which that value exceeds the damage he has sustained by reason of the failure to complete the work. Yeats v. Ballentine, 56 Mo. 530; Lee v. Ashbrook, 14 Mo. 379; 55 Am. Dec. 110; Eyeraman v. Mt. Sinai Cemetery Assoc., 61 Mo. 489; Kelly v. Rowane, 33 Mo. App. 440.

But see Munroe v. Butt, 8 El. & Bl. 738; 4 Jur. N. S. 1231. In this case, by a building contract between A and B, it was stipulated that A should complete, for a specified price, certain works on certain houses of B, the whole to be completed on a specified day, and to be done to the satisfaction of a surveyor named, upon whose approval payment was to be made. A failed to complete the work. He sued B on the agreement for the agreed price, and for a reasonable price according to measure and value. There was evidence, on the trial, that B had resumed possession of the houses, and was so far enjoying the fruits of A's labor. It was held that there was no evidence in support of the claim, that he could not recover on the special count, not having fulfilled it; and that the mere fact of B's taking possession of his own land, on which buildings had been erected, or where repairs had been done, or alterations made to a building thereon, did not afford an inference that he had dispensed with the conditions of the special agreement under which the works were done, or of a contract to pay for the work actually done according to measure and value.

Where the contractor voluntarily and without cause abandoned a contract to build a house, before the completion thereof, and sued to recover the contract price, and the employer presented in offset a claim for work done and expense incurred by himself on said job, and for work necessary to be done thereon to complete the same, and for damage for the non-completion thereof by the plaintiff, which was allowed by the referee, the employer was held to have thereby received the equivalent for the performance of the contract, and the plaintiff was therefore entitled to recover the contract price. Austin v. Austin, 47 Vt. 311.

A person performing a building contract may, on the refusal of the other party to comply with his stipulation to pay an installment of money when due, abandon the further performance of the contract, and sustain an action to recover for the work already performed. *Geary v. In Bennett v. Shaughnessy, 6 Utah 273, the plaintiff contracted to excavate a tunnel twelve hundred feet in length for a certain sum, the defendants agreeing "to receive said tunnel one hundred feet at a time, and pay" the plaintiff "one thousand dollars upon the completion of each one hundred feet." The defendants paid on the completion of the first hundred feet, but failed to pay for the second hundred feet, and the plaintiff discontinued the work. It was held that he could recover for the work already done and materials furnished, the payment of the one thousand dollars being a condition precedent to the further prosecution of the work.

A party contracting with a corporation is justified in abandoning the work under the contract provided to be done, where he is informed upon the part of the corporation that there is no money to meet the payments due him. Cunningham v. Massena Springs, etc., R. Co., 63 Hun (N. Y.) 439. But the mere failure to pay an installment as it becomes due does not amount to prevention, and will not authorize the contractor to abandon the work. Cox v. McLaughlin, 52 Cal. 590.

Where a contract for building a sewer stipulated that the rock taken from the necessary excavation should become the property of the contractor, except such part as should be necessary for the support and protection of the work, it was held that the fact that a private owner, through whose property a portion of the sewer ran, would not permit the contractor to sell stone removed from such portion, did not entitle the contractor to rescind the contract, as the right to sell the stone did not accrue until the contract was completed. Becker v. Philadelphia (Pa. 1889), 16 Atl. Rep. 625.

When an entire contract to lumber several tracts of land is broken by the owner's sale of the one tract out of which the contractors expected to make their profit, these are not obliged to finish the other tracts in order to a suit on the contract, or else recover merely for money expended and the value of work done, but may abandon, and recover, as damages for the breach, the profits they would have made on the whole job. Lee v. Briggs, 99 Mich. 487.

Materials—Failure to Pay.—Where, by the terms of an agreement to furnish materials, payments are to be made from time to time, at time specified, if, upon specific demand of payment, with notice that it will be insisted on as a condition of further delivery of materials, payment is refused, the other party may properly refuse to continue to furnish materials. Palmer v. Breen, 34 Minn. 39.

2. Where an entire contract with master carpenters, for building an addition to a house within a stipulated time and for a gross sum, provides that the materials for the work shall be furnished by the owner, but not where they are to be delivered, and the owner delivers the finishing stuff upon the premises, notwithstanding the request of the builder to deliver it at their workshop in another part of the city, to be worked, and refuses to permit them to take it at their own expense to their workshop, where it can be worked more advantageously for both parties, the carpenters, having framed and raised the addition, are entitled to recover for the work by them done, although they abandoned the contract, after due notice to the owner that they should do so unless permitted to work the finishing stuff at their own workshop. Greene v. Haley, 5 R. I. 260.

f. WAIVER OF ENTIRE PERFORMANCE.—Where the employer dispenses with performance of portions of the work, the contractor may recover for the part actually done.¹

5. Specific Performance.—It is now very generally settled that courts of equity will not enforce the specific performance of working contracts, since there is usually an adequate remedy at law by means of damages, and it would be impracticable, if not impossible, for the officers of the court to enforce the decree.² Some earlier cases have held, it is true, that specific performance of

The court will not decree a specific performance of a preliminary building agreement, nor give damages for the breach of such agreement. Wood v. Silcock, 50 L. T. N. S. 251; 32 W. R. 845.

Where there is an agreement to do certain works, such works to be done to the satisfaction of a referee named, without specifying the nature, materials, or extent of such works, no decree for specific performance can be made upon such agreement. London, etc., R. Co. v. Humphrey, 6 W. R. 784.

The court has no jurisdiction to decree the specific performance of a contract, for which the consideration on the part of the plaintiff is the execution of certain works which the court is unable to superintend, and therefore, where a bill stated an agreement to employ the plaintiffs as contractors for making a railway and to pay for the works in debentures and shares of the company, a motion for an injunction to restrain the company from dealing with the debentures, and transferring the share to others in derogation of the plaintiff's rights, was refused. *Peto v. an agreement to build may be decreed if sufficiently certain;¹ but this jurisdiction has been expressly denied in the later decisions.²

6. Time of Performance—a. GENERALLY.—Provision is frequently made in working contracts for the completion of the work by a stipulated time, under penalties for delay,⁴ and this stipulation is a most important one, and should always be inserted.⁵ The failure of the contractor to complete the performance of the contract cific performance, it was held that the terms of this agreement were too indefinite to be specifically enforced, but that even had the terms been sufficiently definite, the agreement was of such a nature that specific performance could not have been decreed. Greenhill v. Isle of Wight R. Co., 23 L. T. N. S. 885; 19 W. R. 345.

In Stuyvesant v. New York, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 414, it was held that equity had jurisdiction to decree specific performance by the defendant of a covenant to make erections or improvements upon his own land for the benefit of the complainant, as the owner of adjoining property, and who had an interest in having such erections and improvements made, where the injury to him from the breach was of such a nature as not to be capable of being adequately compensated in damages.

A court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce the specific performance of a contract by a defendant to do defined work upon his property, in the performance of which the plaintiff has a material interest, and which is not capable of adequate compensation in damages. Storer v. Great Western R. Co., 2 Y. & Coll. C. C. 48; 3 Railw. Cas. 106; 12 L. J. N. S. Ch. 65.

In Blanchard v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 31 Mich. 43; 18 Am. Rep. 142, specific performance of a contract to erect a station at a certain place and run daily trains was refused.

A provision of a contract that the contractors shall "proceed, with such diligence, and with such force of laborers, as the executive committee of the said company may direct, to perform the work," etc., is subordinate to, and qualified by, a provision requiring the work to be completed by a day named, and is intended to enable the company to compel completion by the day specified. Grand Rapids, etc., R. Co. v. Van Deusen, 29 Mich. 431.

5. See Lloyd's Law of Buildings (2d ed.), § 34, where the author says: "In drawing a building contract it is generally advisable not only to bind the builder to complete his work within a certain time, but also to provide

by the time agreed upon, would, at common law, allow the employer to rescind,¹ but in equity time is not generally considered the essence of the contract, and the contractor is allowed to sue upon it, subject to the employer's right to show the damage, if any, which he may have sustained by reason of the delay.² The parties may stipulate, however, if they so desire, that time is to be made the essence of the contract, and that payment shall not be made unless the work is completed within the specified time, and such provision will be enforced.³ The employer must perform all things necessary on his part, and have the work in readiness for the contractor to begin within a reasonable time, and if

In Lucas v. Godwin, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 737; 32 E. C. L. 309, Tindal, C. J., said: "It (the completion of the work by the time specified) is not a condition, but a stipulation, for non-observance of which the defendant may be entitled to recover damages; but even if it be a condition, it does not go to the essence of the contract, and is no answer to the plaintiff's claim for the work actually done. It never could have been the understanding of the parties that if the house were not done by the precise day the plaintiff would have no remuneration. At all events, if so unreasonable an engagement had been entered into, the parties should have expressed their meaning with a precision which could not be mistaken."

The right of recovery for work under a written contract will not be construed to be conditional upon the compliance with a stipulation for the completion of the work by a fixed time, unless there is an express agreement to that effect, or unless, from a fair construction of the language employed, the nature of the contract and the attendant circumstances, it is apparent that the parties so intended. St. Louis Steam Heating, etc., Co. v. Bissell, 41 Mo. App. 426.

Here it was held that a stipulation to furnish a house with steam heating apparatus with all possible speed, was not a condition precedent.

In Morrison v. Wells, 48 Kan. 494, where payment was to be made upon the completion of the work by a given time, it was held of the essence of the contract.

Where the specifications and the contract differ as to the time of performance, the contract governs, as where the contract provided for the completion "without unnecessary delay as soon as ordered," and the specifications for the completion "within three months from the date of the contract." Boteler v. Roy, 40 Mo. App. 234.

Where the plaintiff made every reasonable effort to perform a building contract in the required time but failed to do so in some minor particulars, and the defendant took possession of the building when completed, and used it for the intended purpose, for which it was adequate, it was held that the plaintiff could recover the contract price less compensation to the defendant for the minor imperfections and omissions. White v. Braddock Borough School Dist., 159 Pa. St. 201.

Measure of Damages.—Where a contractor fails to complete a building within the time specified, the measure of damages is the fair rental of the property for the time the owner is deprived of its use. Speculative profits are too remote to be allowed as damages. Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314; 71 Am. Dec. 635.

Flooding.—It is not necessary for the plaintiff to allege or prove an offer to pay the amount which he had agreed to pay at the time when the work was to have been completed. Lucas v. Snyder, 2 Greene (Iowa) 490.

Parties have a right to make their own contracts, making the time of their performance material, so that failure to perform at the time will avoid the agreement. Kemp v. Humphreys, 13 Ill. 573.

Where parties entered into a contract to perform certain labor on a ditch of the company, one of the stipulations providing that if the work was not completed by a certain time they should forfeit the contract and all money due on the same, it was held that if the clause was inserted under a mistake as to the amount and difficulty of the labor to be performed, it was void. Verzan v. McGregor, 23 Cal. 339.

Where one contracts to do the carpenter work on a building, and to proceed forthwith without delay, the employer is bound to have the building in readiness to commence work within a reasonable time, and, if he fails to do so, the contractor may recover his damage by reason of the delay. Allamon v. Albany, 43 Barb. (N. Y.) 33; Thorp v. Ross, 4 Keyes (N. Y.) 546. So, where the employer is to furnish plans or do any other act before the contractor is to commence. *Roberts v. Bury Imp. He may recover the increased expense of doing the work in consequence of the delay on a quantum meruit, and does not waive the employer's breach of the contract by going on without complaint or objection, and completing the work. *Allamon v. But the contractor cannot himself incur the expense of removing the obstacle to his performance, and charge the employer therewith, without an agreement by the latter to do the same. Thorp v. Ross, 4 Keyes (N. Y.) 546.

In Haydnville Min., etc., Co. v. Art Institute, 39 Fed. Rep. 484, it was held that where the contract provided for an extension of time in case delay was caused by other contractors, such a stipulation implied that there was to be no pecuniary compensation for such delay to the contractor. But see, contra, Nelson v. Pickwick Associated Co., 30 Ill. App. 333.

Where the plaintiff and the defendant were separate contractors in the construction of parts of a county jail, and the former agreed with the county to look solely to the other contractors for any damages caused by their delaying him, and the latter agreed to be liable for whatever damages were caused the others by delay, both contracts should be taken as one, and the defendant held directly liable to the plaintiff as upon a contract between them. Grant v. Diebold Safe, etc., Co., 77 Wis. 72.

One who has contracted with a town for the erection of a building within a certain time may recover damages for its unreasonable omission to fix the site of the building, under a declaration alleging that it hindered him in the performance of the contract. Blanchard v. Blackstone, 102 Mass. 343.

One who agrees to furnish stone for a public building, and to cut it and dress it as "required," is entitled to damages for delays consequent upon doubts on the part of the public officials as to whether it was best to complete the building with that stone and on that site. U. S. v. Mueller, 113 U. S. 153.

Where a person employed to furnish all necessary labor and materials, and do everything specified under the head of mason's work, etc., in the erection of a building, the ironwork and stonemasons' work to be furnished by the employer, is delayed in the completion of his contract by the delay of his employer in furnishing the ironwork and cut stone, he will be entitled to recover damages occasioned by the delay, and such damages will not be waived by continuing the work until the completion of his contract. Tobey v. Price, 75 Ill. 645.

In Swift v. U. S., 14 Ct. of Cl. 208,

b. REASONABLE TIME.—Where the time of performance is not specified the law will imply that it is to be within a reasonable time.¹

c. PARTICULAR WORDS.—The meaning of particular words the contractor's acquiescence in the delay was deemed voluntary.

Where the parties to a building contract have waived performance within the time specified, the builder cannot abandon the contract and recover on a quantum meruit for the work done, until he has first demanded a performance upon the part of the owner and the latter has failed to perform within a reasonable time thereafter. Lawson v. Hogan, 93 N. Y. 39.

A provision of a contract that, at the completion of the work, the balance due shall be paid the contractor on his receipting for the same in full, and rendering clear receipts to the defendant company from all subcontractors, employees, and material men from all liability to them, exempts the company from liability to the contractor for damages recoverable against him, by a subcontractor, for breach of the subcontract, consisting in the delay of the company to have the road surveyed. O'Connor v. Smith, 84 Tex. 232.

Where a contract for the construction of a sewer by the plaintiffs for the defendant city, provided that the materials used should be strictly in accordance with the plans and specifications, and authorized the defendant city to appoint such person or persons to inspect the materials as might be deemed proper, it was held that a difference of opinion between the plaintiffs and the inspector as to whether the materials provided for the work conformed to the specifications, was an incident contemplated by the terms of the contract, and, therefore, the plaintiffs could not recover damages for delay in performing the work occasioned by the rejection by the inspector, in good faith, of materials which conformed with the specifications. *Montgomery v. Where a person contracts to raft timber "as fast as same is put to the mouth of creek, and run timber as fast as water will permit," he can be required to do no more than perform his contract within a reasonable time. Bonifay v. Hassell (Ala. 1893), 14 So. Rep. 46.

Under an agreement by which the plaintiff was to put up a gas producer and furnace for the defendant, ready for use, for a specified sum on thirty days' trial, the time for completion not being expressed, it was the plaintiff's duty to perform the contract in a reasonable time, and the defendant's duty to make the trial within the time contemplated by the parties after the appliances were completed. Turner v. Muskegon Mach., etc., Co., 97 Mich. 166.

A schooner having been carried a quarter of a mile up the beach by a storm, the master, on September first, entered into a contract with a landman experienced in moving houses, to launch her for one thousand dollars, to be paid when the launching was completed. The contractor, in several weeks, only moved the schooner twice her length, and then, abandoning this plan, hired a dredge to dig a canal; the dredge worked at intervals for some time, and then quit. On December fifth the dredge was again hired, and by December twenty-second had finished the canal up to the schooner's stern. After an unsuccessful effort at launching her, nothing more was done until January fourth, when the master notified the contractor that, unless the work was completed in one week, he would terminate the contract. On the expiration of the week, notice was given that other persons had been engaged to finish the job. With the new employees the master succeeded in launching the schooner by March ninth, and it was held that, in view of the time consumed by the latter, the delay of the original contractor was not unreasonable, and he

d. PENALTIES AND FORFEITURES.—As a general rule, the work is required to be completed within the time named, under penalty of the forfeiture of the contract, or the payment of a specified sum in damages.² Whether the sum specified shall be considered as a penalty or as liquidated damages, is a question of

And see BY, vol. 2, p. 703.

As Soon as Practicable.—A contract to do a thing "as soon as practicable" implies that circumstances may occur which will delay the completion of it. The word "practicable" cannot be understood with regard to the means at the command of the contractors, for they may be entirely inadequate; but in ascertaining what was intended, the nature of the contract, the difficulties to be overcome, and the importance to the other party of the early completion of it, are to be considered. Reedy v. Smith, 42 Cal. 245.

As Soon as Possible.—A stipulation for the completion of work "as soon as possible" requires its completion within a reasonable time, or within such time as is reasonably necessary under the circumstances. Florence Gas, etc., Power Co. v. Hanby (Ala. 1893), 13 So. Rep. 343. And see AS, vol. 1, p. 777.

2. See infra, this title, Penalties and Liquidated Damages; Forfeitures.

Where one contracted to complete a piece of work by a certain date, the work to be begun within thirty days, it was held that the time stipulations were not conditions precedent, not being so made in terms, but only agreements for breach of which damages could be recovered if shown to result; and his failure to begin the work in the time fixed was no ground for interception, so long as he was continuing in good faith, and indicating no intent to abandon it. Hambly v.

Delaware, etc., R. Co., 21 Fed. Rep. 541.

Where the time has been extended, the employer cannot avail himself of a power to take the work out of the contractor's hands on grounds of delay till, or up to, a time within the extended period. Mohan v. Dundalk, etc., R. Co., L. R., 6 Ir. 477.

Where the employer terminated the contract because not completed within the required time, and afterward had it completed by other parties at much lower terms, it was held that, as the employer had sustained no loss by the failure of the first contractor, the latter could recover the ten per cent. reserved out of the payments which had been made him. Quinn v. U. S., 99 U. S. 30.

Under a contract for the erection of eight houses for twenty-one thousand two hundred dollars, to be completed in a certain time, providing that if the contractor "fail to complete the work upon any of the said houses . . . he shall pay . . . the full sum of five dollars per day for each and every day thereafter that the work upon either of the said houses shall so remain unfinished, . . . as liquidated damages," the payment is not five dollars per day for each house. Denver Land, etc., Co. v. Rosenfeld Constr. Co., 19 Colo. 539.

Non-joinder of Co-defendant.—In Lincoln v. Little Rock Granite Co., 56 Ark. 405, the plaintiff, being about to build a foundation for the defendant and another, agreed with them that if the foundation were not completed by a time named, he should forfeit a certain sum for each day of delay. The plaintiff completed the work, but after the time named, and sued the defendant for part of the cost. There was evidence that the other party to the contract had paid the plaintiff his portion, and it was held that the non-joinder of the other party to the contract as a defendant did not deprive the defendant of the right to claim the allowance for delay provided for by the contract.

construction.¹ The employer may set off such sums, where they are in the nature of liquidated damages, in an action by the contractor,² but if the delay has been caused by the default of the employer, the latter cannot recover therefor.³

c. WAIVER OR EXTENSION OF TIME.—The employer, of course, may waive performance within the stipulated time, or extend the time of performance,⁴ and such agreement requires no new

1. Foley v. McKeegan, 4 Iowa 1; 66 Am. Dec. 107.

In a building contract containing the usual clauses fixing the days for completing various parts of the work, a stipulation to the effect that any neglect to comply with the conditions of the contract, and finish the work as provided, shall be sufficient cause for the employer to claim damages at the rate of ten dollars for each and every day's detention so caused, may be regarded as covenanting for stipulated damages; and the owner is entitled to retain at that rate, for delay occurring without his contributory negligence or consent. O'Donnell v. Rosenberg, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 59.

2. Marshall v. Hann, 17 N. J. L. 425; Huckestein v. Kelly, 139 Pa. St. 201; Johnson v. White (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 174; Keogh Mfg. Co. v. Eisenberg (C. Pl.), 7 Misc. Rep. (N. In an action on a building contract, where the defendant sets off a penalty stipulated for the plaintiffs' failure to complete the building by a certain time, and there is evidence that it was contemplated when the contract was made that the defendant should put in a siding to enable the plaintiffs to unload materials on the spot, it is misleading to charge that this siding could have been put in by the defendant in a day or two, where there was evidence that in order to do so, the lot would have to be graded. Huckestein v. Kelly, 139 Pa. St. 201.

3. Russell v. Sa Da Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. 149; 32 L. J. C. P. 68. In Welch v. McDonald, 85 Va. 500, the defendants contracted to furnish building stone for the plaintiffs according to the latter's plans and specifications, and agreed to pay five dollars per day for delay beyond a certain date, unless the delay was occasioned by circumstances beyond their control, and it was held that the plaintiffs could recover nothing for the delay caused by their failure and refusal to furnish the defendants with a copy of the plans and specifications.

Where the answer in an action for the price of building materials sets up, as a counterclaim, damages stipulated in the contract between the parties for a failure to complete the delivery on a certain day, and it appears that the contract further provided that in case a delay should be caused by the defendant, then the time should be extended for a period equal to such delay, the plaintiff may show that the delay in delivery was caused by the defendant, though the complaint does not allege any excuse. Keogh Mfg. Co. v. Eisenberg (C. Pl.), 27 N. Y. Supp. 356; 7 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 79.

If the delay is assented to, recovery can be had. Smith v. Gugerty, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 614; Gallagher v. Nichols, 60 N. Y. 438.

Where a contract provided that the plaintiffs should erect a building for the defendants before a certain date, for a specified price, to be paid in four installments, each payment to be made when certain work had been performed, and that, if the plaintiffs failed at any time to furnish sufficient material or workmen, the defendants, after three days' notice, might proceed with the work, and deduct the expense from the contract price, it was held that the fact that the plaintiffs were dilatory in the work from the beginning, did not entitle the defendants to refuse to pay the second installment when the same was fully earned, and afterward terminate the contract as for a breach thereof by the plaintiff, where the defendants had acquiesced in such delay extraneous consideration to support it.¹ The waiver may either be by express agreement,² or implied from the action of the employer.³

up to the time such installment became due. Smith v. Corn (C. Pl.), 23 N. Y. Supp. 326; 3 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 545.

1. It is promise for promise, and such new and further agreement may be declared upon, and a recovery had for, such damages as the breach of it has occasioned, though in excess of what would have arisen under the original contract. Hill v. Smith, 34 Vt. 535.

2. If the agreement for extension is silent as to the duration of the extension of the time, the law implies that it shall be for a reasonable time. Luckhart v. Ogden, 30 Cal. 547.

Where the employers entered into a contract for the erection of a hotel by a given day, and, after that day, entered into a new contract, by which, in consideration of the delivery to them of the unfinished building as it stood, they agreed to pay the contractors the original contract price less a stipulated sum, it was held that they could not go behind the new agreement, and claim damages for the failure of the contractors to finish the work within the time fixed by the first contract. Towson v. Reese, 1 Tenn. Ch. 245.

3. The employer by accepting the work waives his right to object to the time of performance. Cummings v. Pence, 1 Ind. App. 317; Adams v. Hill, 16 Me. 215. And where payment was to be made upon the completion of the work at a given time, payment at that time, though the work was not complete, was held a waiver. Paddock v. Stout, 121 Ill. 571; Meehan v. Williams, 2 Daly (N. Y.) 367. But see Shute v. Hamilton, 3 Daly (N. Y.) 462.

The fact that the employer permits the contractor to go on with the work after the time limit, without expressing disapproval or dissatisfaction, does not waive his right to damages for the delay. Oberlies v. Bullinger, 75 Hun (N. Y.) 248; Barber v. Rose, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 76; Smith v. Smith, 45 Vt. 433. Nor does the fact that the builder of a house did not terminate a contract with a subcontractor for the latter's failure to complete his work within the time specified, prevent the builder from recovering, by way of counterclaim, damages for the delay. Grannis, etc., Lumber Co. v. Deeves (Supreme Ct.), 25 N. Y. Supp. 375; 72 Hun (N. Y.) 171.

A request to go on with the work, together with partial payments, after the workman's failure to complete a building within the time stipulated in the contract, constitutes a waiver of the owner's right to insist on a forfeiture. Eyster v. Parrott, 83 Ill. 517.

A provision in a building contract that the work shall be completed by a certain date is waived if there are departures by mutual consent from the original plan, or if, after the time prescribed by the contract has expired, the builder is notified to go on and complete. Close v. Clark (C. Pl.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 538.

Where the plaintiff contracts to complete a house "ready for occupancy" within sixty days, according to plans which do not require the finishing of the second story and putting on the last coat of paint, the effect of a subsequent contract, made after the sixty days have expired, to do the additional work, for an extra payment, is to waive the original stipulation to complete the work at a certain time, and substitute a stipulation for completion within a reasonable time. Cornish v. Suydam (Ala. 1893), 13 So. Rep. 118.

Where a contractor for the construction of a mill had completed the work, except as to certain corn rolls which did not work satisfactorily to the owner, and the latter wrote him a letter stating that whenever the rolls should do satisfactory work he would be ready to pay for the entire work, it was held to amount to a waiver of the time fixed by the contract for the completion of the entire work, and that a completion within a reasonable time thereafter was sufficient. Van Stone v. Stillwell, etc., Mfg. Co., 142 U. S. 128.

Allowing the contractor to go on and complete the work after the time stipulated, has been held a waiver. Dunn v. Steubing, 120 N. Y. 232.

A contractor agreed to build a house for B. by a certain time, and to pay himself from a mortgage to be negotiated by him. The house was not completed at the time stipulated, but the contractor was allowed to continue work for two months, when B. took possession. It was held that B. could not defend his suit in assumpsit for the value of work done and materials fur-

The effect of the extension of time is merely to substitute a new time for the old,¹ and the waiver of the condition as to time does not operate as a waiver of the other features of the contract.²

f. EFFECT OF EXTRAS AND ALTERATIONS.—Where, after the contract is entered into, additions to, or alterations in, the work, are made at the request of the employer, increasing the labor and requiring additional time, the time originally limited for the completion of the contract will be deemed to have been extended by the parties, if an extension is necessary for the protection of the contractor.³

g. EXCUSES FOR DELAY.—Where the delay is caused by the nished, having waived the stipulation as to time, and having prevented him from negotiating a mortgage, by taking possession of the unfinished house. Foster v. Worthington, 58 Vt. 65.

Evidence of Waiver.—In an action on a building contract which provides that the contractor shall forfeit a certain amount for each day after a day on which he agrees to complete the building, if he does not complete it by that time, parol evidence that the defendant's superintendent, in ordering extra work, stated that he would not exact the forfeiture, is admissible as tending to show a waiver of such provision, but not for the purpose of showing a waiver in respect to other matters. O'Keefe v. St. Francis' Church, 59 Conn. 551.

Where a builder brought an action to recover for work done under a contract whereof time was the essence, alleging full performance of the contract on his part, and the defense was that the contract was not completed in time, it was held that evidence of the modification of the contract or waiver offered by the plaintiff by way of excuse, was inadmissible under the pleadings. Elting v. Dayton (Supreme Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 849.

A party to a written agreement for building a house, the plan of which is subsequently altered by oral consent at his suggestion, so as to postpone the work without fixing any new time for its completion, cannot afterward object to its not having been completed at the time originally agreed upon. Palmer v. Stockwell, 9 Gray (Mass.) 237.

The plaintiff was not liable for delay in the completion of the building, where it was due to the fact that the defendant's architect either changed the plans and specifications, or failed to furnish necessary lines and levels, but was liable where the delay resulted from the condemnation of materials which he furnished and on which the architect was required to pass under the contract. White v. Braddock Borough School Dist., 159 Pa. St. 201.

If, after a contract is made for building a bridge by a given day, the owner directs the contractor to do additional work requiring longer time, this time must be added to the contract time for completion. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Rust, 19 Fed. Rep. 239.

The original plans for the construction of the piers of a bridge having been rendered impracticable by an act of Congress regulating the construction of the bridge, a new contract was entered into before the expiration of the time for the performance of the old contract, for the construction of the piers according to the altered plan, containing a special reference to description of, and price to be paid for, each pier, it being expressly provided that the work was to be done according to the original negligence¹ or failure of the employer to perform his portion of the contract the contractor will be excused.² The rule is well-settled that where the work to be performed by the contractor specifications. It was held that, as the plaintiff went to work under, and recognized as binding, the old contract, and now sought to recover for its alleged breach, the waiver of the company's right to annul the old contract did not affect its right to terminate it whenever the plaintiff in fact failed or refused to progress with sufficient speed, or in a proper manner, to complete the work in a reasonable time, or within the time agreed on, if any, when the new contract was made. Henderson Bridge Co. v. O'Connor, 88 Ky. 303.

A house not having been completed until fourteen days after the stipulated time, but extra work having been required, it cannot be said, without evidence, that the delay was longer than required for the extra work. Sweney v. Davidson, 68 Iowa 386.

If a contractor agrees to execute not only the work specified, but also all alterations, within the time prescribed in the contract, there is no implied condition that the alterations shall be such as can reasonably be completed within the time. Jones v. St. John's College, 40 L. J., Q. B. 80; L. R., 6 Q. B. 115; Weeks v. Little, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. 1.

Where a contractor undertook to execute works, with enlargement, etc., within a specified time, the architect having power to extend the time for completion in proportion to the extra work so ordered, and additions were ordered and executed, and caused delay in completion of the works beyond the time specified, but the architect did not extend the time, it was held that the contractor was bound to complete the works within the time specified and was liable to pay damages for non-completion within the specified time. Tew v. Newbold-on-Avon Dist. School Board, 1 C. & E. 260.

1. In an action by a contractor for constructing a building, the defendant cannot set off damages for the plaintiff's failure to complete the building within the time prescribed by the contract, where such failure was due solely to his own negligence. White v. Fresno Nat. Bank, 98 Cal. 166.

In an action on a contract to construct a water-tight tank, and place it in the defendant's laboratory in thirty days or before, there was evidence that the plaintiff made such a tank, but could not gain access to the laboratory on the last day, that the defendant delayed performance for three days before actual notice from the plaintiff of readiness to perform, and for seven days thereafter, and that a leakage in the tank when put in place was caused by its exposure to heat in the plaintiff's shop during the delay. It was held that it was a question for the jury whether the plaintiff performed the contract in every respect except as prevented by the defendant. Sylvester v. Wheeler, 26 N. Y. Supp. 411; 74 Hun (N. Y.) 382.

But the performance of a contract to build a house for another on the soil of such person, and that the work shall be executed, finished, and ready for use and occupation; and be delivered over, so finished and ready, to the owner of the soil at a day named, is not excused by the fact that there was a latent defect in the soil, in consequence of which the walls sank and cracked, and the house, having become uninhabitable and dangerous, had to be partially taken down and rebuilt on artificial foundations. Ingle v. Jones, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 1.

2. If the owner refuses to permit the builder to complete his contract, the owner cannot complain of the delay. Homebank v. Drumgoole, 109 N. Y. 63.

Where a building contract containing a damage clause required the completion of the building by a certain time, delays chargeable to the owner or the architect in charge are excusable. Wright v. Meyer (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 1122.

The failure of the contractor to complete the work within the prescribed time is no bar to his recovery, where it appears that he could not prosecute the work on account of an overflow of water caused by the employers' non-compliance with their contract. Skelsey v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 61.

In King Iron Bridge, etc., Co. v. St. Louis, 43 Fed. Rep. 768, the plaintiff contracted with the defendant to build a bridge "on the present stone piers," and bound himself to complete the work within ten months and one week after receiving notice to begin. The cannot be performed until the other work provided to be done by the owner or his employees is finished, the failure of the latter to complete their work in season to enable the contractor to end his within the time limited by the contract, is a sufficient excuse for his delay.¹ So, the failure of the employer to obtain a building defendant failed to prepare the piers to receive the bridge until eleven months after it had given the plaintiff notice to begin. It was held that such failure released the plaintiff from the obligation to complete the bridge within the specified time.

The provisions of a contract that it should be performed on a day named, and as stipulated damages the payment of a certain sum per day for each day's delay thereafter, do not apply where the delay is caused by the failure of the other party to the contract to perform on his part. Davis v. Crookston Waterworks Power, etc., Co. (Minn. 1894), 59 N. W. Rep. 482.

In Maier v. Davis, etc., Lumber Co., 86 Wis. 530, the defendant contracted in writing to pay the plaintiff a certain amount for drawing lumber to the defendant's lumber yard, to furnish a wagon for such purpose, and to pay twenty-five cents additional on every one thousand feet if all should be delivered in a specified time. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the additional pay, though he did not deliver the lumber in the required time, if the delay was caused by the defendant's refusal to furnish a wagon and his failure to furnish the requisite facilities for unloading the lumber in the yard.

The contractor cannot excuse his failure to complete the work in time, on the ground that the company, when he had purchased material and contracted debts for labor on its credit, failed to meet its obligations, and thereby so impaired its credit that he could not dispose of its stock and bonds at a price that would afford him means to carry on the work. Wood v. Boney (N. J. 1891), 21 Atl. Rep. 574.

The fact that some work was delayed by the builder which was not affected by the employer's delay, does not alter the result, unless it be proved that there would have been delay in such independent work, if the contractor had not been hindered. Weeks v. Little, 11 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Ct. App.) 415.

Delay Caused by Other Contractors.—Where a contract for mason work to be done on a building by the plaintiff, provided that a certain payment should be made when the mason work was completed, and the plaintiff was delayed in his work on account of the delay of the work of another independent contractor, which had to be done first, and the plaintiff used all diligence in going on with the work after it was possible for him to do so, and went prepared to finish the job, when he was ordered off by the owner, who had put other men on the work, it was a substantial compliance, and entitled the plaintiff to his payment. Highton v. Dessau (P. Cl.), 19 N. Y. Supp. 395.

Where the contract provides that the contractor is not to excuse delay on account of any neglect of other contractors unless written notice of such neglect is given, and no such notice is given, a refusal to find that the contractor has been delayed six weeks by other contractors is proper. Shute v. Hamilton, 3 Daly (N. Y.) 462.

Where a party contracts to do the stonecutter's work of a building so as not to delay any of the other work, and to complete the same by a day named, and he is prevented from commencing the work by other contractors not having done their work, until about the time for the completion of his work, and he then proceeds under the contract, he will be bound by its provisions, except as to the time of completing his work, and for any unnecessary delay on his part thereafter he will be liable to respond to his employer in damages. Graveson v. Tobey, 75 Ill. 540.

A provision in the contract that the contractor shall have no claim by reason of delay on the part of the manufacturer in delivering pipes, etc., has no application where the pipes, when received, are found to be defective, thus entailing delay. Wood v. Ft. Wayne, 119 U. S. 312.

permit,¹ or to secure a right of way,² or to supply necessary materials,³ or to designate a day for commencing work,⁴ or, in fact, to do anything which he is called upon by the contract to do before the work is to commence, will excuse the contractor for his delay beyond the agreed period of completion.⁵ But after

The provision in a contract for the construction of a railroad that, in case the company is delayed in acquiring title to lands, or for other reasons, the contractor shall not be entitled to damages therefor, but shall have extension of time, does not apply to a delay caused by the company in failing to have a survey made for the work. O'Connor v. Smith, 84 Tex. 232.

3. Where the employer is to find the iron for building a ship, his failure to supply it in time will excuse the contractor for not completing the vessel in the time required. Bulkley v. Brainard, 2 Root (Conn.) 5.

4. Deeves v. New York (Super. Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 460.

But where a party contracted to do a given job of work by a stipulated time, and in the contract was contained a provision that a portion of the work should not be done until directions were given to the other party, it was held that the power to suspend the doing of the work did not continue so long as to prevent the completion of it within the time agreed upon. Dubois v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 285.

Work on a government contract was suspended by order of the government, and a supplementary agreement was made that the contractor might complete the contract should the government decide to have it done. It was held that the unreasonable delay of the government in deciding whether work should be resumed under the original contract was equivalent to an affirmative decision, and entitled the plaintiff to a recovery upon that basis, and the government, having ordered a suspension of the work, was not entitled to recover upon a counterclaim for failure to complete the work within the time originally specified. Nourse v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 7.

Delay in furnishing pipe according to a contract with the defendant is excused if it is occasioned by the discovery of defects in the specifications furnished by defendants' engineer, which made new specifications necessary, or by the failure of defendants to unload the pipe. Wood v. Malone, 131 Pa. St. 554.

Where, under a contract with the defendant, the plaintiffs were to commence the work therein provided for on a special date and failed to do so, it was competent for them to show that, though the defendant notified them at that date that it had been arranged for them to commence, it failed to make arrangements; such evidence being offered, not to change the terms of the contract, but to show the reason of their non-compliance therewith. Texas etc., R. Co. v. Saxton (N. Mex. 1893), 34 Pac. Rep. 532.

In an action on a building contract, where the defendant sets off a penalty stipulated for the plaintiffs' failure to complete the building by a certain time, and there is evidence that it was contemplated when the contract was made that the defendant should put in a siding to enable the plaintiffs to unload materials on the spot, it is not error to charge that the plaintiffs should be allowed additional time on account of the defendant's delay to put in such siding. Huckestein v. Kelly, 139 Pa. St. 201.

The defendants, having contracted to build a railroad, gave the plaintiff an oral subcontract to grade certain sections. The defendants were unable to have the work ready for the plaintiff at the time specified, because the railroad company had not then established the grade. It was held, in an action for special damages for breach of the contract, that it was a question for the jury whether the contract was upon condition that the railroad company the employer has removed the impediment, the contractor must complete the work within a reasonable time.¹

The wrongful withholding of the monthly estimates upon which payment is to be made, will excuse delay,² as will also an unavoidable accident,³ or the act of God.⁴

should establish the grade in time. Hammond v. Beeson, 112 Mo. 190.

In McGowan v. American Pressed Tan Bark Co., 121 U. S. 575, it was held that the time began to run from the date the impediment was removed.

2. Where a building contract, in which there is a damage clause for non-performance by a certain time, provides for payment by the owner on monthly estimates, any delays caused by the wrongful withholding of the same are excusable. Wright v. Meyer (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 1122.

A contractor claimed that his failure to complete a railroad by the time limited was due to the company's refusal to pay the balance due him, and the failure of individual members to comply with promises of assistance. The only compensation agreed on was delivery of stock and bonds, and they were given to him on his estimates until the month before the contract expired, when he declared his inability to proceed further with the work unless more stock were issued him, or more funds raised, which was refused on the ground that he had already been overpaid. He claimed a balance due him, but, instead of insisting on it, he importuned the company to raise funds for the work, and offered to mortgage his own land for the purpose. It was held that his excuse that his failure to complete the road was due to the company's failure to pay him a balance due him was not established. Wood v. Boney (N. J. 1891), 21 Atl. Rep. 574.

3. Bailey v. Stetson, 1 La. Ann. 332.

Where a building contract provides for the completion of the buildings by a specified date, "provided there be no interference from labor strikes," the fact that the mechanics quit work upon the building on account of the contractor failing to pay them their wages as agreed does not release the contractor from completing the building by the time agreed upon. McLeod v. Genius, 31 Neb. 1. Nor is it an excuse where the strike takes place after the time stipulated for completion. Hexter v. Knox, 39 N. Y. Super. Ct. 109.

Where, by the contract, unavoidable accident is only to be allowed for upon written claim made at the time, it will not excuse delay where no written claim is made. Brown v. Strimple, 21 Mo. App. 338.

Delay in Other Parties.—In an action for damages from delay in completing improvements in the plaintiff's place of business, under a contract that they should be completed by a specified day, the witnesses for the defendant testified that the completion of the work was prevented by delay in the making of a tiled flooring, for which the plaintiff had contracted with other parties, and that the work was completed within three or four days after the tiling was finished, while the testimony for the plaintiff was that the delay in putting down the tiling did not in any way hinder the defendant from proceeding. It was held that a verdict for the defendant could not be set aside on appeal, and that the defendant was not necessarily liable for delay, because the work on the improvements agreed to be made was not commenced until after the time specified for its completion. Franchi v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. (C. Pl.), 13 N. Y. Supp. 294.

4. See Deeves v. New York (Super. Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 460.

But the act of God, if relied on as a defense, must be pleaded. Pengra v. Wheeler, 24 Oregon 532.

It is no defense, in an action against the contractor's executors, for failure to complete the contract within the specified time, that the contractor died before the expiration of the time. McDaniel's Appeal (Pa. 1888), 12 Atl. Rep. 154.

Where a person contracts to build a building of a certain kind of stone, and to complete the same within a specified time, the impossibility of procuring the stone, to be an excuse for delay, must have existed when the contract was made. Wright v. Meyer (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 1122.

These rules are equally applicable to contracts between a principal contractor and a subcontractor.¹

7. Performance Subject to Approval—a. APPROVAL OF SUPERINTENDENT.—It is usually provided in building and construction contracts that the work shall be completed to the satisfaction of the superintendent, who is usually the architect or engineer, and shall be paid for upon the production of his certificate approving the work and valuing the amount done. This condition is perfectly valid, and is necessary to secure the owner from imposition by dishonest contractors, and enables him to rest satisfied that the work has been done to the satisfaction of some one thoroughly qualified to pass upon it.² The approval of the superintendent must, in such case, be obtained before any compensation can be recovered,³ which fact must be averred and

1. A builder who has failed to complete in time work which was required to be done on his part before the work of a subcontractor could be commenced, cannot complain that the subcontractor failed to complete his work within the time specified in the contract. Grannis, etc., Lumber Co. v. Deeves (Supreme Ct.), 25 N. Y. Supp. 375; 72 Hun (N. Y.) 171. And see Hammond v. Beeson, 112 Mo. 190.

The provision for acceptance is an additional safeguard against defects not discernible by an unskillful person. Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145; 10 Am. Rep. 449.

In Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. B. N. S. 278; 114 E. C. L. 278, Erle, C. J., said: "It is important that the person for whom the work has been done should not be called upon to pay for it until some competent person shall have certified that the work has been properly done, according to the contract and specification." This is a perfectly lawful and proper condition. It is properly made for the protection of both, by interposing the science and judgment of an expert to secure fidelity in the performance of the work, and in the use of suitable materials. Martin v. Leggett, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 257.

But his approval is only necessary to the extent required by the contract. Thus, in an action for services rendered in rebuilding the foundation of a mausoleum, it appeared that, under the contract between the parties, all payments were to be subject to the architect's approval, and that the defendant might make "any alteration, deviation, additions, or omissions from the said contract" which should not avoid the contract, but be duly allowed for in payment. The foundation was not mentioned in the contract, and there were no specifications. It was held that, in the absence of proof that the rebuilding of the foundation was, in contemplation of the parties, a part of the work provided for by the contract, payment therefor was not subject to the architect's approval. St. John v. Potter (C. Pl.), 19 N. Y. Supp. 230.

A contractor is not entitled to recover for the value of work done, as to which, while incomplete, the architect has expressed approval so far as then partially executed, but which is not subsequently completed to the architect's satisfaction. Richardson v. Mahon, L. R., 4 Ir. C. P. 486.

Where a building contract provided that the architect should determine all questions as to materials or work omitted, but, a question arising as to certain rosin, which was not put under the floors as required by the contract, the architect merely credited the account "by amount retained until rosin filling is properly put under floors, or until ascertained by whose fault the rosin was not properly put under the same," without determining this latter question, it was held that the owner was not entitled to credit for the amount, unless the failure to put the rosin under the floors was the builders' fault, and that this question was properly left to the jury. Huckestein v. Kelly, 152 Pa. St. 631.

proved in an action for the price,¹ and his decision is, in the absence of fraud, conclusive upon the parties.² If the one

Implied Approval.—The approval of the architect may be as well implied as express. Thus, where the architect, who is sole arbiter between the parties as to the character of the materials used, is present, and has knowledge of the character of the materials being used, and does not object at the time, it will be an approval of the same, which cannot be reversed to the injury of the contractor. Wright v. Meyer (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 1122.

In an action by a contractor for building waterworks, the defendant set up the contract, alleging that the work was not done in accordance therewith, and that it had not been accepted, as provided by the defendant's engineer. The plaintiff replied performance under the engineer's directions, and acceptance by actual taking possession of the works by the defendant, and failure of formal acceptance by the engineer. It was held that where the plaintiff's testimony tended to show the presence and directions of the engineer while the work was progressing, and a subsequent acceptance of the works as a whole by the defendant's officers, the court properly refused to withdraw the case from the jury. Coon v. Citizens Water Co., 152 Pa. St. 644.

1. Where a contractor agreed to perform work to the satisfaction of a third person, it was necessary for him to aver and prove, in an action to recover the price stipulated to be paid for the work, that it was done to the satisfaction of the party designated in the contract. Butler v. Tucker, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 447; Barton v. Hermann, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 378.

Ct.) 49; Dorwin v. Westbrook, 86 Hun (N. Y.) 363.

Where a contract for work to be done provides that "the decision of the engineer in charge as to the quality and quantity shall be final, and he shall be the sole referee," a court will not disturb the decision of such officer in the absence of fraud or such gross error as would imply bad faith. Ogden v. U. S., 60 Fed. Rep. 725; 9 C. C. A. 251.

The acceptance of contract work bi-weekly, as it progresses, by the superintendent of a corporation, as done to his satisfaction in compliance with the terms of the contract, and a final acceptance of the whole in writing, is conclusive on the company in the absence of fraud or mistake on the part of the superintendent. Sheffield, etc., Coal, etc., Co. v. Gordon, 151 U. S. 285.

But his decision is only conclusive of those matters referred to him by the contract, and where a clause in a building contract provided that the architect's decision should be binding on both parties "as to the interpretation of the drawings and specifications, and as to the quality and quantity of work or materials, or any other matter connected with the work, furnishing materials, or in settlement of this contract," it was held not to include a claim for damages for unreasonable delay in performing the contract. Michigan Ave. M. E. Church v. Hearson, 41 Ill. App. 89.

The appointment of a person to see whether certain work was done according to contract, does not confer the power of a referee; and his opinion would not be conclusive. McKinney v. Page, 32 Me. 513.

Where a building contract stipulates that the materials shall be of a certain quality, and that the work shall be performed in the best manner, subject to the acceptance or rejection of the architect, all to be done in strict accordance with the plans and specifications, and to be paid for when done completely and accepted, the acceptance by the architect of a different class of work or of different materials will not bind the owner, as the provision for the acceptance by the architect is merely an additional safeguard for the benefit of the owner. Lewis v. Yagel (Supreme Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 833; 77 Hun (N. Y.) 337.

Fraud of Superintendent.—Evidence that the architect, in accepting the work, acted collusively and in bad designated to approve the work declines to act, the contractor may show that it is according to the contract.¹

6. APPROVAL OF EMPLOYER.—Where the contract, as it frequently does, provides that the work shall be performed to the satisfaction of the employer, it does not mean merely according to his private taste or liking, but what reasonably ought to satisfy him, and where he has accepted the benefit of the work he will not be allowed to avoid payment.² But where the employer, acting bona fide and not from mere caprice, refuses to accept the work, he cannot be compelled to pay for it.³

faith, is admissible. Vermont St. M. E. Church v. Brose, 104 Ill. 206.

1. Where a contract for the building of an electric plant provides that on its completion it shall be inspected and passed upon by a certain person, and such person declines to act, the builder may show that the quality of the work is according to the specifications. A. J. Anderson Electric Co. v. Cleburne Water, etc., Co. (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 504.

Where the employer has, prior to the completion of the work, discharged his architect, the contractor may recover on showing a substantial compliance with the contract. Griffith v. Happersberger, 86 Cal. 605.

Stipulations, in a railroad construction contract, that the engineer shall be the sole judge of the performance, do not prevent the contractor from recovering upon other evidence of performance, if the engineer refuses to measure or estimate the work done; nor do they govern as to extra work, work not called for by the contract. Starkey v. DeGraff, 22 Minn. 431.

St. Rep. 398; Braunstein v. Accidental Death Ins. Co., 1 B. & S. 782; 101 E. C. L. 782; Dallman v. King, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 105; 33 E. C. L. 293; Parsons v. Sexton, 4 C. B. 899; 56 E. C. L. 897.

In Hawkins v. Graham, 149 Mass. 284, Holmes, J., said: "When the consideration furnished is of such a nature that its value will be lost to the plaintiff, either wholly or in great part, unless paid for, a just hesitation must be felt, and clear language required, before deciding that payment is left to the will, or even to the idiosyncrasies, of the interested party. In doubtful cases, courts have been inclined to construe agreements of this class as agreements to do the thing in such way as reasonably ought to satisfy the defendant" (employer).

Where the work was to be performed to the full satisfaction of the architect and the satisfaction of the owner, it was held that the last provision had no reference to the quality of the workmanship or materials, and that as to these, in the absence of proof of fraud, mistake, or unfair dealing on the part of the architect, his acceptance of the work as satisfactory bound the owner. Tetz v. Butterfield, 54 Wis. 242; 41 Am. Rep. 29.

When a party has substantially complied with the terms of a contract which he is to perform to the satisfaction or approval of the other party, whereby the property of the latter has been benefited materially, the improvements and benefits being of such a character that they must be necessarily appropriated and retained by the party by whom they are made, the contractor is entitled to recover on his contract. O'Dea v. Winona, 41 Minn. 424.

3. Singlerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. St. 291; 54 Am. Rep. 715; McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray (Mass.) 139; Andrews v. Belfield, 2 C. B. N. S. 779; 89 E. C. L. 779. In the last two cases the contract was for the manufacture of a chattel to the satisfaction of the employer, who refused to receive it, and received no benefit therefrom. And see also Moffatt v. Dickson, 13 C. B. 543; 76 E. C. L. 543.

Where the materials are to be approved by the employer before being used, the contractor must apply to him to approve them, or use them at his peril. Higgins v. Lee, 16 Ill. 495.

defendants, of a certain kind and dimensions, "in a good, strong, and workmanlike manner, to the satisfaction of" one of the defendants, was not maintained by proof that it was constructed according to the terms of the agreement, without also proving that it was satisfactory to, or accepted by, that defendant. *McCarren v. A formal approval and acceptance by the architect, without a certificate, are not enough. Schencke v. Rowell, 3 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 42.

Where, by a contract, an engineer is interposed between the parties to it, and made the absolute judge of the performance of the work, there is no right in the one party to demand payment, and no liability on the other to pay, throughout the contract, unless the condition of obtaining a valuation by the engineer and his certificate has been fulfilled. Scott v. Liverpool Corp., 4 Jur. N. S. 402; 27 L. J. Ch. 641.

Where a construction contract requires all work done on the road to be certified by the chief engineer, until he so certifies the contractors are not entitled to payment. Jones v. Reg., 7 Can. Supreme Ct. 570; McNamara v. Harrison, 81 Iowa 486.

In Reg. v. Starrs, 17 Can. Supreme Ct. 118, the claimants made a contract for the construction of a bridge for a certain lump sum, and upon its completion the chief engineer made a final estimate, and payment was made. The claimants claimed for the value of work not included in the estimate, alleged to have been done in consequence of alterations ordered by the chief engineer, of such a nature as to create a new contract, but it was held that the claim came within the provisions of the original contract, making the certificate of the chief engineer a condition precedent to recovery, and such certificate not having been obtained, the claim could not be allowed.

In Byron v. Low, 109 N. Y. 291, no certificate of the engineer was produced, and no demand for one, or any refusal to give it, was proved, and it was held a condition precedent to the right to recover.

If an architect, subject to whose approval a building is erected, acting in good faith, fails and refuses to approve the work in any form, the general rule is that the contractor cannot recover. Kane v. Wilson, etc., Stone Co., 39 Ohio St. 1; Sweeney v. U. S., 109 U. S. 618.

But where a building contractor signed a writing by which the decision of the architect should be final as to any matter of difference between the parties, and making the contract price payable in installments on presentation of certificates of the architect, and the writing showed on its face that it was to be signed by the owner, but it was not in fact signed by him, it was held that the writing did not affect the

but the rule is otherwise where its production is waived¹ or fraud or collusion in withholding it is shown.² The rule is the same contractor's right to sue for the value of his services, though the architect refused to give a certificate. Keating v. Nelson, 33 Ill. App. 357.

In Davis v. Badders (Ala. 1892), 10 So. Rep. 422, it was held that where the plaintiffs had contracted to build a house for the defendants, payments to be made only on the architects' certificates, and sued on the common counts, on an implied contract to pay for the labor and materials, they could recover although they had not obtained the architects' certificates.

And see Willey v. Fractional School Dist., 25 Mich. 419, where it was held that provisions in a contract for the construction of a school building, requiring the certificate of the architect to the performance of the work, before payment, are not necessarily a condition precedent to the right of the contractor to recover for work which has been approved by the local superintendent of the work, employed by the district.

In Packard v. Van Schoick, 58 Ill. 79, it was said that the party applying for such estimate and certificate should give notice to the other of the time and place of a hearing in respect thereto. But see Korf v. Lull, 70 Ill. 420, and Taylor v. Renn, 79 Ill. 181.

Where the contractor claimed the right to maintain an action without regard to a certificate, an unreasonable time having expired without the filing of one, it was held that, since it appeared that on a certain day prior to the action a certificate was delivered to the commissioners, though the one offered in evidence by the defendant was not identified with it, a statement that a final certificate was filed on that day was not impeached by evidence that the certificate delivered to the commissioners was taken back and afterward a certificate was returned. O'Brien v. New York, 139 N. Y. 543.

A contractor sought to recover the price of certain ironwork, manufactured for a building which he was to put up, and be paid for upon the estimate of an architect; the building having been destroyed by fire before the same could be put up, and the plaintiff being in no default, it was held that the case contemplated for the architect's certificate never arose, and that a recovery could be had without it, according to the contract price for the iron-work manufactured. Rawson v. Clark, 70 Ill. 656.

Final Payment.—But a provision in a contract for payment upon the architect's certificates as the work progresses, does not make a certificate by the architect a condition precedent to the final payment. Braun v. Winans, 37 Ill. App. 248; Oberlies v. Bullinger, 75 Hun (N. Y.) 248. Though where the contract provided for payment in six installments, the first three at various stages of the work, the fourth when the building was completed, the fifth, thirty days thereafter, and the last, six months thereafter, and that in each case a certificate should be obtained from the architect that the work was done in strict accordance with the plans and specifications, it was held that the certificate of the architect was necessary as to each of the payments, and that the fourth certificate, given after the completion of the building, was not conclusive as to the character of the work. Michaelis v. Wolf, 136 Ill. 68.

Absence No Bar to Damages for Breach.—A provision in a building contract requiring the production of the architect's certificate as a prerequisite to collecting compensation for performance, cannot defeat the contractor's right to damages for breach of the contract by the employer. Linch v. Paris Lumber, etc., Elevator Co., 80 Tex. 23.

where a certificate as to extra work¹ or alterations is required.² But where it is the employer's duty to procure the certificate, its absence is no bar to a recovery where it is shown that the work has been completed to the satisfaction of the architect,³ and if the contractor has been compelled to abandon the work by the employer, he may recover the value of the work done without the certificate.⁴

The absence of the certificate is always a good defense to an action by the contractor upon the contract,⁵ who must either aver in the pleadings and establish by the evidence that he has complied with the condition and obtained the certificate, or offer a sufficient excuse for not doing so.⁶

Notwithstanding a building contract makes the certificate of an architect conclusive between the parties, evidence is competent that it has been given by collusion and fraud. Smith v. White, 5 Neb. 408.

If the contractor can show that the certificate was fraudulently withheld, or refused by the architect through collusion with the owner, or that the owner has waived it, it is said that he might be entitled to recover on showing, prima facie, that the agreement was, in other respects, performed. Martin v. Leggett, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 255.

Where a building contract makes the architect's certificate a condition of payment, payment is not due without such certificate, unless it be unreasonably withheld. Beecher v. Schuback (C. Pl.), 23 N. Y. Supp. 604.

If the contractors use all reasonable efforts to get the superintendent to make a certificate and are prevented by accident, fraud, or some unavoidable cause, they will be entitled to recover for their labor and materials such value as they prove themselves entitled to receive. Mills v. Weeks, 21 Ill. 561.

The contractor may prove a fraudulent purpose of the inspector in refusing a certificate; also his incompetency, he not having been named and agreed upon in the contract. Sweeny v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 400.

1. Fowler v. Deakman, 84 Ill. 130; Zimmerman v. German Luth. Church, 11 Misc. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 49.

If a contractor is to procure the certificate of the architect as to extra work done, before payment is to be made, he must do so or show a good reason for not doing it. Mills v. Weeks, 21 Ill. 561; McNamara v. Harrison, 81 Iowa 486.

Where the contract provided for the payment of a balance due within two months after receiving the architect's certificate that the whole of the building contracted for had been executed to his satisfaction, it was held to involve not only the original, but the additional, or extra, work, and that until the contractor obtained the architect's certificate of approval he could not recover. Morgan v. Birnie, 9 Bing. 672; 23 E. C. L. 414.

3. McKone v. Williams, 37 Ill. App. 591.

4. Byron v. New York, 54 N. Y. Super. Ct. 411.

The plaintiff agreed to perform certain work and labor in shifting the track of a railroad, "under the directions, and to the satisfaction," of the city surveyor, whose certificate of such performance was to entitle him to payment. Before the work was completed it was stopped at a certain point by the surveyor, who drove a stake and directed that no work should be done beyond that point. It was held that the plaintiff might recover for the portion of the work performed. Devlin v. Second Avenue R. Co., 44 Barb. (N. Y.) 81.

Where the contract has been forfeited, no certificate is necessary to recover for the work actually done. Gillen v. Hubbard, 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 303.

5. The owner, in an action by the contractor for a larger sum than that certified by the architect, cannot obtain an injunction restraining the action, as the absence of the certificate can be as well pleaded in law as in equity. Baron de Worms v. Meiller, L. R., 16 Eq. 554.

6. Michaelis v. Wolf, 136 Ill. 68;

There is no difference between law and equity as to the construction or operation of such an agreement.¹

(2) By Whom Given.—The one filling the office of superintendent at the time the decision is called for is the proper one to give the certificate, and not one who held the office at the time the contract was made.² The certificate must be signed by the superintendent, and not by his assistant.³

Wangler v. Swift, 90 N. Y. 38; Dinsmore v. Livingston County, 60 Mo. 244; Bayse v. Ambrose, 32 Mo. 484; Roy v. Boteler, 40 Mo. App. 222.

The complaint in an action on such a contract must allege the making of the certificate, or else a legal reason dispensing with it. Nor is a mere allegation of the plaintiff's complete performance, or of the defendant's acceptance of the work sued for, enough. Schencke v. Rowell, 3 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 42.

Where the contractor sues without the certificate, alleging bad faith and collusion, such allegations must be proved before there can be any recovery, unless the common counts are also filed. Fowler v. Deakman, 84 Ill. 130.

In an action to recover the last payment on a building contract providing for such payment on the architect's certificate, where it appeared that the employer undertook the completion of the work himself, under a provision of the contract, thereby rendering the architect's certificate unnecessary, to enable the plaintiff to recover the difference between the last installment and the amount expended in completing the work, the court erred in dismissing the complaint for failure to aver that the architect's certificate was unreasonably withheld. Weeks v. O'Brien, 141 N. Y. 199.

In an action on a building contract which provided that no money should be due and payable unless certified to by the architect, a declaration by the builder which sets out the contract, and alleges that he "performed each and every requirement by him contracted, as set forth in the contract," is sufficient without alleging a certificate from the architect. McClell. Dig., p. 826, § 59 (Florida Rev. Stat., § 1045), provides that it shall be lawful to aver, generally, performance of conditions precedent, and that the opposite party shall not deny such averment generally, but must specify the conditions precedent, the performance of which he intends to contest. Wilcox v. Stephenson, 30 Fla. 377.

The rule requiring compliance with such condition, or an excuse for non-compliance, applies as well to a proceeding in equity as a suit at law. Michaells v. Wolf, 136 Ill. 68; Barney v. Giles, 120 Ill. 154; Downey v. O'Donnell, 86 Ill. 49.

2. North Lebanon R. Co. v. McGrann, 33 Pa. St. 530; Ranger v. Great Western R. Co., 27 Eng. L. & Eq. 35.

The certificate required must be had from the engineer who has charge of the work at the time it is done. Wangler v. Swift, 90 N. Y. 38.

Where, in a building contract, certain matters connected with the work were left to the decision of the chief engineer of the owner, it was held that after the work was finished, a person who had been such engineer, but had left the owner's employ, was not the person intended. Wallis Iron Works v. Monmouth Park Assoc. (N. J. 1893), 26 Atl. Rep. 140.

Where a building contract makes the architect's certificate a condition of payment, and on the death of the architect named another is substituted by the owner and accepted by the contractor, the certificate of the latter is necessary. Beecher v. Schuback (C. Pl.), 23 N. Y. Supp. 604, 4 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 54.

If the superintendent resigns and the employer fails to appoint a successor, the parties are at liberty to resort to the courts of law. North Lebanon R. Co. v. McGrann, 33 Pa. St. 530.

3. McNamara v. Harrison, 81 Iowa 486.

Payments on account of the work done, made on a certificate signed by the architect's assistant, are not a waiver of the right under the contract to a final certificate signed by the architect himself. McEntyre v. Tucker

(3) Progress Certificates.—Many working contracts involve the outlay of considerable sums of money, and it would be a great hardship upon the contractor to compel him to wait until the completion of the work before receiving any compensation; it would, in fact, make the business of contracting one requiring a much larger outlay of capital than the majority of contractors possess. In consequence, a provision is usually inserted that the superintendent shall issue certificates from time to time, sometimes called "progress certificates," certifying the value of the work performed, upon which the owner shall make advances to the contractor up to a certain per cent. of the value certified.¹

(4) Waiver of Certificate.—The provision requiring certificates of approval is placed in the contract for the benefit of the owner, merely to provide a method by which he may satisfy himself that the contract has been fully performed. He may waive it at his option and receive other proofs of the required fact, or pay without proof,² and such waiver may be implied as well as

1. See Barton v. Hermann, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 378; McNamara v. Harrison, 81 Iowa 486.

In Hanley v. Walker, 79 Mich. 607, the contractors were to be paid from time to time, as the work progressed, upon the certificate of the architects, deducting ten per cent.

Such certificates simply state the amount of work done and the value of the same, and payments made under them are provisional only, and subject to adjustment or readjustment at the end of the contract. Tharsis Sulphur, etc., Co. v. M'Elroy, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 1040. And see Hartup v. Pittsburgh, 97 Pa. St. 107; McNamara v. Harrison, 81 Iowa 486; Crumlish v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 5 Del. Ch. 270.

The final certificate may be withheld upon the subsequent discovery of unsound work. Cooper v. Uttoxeter Burial Board, 11 L. T. N. S. 565. No partial payment during the progress of the work can be claimed without the certificate. Braun v. Winans, 37 Ill. App. 248; Martin v. Leggett, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 255. But it is required for the benefit of the owner who may waive its production and pay without it. Blethen v. Blake, 44 Cal. 117; Barton v. Hermann, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 378.

Where the board of supervisors of a county make a contract with the builder to build a courthouse, for which he is to be paid eighty-five per cent. as the work progresses, on monthly estimates, upon the certificate of the superintendent of the building employed by the county, fifteen per cent. to be reserved until the completion of the work, the county is not bound by any arrangement made between such builder and superintendent and subcontractor, by which certificates are to be issued to the subcontractor, such agreement being at variance with the terms of the original contract. Bouton v. McDonough County, 84 Ill. 384.

The fact that some of the payments are to be made after the building is completed, does not avoid the necessity of obtaining a certificate for each payment. Michaelis v. Wolf, 136 Ill. 68.

Provisions in a building contract for payment for work and materials by installments, naming no dates for the same, but providing in each case for the architect's certificate "that all the work upon the performance of which the payment is to become due has been done to his satisfaction," shows an intention that they should become due at dates intermediate the date and the completion of the contract. Wright v. Reusens (Supreme Ct.), 15 N. Y. Supp. 590; affirmed 133 N. Y. 298.

2. Blethen v. Blake, 44 Cal. 117; Clark v. Pope, 70 Ill. 128; Martin v. Leggett, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 255; Bannister v. Patty, 35 Wis. 215.

If the owner intends to assert his right to a final certificate, he should express,¹ but proof of the waiver should be of the clearest and most satisfactory kind.²

(5) Withholding Certificate.—Where the certificate is withheld by the superintendent through fraudulent collusion with the owner, its production will be excused;³ and, according to the notify the contractor of such intention and place his refusal to pay the balance on the ground that no certificate has been furnished. Bannister v. Patty, 35 Wis. 215.

1. Waiver may be express or proved by acts and conduct of the party entitled to demand it. Byrne v. Sisters of Charity, 45 N. J. L. 213. But a waiver of the right to require a certificate of approval will not be implied from the fact that payments have been made from time to time without them. Brown v. Winehill, 3 Wash. 524. The architect's final certificate of approval may, notwithstanding, be required. Barton v. Hermann, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 378.

But where it appears that the owner paid more than fifty per cent. of the contract price of the materials furnished up to a certain date, without requiring any certificate from the superintendent, and that he did not afterward demand one for the residue of the work, he was held to have waived its production. Bannister v. Patty, 35 Wis. 215.

And a promise to pay after the work is done, without requiring the certificate, amounts to a waiver. Flaherty v. Miner, 123 N. Y. 382.

A waiver of a right to require the certificate and estimate of the chief engineer will not be implied from the fact that monthly payments have been made upon the measurements and estimates of an assistant engineer. McNamara v. Harrison, 81 Iowa 486.

A mere allegation that the employer "duly accepted the work performed by the plaintiff under and by virtue of the said agreement" does not show that the work was accepted as a full compliance with the contract, and is insufficient as an allegation of waiver. Schencke v. Rowell, 7 Daly (N. Y.) 286.

A building contract stipulated for payment in installments as the work progressed, provided that in each case a certificate should be obtained, signed by a certain architect. But, in fact, he did not superintend the work, changes were made in the specifications, and the installments, except the last, were paid without requiring the certificate, and without objection or reservation. After the work was finished, the owner expressed himself satisfied. When the claim for the balance was presented, he threatened that unless the builders would give up a claim which they had against him independent of the contract, he would throw the whole matter into the architect's hands. It was held that the facts constituted a waiver of the condition as to the certificate. Overruling Bell v. Sun Printing, etc., Co., 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 567. Haden v. Coleman, 73 N. Y. 567.

Taking Possession of Building.—The fact that the owner takes possession of the building after the contractor has left the premises cannot be construed as an unequivocal acceptance of the work, but the most that can be said is that such act, and all of the circumstances, may be taken into consideration in determining whether there is an implied waiver of a condition precedent to such acceptance, such as the architect's certificate of approval. Hanley v. Walker, 79 Mich. 607.

But see Blethen v. Blake, 44 Cal. 117, where it was said that the entrance of the owner into the possession and enjoyment of the building was sufficient evidence that he was satisfied, that it had been completed in accordance with the contract, and that the production of the certificate would accomplish nothing more.

Acceptance of Work.—An acceptance of a building as under a completed contract is a waiver of a stipulation that the final payment shall not be required until the architect's certificate shall have been obtained. Smith v. Alker, 102 N. Y. 87.

2. It will not be presumed where the evidence of the parties is conflicting in regard thereto. Brown v. Winehill, 3 Wash. 527.

But less evidence of the waiver is requisite when it clearly appears that the contract has been fully performed. Byrne v. Sisters of Charity, 45 N. J. L. 213.

3. Michaelis v. Wolf, 136 Ill. 68; School District No. 27 v. Randall, 5

English cases, only where there is such collusion.¹ Many of the American cases hold, however, that where the certificate is withheld through the fraud, malice, caprice, or mistake of the superintendent, even though there be no collusion between him and the owner, the contractor may recover without it.²

Neb. 408; Dabbs v. Nugent, 13 L. T. N. S. 396; Batterbury v. Vyse, 2 H. & C. 42; McIntosh v. Great Western R. Co., 18 L. J. N. S. Ch. 94; 13 Jur. 92; 2 McN. & G. 74; 2 H. & T. 250.

If withheld by collusion between the owner and superintendent its absence is no bar to a recovery, under the contract, for materials furnished or work performed. Bannister v. Patty, 35 Wis. 215.

Although the giving of a certificate by the architect is a condition precedent to a builder's right of payment for work done, the builder may, nevertheless, recover for the work done if the withholding of the certificate is due to the improper interposition of the employer, who prevented the architect from giving his certificate. Brunsdon v. Beresford, 1 C. & E. 125.

The builder may sue upon the contract and impeach the decision of the party withholding the certificate, on the ground of fraud or mistake. Fowler v. Deakman, 84 Ill. 130; Badger v. Kerber, 61 Ill. 328.

In Milner v. Field, 5 Exch. 829; 20 L. J. Exch. 68, it was held that under the general issue the absence of the certificate was a good answer to an action upon the contract, and that even if it was withheld by fraud, it could only be the subject of a cross action.

Fraud in Withholding.—In Cooper v. Uttoxeter Burial Board, 11 L. T. N. S. 565, a contractor engaged to execute, in a "workmanlike manner," certain buildings for a burial board, to the entire satisfaction of the architect; the payments in respect of the work to be made to the contractor from time to time as the work proceeded, and the balance on the final certificate of the architect that the work had been executed according to the contract. Certificates from time to time had been given by the architect, and the contractor received payments on account. It appeared, subsequently, that parts of the work had not been done in a "sound and workmanlike manner," and the final certificate was withheld. On a bill by the contractor to have it declared that the withholding of the final certificate was a fraud upon him, it was held that on proof of the "unsound and unworkmanlike manner of the buildings," the withholding of the final certificate was not a fraud upon the plaintiff, although the architect had given certificates from time to time to enable the builder to obtain money on account.

1. Where the plaintiff, in an action for the contract price of the work, averred that all things necessary had been duly and efficiently performed and completed to the satisfaction of the surveyor, but that the latter had not given the certificate but had wrongfully and improperly neglected and refused to do so, etc., it was held that, in the absence of collusion, the plaintiff could not recover without producing the certificate. Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. B. N. S. 278; 114 E. C. L. 278; 34 L. J. C. P. 148; 11 L. T. N. S. 679; 13 W. R. 345.

In Scott v. Liverpool Corp., 3 De G. & J. 334, 5 Jur. N. S. 104; 28 L. J. Ch. 230, the contractor filed a bill against the employers and their engineer, complaining of undue delay on the part of the latter in awarding the amount earned and seeking payment of what was due upon the contract, but did not establish any case of fraud or collusion against the engineer, and it was held that the bill was properly dismissed with costs.

The production of the certificate is excused when the superintendent unconsciously and in bad faith withholds it. Thomas v. Fleury, 26 N. Y. 26;

Barton v. Hermann, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 382.

The unreasonable refusal to give the certificate dispenses with its production. Flaherty v. Miner, 123 N. Y. 382.

Where the approval is wrongfully or unavoidably withheld, the courts have never refused redress. Williams v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 112 Mo. 463.

In Hudson v. McCartney, 33 Wis. 331, the court refused to decide whether the contractor could recover without showing that the certificate was corruptly withheld by the superintendent in collusion with the owner.

Where a building contract requires a certificate that the work has been well done, as a prerequisite to payment, and this certificate is withheld by order of the owner, and not because the work has not been well done, the builder may maintain an action against the owner without such certificate. Whelen v. Boyd, 114 Pa. St. 228.

A provision in a building contract for the payment of the builder only on certificates of the architects that payments are due, will not prevent recovery by the builder, when he has fully performed the contract and the architects refuse their certificates without sufficient cause. Van Keuren v. Miller (Supreme Ct.), 24 N. Y. Supp. 580; 71 Hun (N. Y.) 68.

The superintendent must exercise his power with reasonable discretion and not capriciously, and if he refuses to deliver a certificate in bad faith and fraudulently, then the contractor may recover upon performance. Badger v. Kerber, 61 Ill. 328. In this case a party contracted to furnish stone for the erection of a building, with reference to stone from a particular quarry to be used, which was recommended by the superintendent selected by the parties, upon whose certificate payment was to be made. The contractor used it and received certificates after using it on a part of the building, and it was held that the superintendent could not capriciously or fraudulently refuse to give him a certificate after he had completed the contract, on the pretext that the stone was not of the proper kind.

But a certificate can be properly demanded, and recovery had on refusal thereof, only where there has been a substantial compliance with all the terms of the contract, and there remains nothing further to be done in relation thereto which it is practicable and reasonable to require to make the job a finished and complete one. Craig v. Geddis, 4 Wash. 390.

Though the production of the architect's certificate of the inspection of a building is a condition precedent to the recovery of the contract price from the owner, the fraudulent withholding of such certificate by the architect will dispense with its production. Bradner v. Roffell (N. J. 1894), 29 Atl. Rep. 317.

In an action for the contract price of a building, where the evidence shows that the architect, on an inspection, stated that the building was completed according to contract, and that he would give the requisite certificate to the builder, but that he afterward refused to do so, and that the building was in fact completed according to contract, the builder is entitled to recover, though the contract made the production of the architect's certificate of completion a condition precedent to such recovery. Bradner v. Roffell (N. J. 1894), 29 Atl. Rep. 317.

Under a contract providing that work shall be done to the satisfaction of the superintendent, that his decision as to the quality of the work or material shall be conclusive, and that payment shall be made only on his certificate, the mistake in refusing a certificate, which will authorize a recovery without it, is an unintentional misapprehension or ignorance of some material fact which must be shown clearly, and so palpable as to amount to dishonest or arbitrary action. Wendt v. Vogel, 87 Wis. 462.

A building contract provided that the work was to be done to the satisfaction of the architect, to be shown by his certificate. In an action for a balance due thereon, one of the plaintiffs testified that the work had been completed, and that when he applied to the architect for a certificate the latter made no complaint about the work, but referred to some damage from water, and said the defendant was "a little cranky," and that he did not like to give a certificate until the defendant was satisfied; that the defendant ought to settle, etc. It was held that it was proper to submit to the jury the question whether the certificate was unreasonably withheld. Gibbons v. Russell (Brooklyn City Ct.), 13 N. Y. Supp. 879.

The plaintiff contracted to macadamize a street, payment to be made when the same was accepted by the board of public works. The board was

The superintendent is entitled to a reasonable time in which to examine the work and satisfy himself that it has been completed according to the contract, before giving the final certificate,¹ but if he withholds it through fraud or collusion with the employer, the contractor may maintain an action against them, either jointly or severally, for damages,² though in the absence of collusion the employer is not responsible for the refusal of the superintendent to give a certificate.³

(6) Sufficiency.—No particular form of certificate is requisite; any words conveying the meaning of the superintendent that the work has been performed to his satisfaction and stating the amount due are sufficient.⁴ It is not, in fact, absolutely necessary that it should state, in terms, that the work has been done to his satisfaction where such fact can be reasonably implied,⁵ composed of three men, one of whom examined the work and accepted it, and the others refused and neglected to make any examination, and had nothing to do with its acceptance, and it was held that the non-action or default of some of the members would not have the effect of depriving the plaintiff of all compensation for his labor and materials. Neenan v. Donoghue, 50 Mo. 493.

In Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648, it was held that where the contractor has substantially performed the contract, he may recover without the architect's certificate of approval, upon showing a refusal of the architect to give it, the refusal in such case being unreasonable.

Evidence of Fraud or Mistake.—The plaintiff, in order to introduce evidence of fraud or mistake on the part of the superintendent in refusing to give his certificate of approval, must set up the facts in his complaint. Hudson v. McCartney, 33 Wis. 331.

Return of Certificate by Contractor.—If the contractor returns the final certificate to the architect, the amount not being satisfactory, and the architect afterwards refuses to give him any further certificate, he may recover without it. Arnold v. Bournique, 144 Ill. 132, reversing 44 Ill. App. 199.

1. A contract for the construction of an aqueduct provided that the engineer should give a certificate to the aqueduct commissioners when, in his opinion, the contractor had completely performed the contract, and that the commissioners should pay the amount therein stated within thirty days thereafter, the contractor not to be entitled to payment until the certificate had been given. The engineer claimed that there were defects in the aqueduct requiring further work, and three months after it was done gave the certificate. It was held that there was no unreasonable delay in furnishing the certificate, the aqueduct being many miles in length, and involving an outlay of several millions of dollars, and there being a demand about the same time for a final estimate under several contracts, all of which involved a great amount of figuring. O'Brien v. New York, 139 N. Y. 543.

Nor will he be subject to an action for errors in his estimates, or refusing to reconsider them, his duties involving the exercise of judgment and skill. Stevenson v. Watson, 4 C. P. Div. 148; 48 L. J. C. P. 318; 40 L. T. 485; 27 W. R. 682.

4. See Lloyd's Law of Building & Buildings (2d ed.), § 21. The following form of certificate is given in the above work: "I hereby certify that the work of J. B. has been completed to my entire satisfaction, in conformity to the specifications and drawings, and in a substantial and efficient manner. I further certify that there is a balance of $—— due to him under the contract. A. L., Architect."

5. In Bannister v. Patty, 35 Wis. 215, the superintendent certified to the

and a certificate by the architect that the last payment was "due as per contract" has been held sufficient.¹ A final certificate of the completion of the work to the satisfaction of the architect has even been held sufficient without stating the amount remaining due;² but the certificate must be substantially what the contract amount and value of the work furnished, stating the value at the contract prices, but not stating in terms that it was to his satisfaction. It was held to be in effect a certificate that the work was done to his satisfaction. Lyon, J., said: "The certificate does not state, in terms, that the work is to the satisfaction of the superintendent, but it fixes the value thereof at the contract price and states no objection thereto. This, we think, is equivalent to a statement that the work was done to his satisfaction."

1. In Wyckoff v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 143, the building contract provided that the last installment should be paid when all the work was "completely finished and certified to that effect by the architect" under whose direction the work was to be done, and the production of the certificate of the architect that "the last payment is due as per contract" was held conclusive.

In Bloodgood v. Ingoldsby, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 388, the following certificate was held sufficient: "This is to certify that the ——— payment, amounting to ——— dollars, is now due to M. B., on account of his contract with you for doing the masons' and carpenters' work of your store, No. 46 Warren Street."

An architect's certificate that "there is now due to 'the contractor' the final payment of his contract," specifying the amount, sufficiently complies with a contract requiring final payment within thirty days after completion, provided that the architect shall certify in writing that all the work upon the performance of which the payment is to become due has been done to his satisfaction. Snaith v. Smith (C. Pl.), 27 N. Y. Supp. 379; 7 Misc. Rep. 37.

Where the contract provided that the work should be done under the direction and supervision of the architect, "to be certified by a certificate or writing under his hand," a certificate stating "balance due in full of contract price" was held sufficient. Mercer v. Harris, 4 Neb. 77.

In Stewart v. Keteltas, 36 N. Y. 392, the court said that "it was not necessary that the architect's certificate should contain a statement that the work was done agreeably to the drawing and specifications, within the time, in a good, workmanlike, and substantial manner, under his direction and to his satisfaction."

But where the contract called for an architect's certificate "that the contract has been well and duly performed and accepted by him, and that all damages or allowances which should be made have been deducted," a certificate that the contractors "are entitled to a payment of $1,079.73 by the terms of the contract, work having been measured at the building," was held insufficient and not to entitle the contractors to their final payment. Barney v. Giles, 120 Ill. 154.

2. Pashby v. Birmingham, 18 C. B. 2; 86 E. C. L. 2. In this case the contract provided that "no payments should be made to the contractors, except on the production of the certificate of the architect that a certain amount of work had been done, and that the architect should deliver his certificate thereof at the end of every fourteen days," and "that the contractors should be entitled to receive, at the end of every fourteen days, the amount for which the architect should have given his certificate; the amount of such certificate to be less by certain varying proportions than the value of the work done, until 90 per cent. of the whole should be completed; and that no further payments should be made to the contractors until within three calendar months after the architect should have certified the completion of the whole work to his satisfaction," and a certificate of final completion was held sufficient without mentioning the amount remaining due. Willes, J., in this case, said: "The certificate in question is for the balance remaining unpaid in respect of the work done under the contract, and the alterations and additions. It is said that the certificate must state the amount due. There is, however, no provision for that in that part of the contract which I have read. Here is a certificalls for;¹ and a certificate that the building is finished in such a manner that the architect would accept it if it were his own, does not comply with a contract requiring a certificate that it has been "fully and completely finished according to the specifications,"² and merely checking the builder's charges,³ or giving the contractor an order on the owner for a certain sum, is insufficient.⁴ But where the owner has repeatedly made payments on certificates of a peculiar form without objection, he cannot raise such objection for the first time on the trial.⁵ If a certificate in writing is called for, a parol approval is insufficient,⁶ and it is always cate of the architect that the whole of the work has been completed to his satisfaction. The other provision which has been referred to applies to the intermediate certificates only. It is clear that the final certificate need show no more than the completion of the whole work. That view of the matter is considerably fortified by a reference to that part of the conditions which requires the particulars and the amount of alterations and additions to be entered in a book."

Final payment of the sum due a subcontractor from a builder for work performed cannot be refused on the ground that the subcontractor had failed to procure an architect's certificate as to the proper performance of his work, as required by the contract, where the architect has certified that the subcontractor is entitled to a settlement, but without prejudice to any claim the builder might have for time lost, or work done, in carrying out the terms of the contract. Grannis, etc., Lumber Co. v. Deeves (Supreme Ct.), 25 N. Y. Supp. 375; 72 Hun (N. Y.) 171.

1. Michaelis v. Wolf, 136 Ill. 68.

2. In Smith v. Briggs, 3 Den. (N. Y.) 73, the architect certified that the house was finished in such a manner that he would accept it if he were the owner, and that he was satisfied as to the work and materials, and it was held insufficient as the contract called for a certificate that the work was "fully and completely finished according to the specification."

3. Where the defendant was to pay for a building upon receiving the architect's certificate that the work was done to his satisfaction, and the architect checked the builder's charges and sent them to the defendant, it was held that this did not amount to such a certificate of satisfaction as to enable the builder to sue the defendant, although the defendant had not objected to pay on the ground that no sufficient certificate had been rendered. Morgan v. Birnie, 9 Bing. 672; 23 E. C. L. 414. In this case Tindal, C. J., said: "It appears to me that the effect of a certificate would be altogether different, applying to the manner in which the work has been done, while the checking the accounts applies only to the propriety of the charges."

4. Where the contract requires the contractor, before each payment, to procure a certificate signed by the architect therein named "to the effect that the work is done in strict accordance with drawings and specifications, and that he considers the payment properly due," a mere order, signed by the architect and addressed to the owner, requesting him to pay a given sum to the contractor, will not bind the owner. Michaelis v. Wolf, 136 Ill. 68.

In Roy v. Boteler, 40 Mo. App. 213, the contract required the certificate to be under the hand of the architects, and to show that the whole job had been completed and accepted by the architects, their final estimate of the amount due on the contract, and that the work had been performed agreeably to the drawings and specifications under the direction and to the satisfaction of the architects; and a certificate showing the balance due the contractor, but nothing more, was held insufficient.

6. Hanley v. Walker, 79 Mich. 605; Lamprell v. Billericay Union, 3 Exch. 283; Russell v. Sa Da Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. 149; 106 E. C. L. 149; Goodyear v. Weymouth, 1 H. & R. 67. And see Roy v. Boteler, 40 Mo. App. 224.

But if there is no stipulation on the subject in the contract, a parol approval will be sufficient. Kirk v. Bromley advisable to provide for a written approval.¹ A conditional certificate will be sufficient where it is shown that the condition has been complied with.² The certificate must be given by the person named in the contract and not by his deputy or assistant,³ and if required to be signed by two or more, a certificate signed by one only is fatally defective.⁴

(7) Conclusiveness.—In the absence of fraud or palpable mistake, such a certificate properly given is conclusive alike upon the owner and the contractor,⁵ and entitles the latter to recover

Union, 2 Ph. 640. And where it appeared that the party subject to whose approval payment was to be made, knew of the contract and visited the building, where the work was going on, every day, it was held sufficient, in the absence of a denial of approval by the defendant, to show an approval by implication. Union Stove Works v. Arnoux, 7 Misc. Rep. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 700.

Where a building contract contained a clause for payment of the price of building by installments, with a proviso that, before each payment, the architect should certify that the works were carried out to his satisfaction, it was held that the certificate need not be in writing. Roberts v. Watkins, 14 C. B. N. S. 592; 108 E. C. L. 592; 32 L. J. C. P. 291; 9 Jur. N. S. 128; 8 L. T. N. S. 460; 11 W. R. 783.

3. In McNamara v. Harrison, 81 Iowa 486, the contract called for the certificate of the chief engineer and "his estimate of the quantity of work done," and it was held that the estimate and certificate of a subordinate engineer was insufficient.

The estimate of an assistant engineer is not conclusive upon the parties. Snell v. Brown, 71 Ill. 133.

A certificate which is not signed by the architect, but by his assistant for him, is not within a building contract which requires the contractor to do and finish the work under and to the satisfaction of the architect, and provides that payments shall be made on certificate of the architect that the work has been done to his satisfaction.

The owner cannot be allowed to urge defects in the work. Lull v. Korf, 84 Ill. 225.

A certificate is conclusive against the owner unless he can show fraud or collusion between the architect and contractor. Mercer v. Harris, 4 Neb. 77; School Dist. No. 27 v. Randolph, 5 Neb. 408. And the superintendent, after rejecting the work as deficient, cannot make any arrangement by which the work may be accepted and the deficiency made good to the company. Barcus v. Hannibal, etc., Plank Road Co., 26 Mo. 102.

Where the parties to a building contract agreed that the architect's certificate should be a prerequisite to payments, his certificate that the last payment was due was conclusive, in the absence of fraud or mistake, and its conclusiveness was not affected by a letter afterward written by the architect, in which he stated that the certificate was not intended to conclude any just rebate or offsets. Weeks v. Little, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. 1.

But where a building contract merely authorizes an architect to certify that the contract is performed to his satisfaction, his certificate that it is not so performed because of certain defects in the work has no binding effect upon the contracting parties. Mackinson v. Conlon, 55 N. J. L. 564.

In an action on a building contract, on which payments were to be made in accordance with the certificates of the architect, reserving fifteen per cent. from each certificate until the whole was completed to the superintendent's satisfaction, the superintendent's certificate of dissatisfaction is admissible, though he has exceeded his powers in charging one or more items therein. These the jury should be directed to disregard. Sanders v. Hutchinson, 26 Ill. App. 633.

A building contract providing that final payment shall be made within thirty days after completion, "provided that . . . the architect shall certify in writing that all the work . . . has been done to his satisfaction," constitutes the architect the agent of the owner, and his decision as to completion of the work is final. Snaith v. Smith (C. Pl.), 27 N. Y. Supp. 379; 7 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 37.

Where it is stipulated in a contract for the erection of a house that it shall be built according to the plans, and to the "satisfaction" of the architect, his certificate that he accepts the work as done in accordance with the plans and specifications is conclusive on the owners, and cannot be contradicted by them. Kennedy v. Poor, 151 Pa. St. 472.

Where the plaintiff agreed to construct a levee for the defendant, and to receive pay on the estimates of the engineer, who was made the sole judge as to the quality and quantity of the work performed, he cannot recover more than the estimates, in the absence of fraud or mistake by the engineer in making them. Edwards v. Louisa County (Iowa, 1893), 56 N. W. Rep. 656. But in order to bind a contractor to the certificate or decision of an architect or engineer appointed by the party for whom the work is done, there must be very conclusive language in the contract. Lawson v. Wallasey Local Board, 11 Q. B. Div. 229; 52 L. J. Q. B. 302; 47 L. T. 625; aff'd 52 L. J. Q. B. 309, note; 48 L. T. 507; 47 J. P. 437.

In an action on a building contract providing that the architect's certificates and decisions should be binding in all matters, an instruction that his certificate was conclusive on the defendant, in the absence of collusion with the plaintiff, is not erroneous, where the answer charges such collusion, and no instruction based on the theory of independent fraud or gross negligence on the part of the architect is requested. Johnson v. White (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 174. But see Davidson v. Provost, 35 Ill. App. 126, where it was held error in the trial court to refuse to admit evidence on the part of the owner going to show that the contractor had not followed the plans and specifications. Garnett, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in this case, said: "The effect of the certificate, however, is not as absolute as indicated by the rulings of the court on the hearing of the case.

. . . The court rejected the evidence, and defendant excepted to the ruling. The exception is well taken. If the evidence had been admitted it might have shown such gross dereliction of duty on the part of the architect as to raise a presumption of fraud or mistake in the issuing of the certificates." And see Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145; 10 Am. Rep. 449.

The plaintiff covenanted with the defendant, a railway company, to do certain works within a given time, to the satisfaction of the engineer of the company, and that if the works should not be so done, the company might enter into possession of the plaintiffs' plant, and complete the works. The company covenanted to pay for the works from time to time during their progress, according to the certificate of the engineer. All disputes were to be referred to the latter. The works were not completed within the period originally limited, and some time afterward the company gave notice of its without any other proof of actual performance,¹ but the evidence of the superintendent, in the absence of the certificate, is not conclusive.² Mere mistakes, incompetency, or negligence are not grounds for going behind the estimates,³ though errors made intention to enter, under the agreement, and complete the works. The plaintiffs filed a bill stating that they had done all that they had contracted to do, except what the company had prevented them from doing, and that they had not been fully paid for the work done; alleging that the engineer, fraudulently and collusively with the company, certified a less amount than what was due to the plaintiffs, and praying for an injunction and account. A demurrer for want of equity was overruled, on the ground that the plaintiffs would be entitled to some relief at the hearing, and that the species of fraud alleged in the bill gave jurisdiction to the court, although the plaintiffs had not completed the whole of their work. Waring v. Manchester, etc., R. Co., 7 Hare 482; 18 L. J. N. S. Ch. 450; 14 Jur. 613; affirmed 2 H. & Tw. 239.

A subcontract for railway grading provided for payment at different rates per yard for different classes of excavation, and that at the end of the work the engineer of the road should certify the quantity and character of the work done by the subcontractor, and that the latter should be paid according to such certificate. Soon after the work was commenced the engineer told the parties that he would classify the work to be done as "75 per cent. solid rock," to obviate any disputes as to measurement, with which arrangement the parties expressed themselves as satisfied. It did not appear that either party intended thereby to make or consent to any arrangement outside of, or inconsistent with, the contract, and it was held that the engineer's final certificate, made after the conclusion of the work, was binding on the parties, though he failed therein to adopt the promised classification. Dorwin v. Westbrook (Supreme Ct.), 24 N. Y. Supp. 955; 11 Hun (N. Y.) 405.

Certificate of Extra Work.—The final certificate of the engineer is binding upon contractors under a contract providing that the balance of the contract price is not payable until the final certificate by the engineer in charge is delivered, showing the amount of work done, materials furnished, cost of extras, and reduction for alterations, and precludes any allowance for extras not included therein. Reg. v. Cimon, 23 Can. Supreme Ct. 62; Sharpe v. San Paulo Brazilian R. Co., L. R., 8 Ch. 605, note; 27 L. T. N. S. 699.

Certificate Conclusive on One Party Only.—Where the contract makes the estimate conclusive upon one party only, the other is not precluded from showing the true amount of work done. O'Brien v. New York, 139 N. Y. 543.

Evidence of Fraud.—Though the engineer thought the contractor was entitled to an allowance for excavations outside the exterior line of the brickwork, and that he had the right to give the contractor credit therefor, on the final certificate, the fact that he did not do so does not show fraud in his certificate, where he allowed for all that the contract authorized. O'Brien v. New York, 139 N. Y. 543; 142 N. Y. 671.

1. Adams v. New York, 4 Duer (N. Y.) 295; Wyckoff v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 143; Tetz v. Butterfield, 54 Wis. 242; 41 Am. Rep. 29; Hot Springs R. Co. v. Maher, 48 Ark. 522.

Certificate as Evidence.—The certificate is always admissible to prove the acceptance of the work. Hamilton County v. Newlin, 132 Ind. 27. But the certificate is admissible only in so far as it is connected with the matters referred to the superintendent, and no further. Mills v. Weeks, 21 Ill. 561.

2. But although the contract makes the certificate of the architect conclusive, his testimony, in the absence of such certificate, will not be conclusive but will be received on the same terms with any other witness of equal knowledge and opportunity. Boteler v. Roy, 40 Mo. App. 234; Fitzgerald v. Beers, 31 Mo. App. 356.

3. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Price, 138 U. S. 185. In this case a contract to grade a railroad provided that the work was to be done under the supervision of the chief engineer and his assistant, whose estimate of quantities was to be "final and conclusive upon the parties," and that the contractor should receive monthly payments on the certificate of the engineer "for work done," and in the "progress certificates" may be corrected and adjusted in the final certificate.¹ The superintendent, however, should not be interested in keeping down the cost of the work.²

(8) As Distinguished from Award.—Provision making payment for the work subject to a certificate of approval or estimate of the architect, engineer, or superintendent, is not a submission to arbitration,³ and the authority to certify cannot be revoked by one of the parties before the decision is rendered,⁴ but in so far as the contract refers all matters in dispute to the decision of the superintendent, it is a submission to arbitration.⁵

It was held that the railroad company could not, after accepting the work and the last monthly estimate of the engineer, have the work reestimated by another subordinate engineer, the previous monthly estimates, and the acceptance of the entire work with the last monthly one, being conclusive, in the absence of proof of fraud or bad faith on the part of the engineers making them, and mere mistakes, incompetency, or negligence not being grounds for going behind them.

1. Where payments made to a contractor, in accordance with the opinion of the engineer that he was entitled to compensation for excavating outside of the exterior line of the brickwork, were made on a mistaken basis, it was held that the mistake could be corrected on the measurement for the final certificate. O'Brien v. New York, 139 N. Y. 543; 142 N. Y. 671. And see supra, this title, Progress Certificates.

2. Where a builder by his contract bound himself to abide by the decision and certificates of an architect as to the amounts to be paid for his work, not knowing that the architect had given an assurance to the employer that the cost of the building should not exceed a specified amount, although he refused to guaranty that amount, the court did not consider that the decision of the architect made under such a bias was binding, but gave directions so as to ascertain under the authority of the court how much remained justly due to the builder. Kemp v. Rose, 1 Giff. 258.

And a clause conferring power and authority on an engineer over a contractor will not be considered fraudulent or void because the engineer is a shareholder in the company on whose behalf the contract is entered into. Ranger v. Great Western R. Co., 3 Rallw. Cas. 298.

But the engineer of a railway company is not disqualified from certifying the payments due a contractor on account of his having become the lessee of the railway, at a rent depending on the amount so certified for. Hill v. South Staffordshire R. Co., 11 Jur. N. S. 192; 12 L. T. N. S. 63—L. J.

3. Wadsworth v. Smith, L. R., 6 Q. B. 332. Blackburn, J., in this case, said: "Where, by an agreement, the right of one of the parties to have or do a particular thing is made to depend on the determination of a third person, that is not a submission to arbitration, nor is the determination an award; but where there is an agreement that any dispute about a particular thing shall be inquired of and determined by a person named, that may amount to a submission to arbitration, and the determination, though in the form of a certificate, be an award."

But the duties of the superintendent in such case are very analogous to the duties of an arbitrator, and he cannot be held liable for errors in his estimates or for refusing to reconsider them. Stevenson v. Watson, 4 C. P. Div. 148; 48 L. J. C. P. Div. 318.

4. Northampton Gaslight Co. v. Parnell, 15 C. B. 630; 80 E. C. L. 630; 24 L. J. C. P. 60; Mills v. Bayley, 2 H. & C. 36.

5. Mills v. Bayley, 2 H. & C. 36. In this case an agreement was entered into in writing by which the plaintiff was to take the emptying of the defendant's mill pool, upon the terms that the defendant should pay the plaintiff five pence for every cubic yard of mud taken out of the pool; the admeasurement of the mud removed to be settled by N., and if any dispute arose, it was to be referred to N. to be by him decided. It was held that the agreement to refer consisted of two distinct parts, the admeasurement of the mud and the settlement of disputes, and that the

8. Deviations and Alterations.—The parties may agree by parol to deviate from the original contract.¹ Slight deviations, as has been seen, will not bar a recovery by the contractor; a substantial performance is all the law requires.² Where the deviations and alterations are made by agreement of the parties, the employer is liable for any increased cost resulting, the provisions of latter part was a submission to arbitration and revokable, although the former was not. And see Wadsworth v. Smith, L. R., 6 Q. B. 332, opinion of Blackburn, J.

1. Greene v. Paul, 155 Pa. St. 126; West Haven Water Co. v. Redfield, 58 Conn. 39; Onderdonk v. Gray, 19 N. J. Eq. 65.

Parties to a building contract may by their acts waive a provision that subsequent alterations in the building shall be specified in writing; and, in an action by the builder to recover for such alterations, the referee erred in excluding evidence of a verbal request by the owner for additions to the building, and verbal promises to pay therefor. Porter v. Swan (Brooklyn City Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 351.

But the contractor is not liable for defects resulting from deviations made with the assent of the employer. Clark v. Pope, 70 Ill. 128.

If deviations are ordered by the superintendent, the contractor must show an authority in him to order them. Rex v. Peto, 1 Y. & J. 37; Cooper v. Langdon, 9 M. & W. 60; 1 D. N. S. 392.

A clause in building specifications, that "it is understood that the owner of this building, and the architect, shall have the right and power to make any alterations, additions, or omissions of work or materials herein specified, or shown on the drawings, that they may find necessary, during the progress of the building," authorized the construction of an additional stairway from the kitchen to a bedroom, as well as the use of bronze hardware in the place of No. 1 hardware as specified, and a change in the location of the cistern. Dorsey v. McGee, 30 Neb. 657.

But a clause in a contract for a public work, which reserves to the employer the right to make alterations in the form and dimensions of the work, does not authorize him to stop the work in an unfinished state, and thus annul the agreement. Clark v. New York, 4 N. Y. 338.

Where Writing Necessary.—Where a contract for the construction of a railroad provides that measurements, classification, and estimates shall be made in determining the price to be paid, but that no alteration of the contract will be allowed unless in writing, signed by the parties, a promise of the arbitrator, during the progress of the work, to classify a certain part as solid rock, rather than loose rock, does not modify the contract. O'Donnell v. Forrest, 44 La. Ann. 845.

Right to Order—Reasonable Time.—On October 9, 1849, the plaintiff agreed, in writing, to do the mason work and furnish the materials for a building for the defendant, which was to be completed, except a portion of the plastering, before the 20th of November, which time was subsequently extended ten days. The building was to be three stories in height, the defendant reserving the right to put on a fourth story by paying a specified sum for the brick laid in the walls. It was held that the defendant's right of election in regard to the fourth story must be exercised while a reasonable time remained for adding another story and finishing the work, with the addition, by the time specified in the contract, or as extended; and that unless exercised within that time it was lost. Lauer v. Brown, 30 Barb. (N. Y.) 416.

Right to Order—Limitation of Right.—A provision in a contract that "should the owner at any time during the progress of said building request any alteration, deviations, additions or omissions from this contract, he shall be at liberty to do so, and the same shall in no way affect or make void the contract, but it will be added to or deducted from the amount of the contract, as the case may be, by a fair and reasonable valuation," was construed to mean that the "omissions" were to be limited to things which, upon the conditions specified, might be entirely left out of the building, and extended to nothing which the owner might elect to take off the contractor's hands and finish himself. Shaver v. Murdock, 36 Cal. 293.

2. See supra, this title, Substantial Performance.

the special contract governing as far as applicable;¹ and it is sometimes provided that where the deviations lessen the cost of the work, the contractor's charges shall be decreased proportionately.² If the original contract has been deviated from to such an extent as to be hardly recognizable, it may be treated as abandoned, and the contractor recover the reasonable value of his work.³

1. Goldsmith v. Hand, 26 Ohio St. 101; McKinney v. Springer, 3 Ind. 59; 54 Am. Dec. 470; De Boom v. Priestly, 1 Cal. 206; Andre v. Bodman, 13 Md. 241; 71 Am. Dec. 628.

The mode of payment will be the same as in the original contract. Boody v. Rutland, etc., R. Co., 24 Vt. 660.

Where work is done under a special contract and for estimated prices, and there is a deviation from the original plan by the consent of the parties, the estimate is not excluded, but is the rule of payment so far as the special contract can be traced; and for any excess beyond it, the party is entitled to his quantum meruit. Robson v. Godfrey, Holt. 236; 1 Stark. 275; 2 E. C. L. 110.

Where the superintendent's certificate is required to settle the price of the alterations, it is a condition precedent to a right of recovery. Morgan v. Birnie, 3 M. & S. 76; 9 Bing. 672; 23 E. C. L. 414. And see supra, this title, Certificates of Approval.

In Goodwin v. McCormick (Brooklyn City Ct.), 6 N. Y. Supp. 662, the plaintiff contracted with the defendant to build certain houses, according to prescribed plans and specifications. During the construction a number of deviations were made from the original plan, with the consent of both parties, but all conditions in the original contract as to times and amounts of payments, as the work progressed, were strictly complied with, and the money received and receipted for by the contractor without objection, no new express contract being entered into. It was held that the deviation from the original contract did not justify the contractor in setting up a claim of quantum meruit, except as to extra work done, and extra materials furnished.

A contract for the construction of three curves on the defendant's cable railroad was awarded to the plaintiff at a specified price per lineal foot. These curves were to be solid curves, composed of heavy boxes, bolted end to end. Subsequently, the defendant changed its plans so as to lengthen the three curves into one; and, instead of placing the boxes end to end, they were placed four and one-half feet apart, with filling pieces between. In assumpsit for the price of the work, it was held proper to instruct that the plaintiff was not confined to the actual value of the filling pieces, but was entitled to the contract price therefor, if there was an agreement, express or implied, when the change in the contract was made, that the filling pieces should be regarded as part of the curved work, to be paid for at the contract price. Marshall Foundry, etc., Co. v. Pittsburgh Traction Co., 138 Pa. St. 266.

3. Pepper v. Burland, Peake 103; Austin v. Keating, 3 W. R. 288; Ford v. Smith, 25 Ga. 675.

When parties subsequently vary their written contract for the building of a house, so as to require more work and materials, and an alteration in the structure, and a longer time for its completion, the workman is not obliged to sue on the original contract, but may recover on a quantum meruit; and the written contract is admissible in evidence to show what the parties had agreed on as reasonable for that portion of work embraced in it. Hutchinson v. Cullum, 23 Ala. 622. But the contract should still be used to determine the value of the work so far as it can be followed. Norton v. Browne, 89 Ind. 333.

Where a written contract for increasing the height of a railroad tunnel contemplates the taking of rock from the bottom, the question is for the jury whether a subsequent parol modification by which the contractors were to remove the rock from the roof, and by which the matter for excavating for approaches was also changed, was such a material alteration of the written contract as to reduce it entirely to

9. Nuisances.—All building operations, and the performance of working contracts generally, must be carried on without creating a nuisance.¹ Thus, if one blockades a street with building materials, rendering passage dangerous and inconvenient,² or obstructs the free and convenient access to neighboring property,³ or leaves excavations unguarded,⁴ or fails to put up proper signals,⁵ he creates a nuisance which may be abated, and he is liable in damages to the party injured;⁶ also, if he erects a building extending over an adjoining lot,⁷ or over the street,⁸ or so that water drips from the roof upon the adjoining lot to the injury of the owner,⁹ parol, and a finding in favor of the contractors will not be disturbed where their evidence shows that the cost of the work was greatly increased by the change. Malone v. Philadelphia, etc., Co., 157 Pa. St. 430.

But the abrogation of a building contract is not to be inferred from deviations from the original plan, permitted by the contract to be made. Bozarth v. Dudley, 44 N. J. L. 304; 43 Am. Rep. 373. And the omission, by consent of the parties thereto, of some of the items in a building contract, does not amount to an abandonment of the entire contract, the residue of which will remain in full force. Menne v. Neumeister, 25 Mo. App. 300.

1. See NUISANCES, vol. 16, p. 922. A fence or screen maliciously erected for the purpose of shutting out the light and air from a neighbor's windows has been held a nuisance; but the court was evenly divided, and hence the decision of the court below was affirmed. Burke v. Smith, 69 Mich. 380. And see EASEMENTS, vol. 6, p. 152.

An unsightly structure is not a nuisance, though it may be used in such a manner as to become one. Parties have a right to maintain such buildings on their own premises as they may deem necessary for their comfort and convenience. Trulock v. Merte, 72 Iowa 510.

2. See STREETS, vol. 24, p. 108 et seq.; HIGHWAY, vol. 9, p. 412 et seq. Objects in the highway, naturally calculated to frighten horses, may constitute a nuisance. Foshay v. Glen Haven, 25 Wis. 288; 3 Am. Rep. 73; Cook v. Charlestown, 98 Mass. 80.

3. Knox v. New York, 55 Barb. (N. Y.) 404.

The right of a landowner to use a public highway for the purpose of bringing building materials on his land, must be exercised reasonably, and where the right of an adjoining owner to the free access to his house is interfered with by an unreasonable use of the highway, he is entitled to damages, on the ground that he has suffered a particular injury from a public nuisance. Fritz v. Hobson, 14 Ch. Div. 542.

4. Portland v. Richardson, 54 Me. 46; 89 Am. Dec. 720. If one excavates an area in front of his house and suffers it to remain uncovered and unguarded, he is guilty of creating a nuisance, and is liable in damages to any one falling therein. Robbins v. Chicago, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 657.

5. This applies as well to a city making repairs upon its streets, as to an individual. Kimball v. Bath, 38 Me. 219.

6. Barclay v. Com., 25 Pa. St. 503; 64 Am. Dec. 715; HIGHWAY, vol. 9, p. 413.

The remedy by action for damages is not barred by the act of abating the nuisance. Pierce v. Dart, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 609.

7. Meyer v. Metzler, 51 Cal. 142.

8. The cornice of a building which projects over a sidewalk, and which is being constructed in such a manner as to be dangerous to persons using the sidewalk, is a nuisance. Grove v. Ft. Wayne, 45 Ind. 429; 15 Am. Rep. 262.

9. Bellows v. Sackett, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 96; Jackson v. Peaked, 1 M. & S. 234. Where two buildings are so situated that the water from the roof of one can only be prevented from flowing against and injuring the other by an eaves trough attached to both, though the consent and co-operation of the owner of the building receiving the injury may be necessary, yet the duty of affirmative action is on the owner of the other building, and he may not stand by and see the water from his roof destroy his neighbor's wall, and rely for or so that snow and ice collecting upon the roof will naturally and probably fall upon the adjoining highway.¹ A building extending into the street and obstructing the view of the neighboring house is a nuisance,² and if one fails to provide safeguards to prevent bricks falling upon the passers-by, he is liable for any injuries resulting therefrom.³

Where a city has been compelled to pay damages for injuries resulting from nuisances in highways created by individuals, it may recover the amount of such judgment from the one responsible for the nuisance.⁴

Where the nuisance is purely collateral to the work contracted to be done, and is entirely the result of the wrongful acts of the contractor or his workmen, the employer is not liable; but where the nuisance results directly from the acts which the contractor agrees and is authorized to do, the employer is equally liable to the party injured.⁵

10. Liability for Negligence—a. LIABILITY OF EMPLOYER.—The employer is not liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of workmen if the work is undertaken by an independent contractor, employing his own labor and having entire control of the work,⁶ unless the work is necessarily his protection upon the passiveness of his neighbor. Underwood v. Waldron, 33 Mich. 232.

Dec. 334, Walker, J., said: "The true rule in cases of this character is, if the nuisance necessarily occurs, in the ordinary mode of doing the work, the occupant or owner is liable, but if it is from the negligence of the contractor, or his servants, that he should alone be responsible."

In an action against a lot owner for damages caused by blasting done on his lot under a contract, it is error to leave the jury to determine whether the defendant had, under the contract, any control over the work as to the manner of its execution, since the interpretation even of oral contracts is for the court. Brannock v. Elmore, 114 Mo. 55.

Contractors with a railroad company were to build a bridge, and upon completion to remove all piles, timber, etc., used in the construction. After the piles were driven, the company dismissed the contractors from further performance, and they thereupon cut off the piles just below the surface so that a vessel ran on them and was injured. It was held that upon such dismissal, before completion, it became the duty of the railroad company, and not of the contractors, to remove the obstructions, and therefore they were liable. *Philadelphia, etc., R. Where C. had contracted with a town to widen a highway by removing the rocks from a ledge therein, for a certain sum of money and the stone, and afterward contracted with A. to build a dam for him with the stone, for which he was to receive a certain price per day while at work upon the dam and in blasting the rocks, A. furnishing the powder for the blasting, and superintending the building of the dam, but having no control of the blasting; and in blasting, a rock was thrown upon the building of S., causing injury for which C. was subjected in damages, it was held that the relation of master and servant did not exist between A. and C., and that A. was not liable to indemnify C. for the damages which he had been compelled to pay. *Corbin v. from defective plans and specifications, the employer is liable.¹

b. LIABILITY OF CONTRACTOR.—The contractor is liable for injuries to persons or property resulting from the negligence of himself, or of his servants² acting within the scope of their employment.³ He is bound to use reasonable care in the selection third to put up the superstructure—the owner was held liable to a person injured by falling into the hole through its being insufficiently guarded.

Where a contract requires a contractor to pursue a course which is not always proper, and in this case resulting in injury, as where it required the "sheath piling" to be removed upon the completion of a sewer, it was held that the contractor, having followed the requirements of the contract and advised a different course, was not responsible, but that the principle of respondet superior applied. *Lockwood v. A contractor erecting a wall is liable to a passer-by injured by a falling brick, where he fails to provide safeguards or barriers. Jager v. Adams, 123 Mass. 26; 25 Am. Rep. 7. The law implies that it is the duty of a contractor to so construct his platforms, the same being over a thoroughfare, as to prevent injury through falling objects to persons passing thereunder, and it would seem that the reason for such an implication would be as strong in cases of interior construction, in case of notice that others would be employed under such platforms, in another department of the same work. Angus v. Lee, 40 Ill. App. 304. And see Tomle v. Hampton, 129 Ill. 379; Pye v. Faxon, 156 Mass. 471.

But under ordinary circumstances, when a lawful act is performed in a careful, skillful and proper manner, the party performing it is not liable for mere incidental consequences injuriously resulting from it to another's property. People v. Albany, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 524.

A contractor, for the erection of a building, put on the roof without making any provision for carrying off the water that would necessarily fall on it in the event of a rainstorm. A rainstorm, such as was usual at that time of the year, took place, and the rain falling from the roof, uniting with that coming from the street, flooded the adjoining premises and injured a stock of goods there. The contractor was held liable for the damage to the goods. Slater v. Mersereau, 5 Daly (N. Y.) 445.

Negligence of Subcontractor.—In Bast v. Leonard, 15 Minn. 304, the defendant, who had entered into a contract to erect a building, the materials to be of the best quality, and the work to be done in a workmanlike manner, sublet the excavation and the brick and stone work, together with the furnishing of the materials therefor. When the walls were nearly completed, they fell, thereby injuring the adjoining premises of the plaintiff. In a suit against the principal contractor for damages, it was held that the defendant's duty was to see that the materials used by the subcontractor were of the best quality, and that the work was done in a workmanlike manner; that if the materials furnished, or the work done, by the subcontractor, were of such a character that the walls were unsafe and unfit for the purposes for which they were intended, and the defendant knew such fact, or might have known it in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, and went on and made use of the walls, and incorporated his own work with them, and made payments to the subcontractor, and accepted the work as it proceeded, and in consequence of the unsafe and imperfect character of the materials so furnished, and the work so done, by the subcontractor, the building fell upon and injured the premises and property of the plaintiffs, the defendant was chargeable with negligence for the damage resulting.

3. See MASTER AND SERVANT, vol. 14, pp. 807 et seq., 815, 859. The contractor cannot be held liable for the negligent acts of his servant, unless of his workmen and to provide them with suitable materials, and is liable for any injury to his servants resulting from his failure in this respect.¹ But the workman voluntarily assumes the ordinary risks incidental to his employment,² nor can he hold the contractor liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of his fellow servants,³ nor where his own negligence has contributed to the injury.⁴

11. Property in Materials.—Unless the contractor acts as the agent of the owner in purchasing the materials,⁵ the property in them does not pass to the latter until they have been definitely and finally appropriated to his use. This, where the work is performed upon realty, such as the erection of a building upon the land of another, is when the materials have been finally affixed to the freehold and worked into the structure.⁶ Where done within the scope of his employment. Howe v. Newmarch, 12 Allen (Mass.) 49.

1. The contractor is liable for an injury to a workman resulting from a defective scaffolding. Connolly v. Poillon, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 366. But after providing materials ample in quantity and quality for the construction of a scaffolding, the contractor is not liable for an error in judgment on the part of the foreman in selecting a defective piece. Ross v. Walker, 139 Pa. St. 42; 23 Am. St. Rep. 160. And where the scaffolding has been erected by the owner for the convenience of the contractor, the former is liable for an injury to a workman resulting from a defect therein. Coughtry v. Globe Woolen Co., 56 N. Y. 124; 15 Am. Rep. 387.

5. Johnson v. Hunt, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 137.

Where the materials are furnished on the credit of the building, the contractor may be considered the owner's agent in purchasing them, and hence they are the property of the owner, and cannot be levied on and sold under execution as the property of the contractor. White v. Miller, 18 Pa. St. 52.

6. The fact that the materials are intended for the owner's house does not change the property. When purchased by the contractor they become his own, and he may sell them again and procure other materials for the intended building. Johnson v. Hunt, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 135. In this case a contractor, after putting up and inclosing a house, worked up in the house plank preparatory to erecting columns for a piazza, and removed the same, as a mere matter of convenience, to an adjoining house, where they were levied on as the property of the builder. It was held that although the employer had made advances on the work as it progressed, the materials were personal property, and did not pass to him until delivery, or until affixed to the freehold.

A mere tentative affixture is not sufficient. In Manchester Mills v. Rundlett, 23 N. H. 271, it was held that where a contractor had procured blinds and fitted them to the windows of a house, and then taken them off to paint them in accordance with his contract, the blinds, while in his hands for the purpose of being painted and finished, were his property and liable to be taken for his debts. Perley, J., in this case, said: "The contract required Brandon (the contractor) to paint the blinds, and they were in his hands unfinished; the plaintiffs had no possession nor any right of possession; the fitting of the blinds to the windows did not complete the work to be done on them; it was not a surrender of the possession and control of them to the plaintiff; it did not annex them to the house and make them a part of it. The fitting of the blinds was done by way of trial in the progress of the manufacture of the blinds, and cannot be regarded as having any more effect to transfer the possession and property the work is performed upon a chattel which remains in the custody and under the control of the contractor, the act of working in the materials cannot be considered the best test of a final appropriation, and no property passes until the completion and delivery of the article.¹

It is sometimes provided in the contract that all building and other materials shall become the property of the landowner when brought upon the land,² or upon some default of the

to the plaintiffs than a measurement which would have answered the same purpose."

In Tripp v. Armitage, 4 M. & W. 687, where sash frames were sent to the building for the approval of the owner, and then returned to the shop and fitted with pulleys belonging to the owner, it was held that the final affixture had not taken place, and that, notwithstanding the approval by the owner and act of appropriation, they were still the property of the contractor.

By an agreement made between the plaintiff company and the defendant, a contractor, for the construction of a railway, it was provided that, once a month, the company's engineer should certify the amount payable to the contractor in respect of the value of the materials delivered, and that such certificates should be paid by the company seven days after presentation. It was held that the property in the materials delivered, upon their being certified for by the engineer, passed to the company, though the materials were not fixed. Banbury, etc., Direct R. Co. v. Daniel, 54 L. J. Ch. Div. 265; 33 W. R. 321, Pearson, J.

The circumstances of each case must be determined. Allis v. Voigt, 90 Mich. 125. And where a mill was built upon the land of another under an express contract, by which it was to be the sole property of the builder until a judgment which was a lien upon the land should be paid by the owner, it was held that the builder had a right to remove the mill after a sale of the land, on an execution issued upon such judgment. Yater v. Mullen, 24 Ind. 277.

The general rule is that, under a contract for the building of a vessel or other thing, no property passes to the one for whom it is built until it is finished and delivered, and the rule is the same where specified portions of the contract price are agreed to be, and are, paid to the builder at specified stages of the work. Andrews v. Durant, 11 N. Y. 35; 62 Am. Dec. 55; Briggs v. A Light Boat, 7 Allen (Mass.) 387; Clarkson v. Stevens, 106 U. S. 505.

Where a contract for building a ship for M. provided that "all payments made by" M. "shall be considered as constituting ownership so far as advanced," it was held that this referred to payments in advance of delivery, and did not relate to the vessel, nor transfer the ownership so far as the structure was completed. Assigned Estate of the Reany Engineers, etc., Works, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 620.

But in England, the payment of installments dependent upon the progress of the vessel is held to be an indication of an intention to vest the property as it is building. Wood v. Bell, 5 El. & Bl. 772; 85 E. C. L. 772; Seath v. Moore, L. R., 11 App. Cas. 350. And see M'Eldery v. Flannagan, 1 Har. & G. (Md.) 308.

No property passes in the loose materials intended to be used in the manufacture of the chattel. Seath v. Moore, L. R., 11 App. Cas. 350; Wood v. Bell, 6 El. & Bl. 355; Baker v. Gray, 17 C. B. 462; 84 E. C. L. 462; 25 L. J. C. P. 161; 2 Jur. N. S. 400.

2. Reeves v. Barlow, 12 Q. B. Div. 436. And in such case materials brought upon the land vest in the owner of the freehold, and are not liable for the debts of the builder. Blake v. Izard, 16 W. R. 108.

By a building contract between A, the landowner, and B, the builder, A was to grant leases on the erection of the buildings and to assist the building operations by making advances to B, according to the progress of the buildings. The seventh clause of the contract stated that all materials contractor,¹ but this does not make them so absolutely the property of the owner as to be subject to seizure under an execution and other things brought on the premises by B for the purpose of erecting the buildings were to be considered as immediately attached to, and belonging to, the premises, and were not to be removed therefrom without the consent of A. The eighth clause empowered A to enter upon and take possession of the land, with all buildings and other materials standing thereon, in case B should fail to proceed with the completion of the buildings. It was held that the eighth clause did not qualify the seventh clause, the effect of which was to give A such an equitable interest in the materials for the buildings brought afterward on the land by B that they could not be taken in execution by a judgment creditor of B. Brown v. Bateman, L. R., 2 C. P. 272; 36 L. J. C. P. 134; 15 L. T. N. S. 658; 15 W. R. 359.

Contractor's Plant.—A contract for executing sewage works, made between a contractor and improvement commissioners, provided that the plant brought by the contractor on to the works should be deemed to be the property of the commissioners, and should not be removed during the progress of the work without the written order of their engineer; and in case of suspension of the works by the engineer for any default of the contractor, or of the work being taken out of the contractor's hands, the same should be subject to be used as should be ordered by the engineer in and about the completion of the works. The engineer suspended the works, and the commissioners took possession of the plant and completed the works. The contractor having become bankrupt, and a sum of £2,876 7s. 5d. having been certified to be due to the commissioners from him for default under the contract, the commissioners claimed to retain the plant, which was sold by consent for £685, but it was held that the contract gave the commissioners no property in the plant, only a right of user. In re Winter, 8 Ch. Div. 225; 47 L. J. Bank. 52; 38 L. T. 362; 26 W. R. 512.

A contract for the construction of a railway provided that if the contractor should make default the company might enter and complete the works, and make use of the contractor's wagons, machinery and plant, and also have a lien on the same, with power of sale to reimburse themselves any loss or damage they might sustain by reason of such default. The contractor having become embarrassed, the company made a second contract with him, which provided they should take to and complete the works, and for that purpose should be allowed ten thousand pounds, and the use of all the contractor's plant, etc., which, on the completion of the works, should be restored to the contractor in whatever state it might then be. This second contract provided that, if it should then be found that anything was due to or from the company from or to the contractor, the amount should be paid by the one to the other within three months after the engineer should have certified the amount that should be due. It also provided that, in all other respects, the original contract should stand, except so far as it was altered by, or should be inconsistent with, the second contract. The contractor had made no default down to the date of the second contract. The company completed the works, and the engineer certified that a large sum was due to them from the contractor. The company thereupon refused to deliver up the plant to the contractor, and claimed power to sell the plant, and to reimburse themselves out of the proceeds; but it was held that they were not so entitled, for the provisions of the second contract were in substitution of the corresponding provisions in the first contract; the two instruments were not to be read as one, nor were the clauses of the first, conferring the lien and power of sale, to be taken as incorporated into the second contract. Hunt v. South Eastern R. Co., 45 L. J. C. P. Div. 87.

1. A builder contracted with a building club to erect houses for them on their own land. The contract contained a stipulation that, if the contractor should neglect or refuse to proceed with the work in a proper manner, to the satisfaction of the architect of the club, or become bankrupt, or insolvent, or otherwise rendered incapable of completing the contract, the architect should have power, after giving two days' notice in writing to the contractor, to appoint other persons to complete the work, and to provide the requisite materials, and also to seize and retain all materials, plant, and implements, provided that the contractor should have drawn money on account of his contract. The contractor commenced the works and carried them on for some time, receiving a considerable sum from the club. On the second of May he filed a liquidation petition. On the second of June the architect of the club gave notice to the contractor that, as he had neglected to proceed with the works, they, on the expiration of two days, should employ other means of completing the works, and that he must not remove any materials, implements, or plant from the works, and on the expiration of this notice the club took possession of the materials, implements and plant. It was held that the club was entitled, as against the trustee in the liquidation, to retain what they had seized, the seizure being a protected transaction within the Bankruptcy Act (1869), § 94. In re Waugh, 4 Ch. Div. 524; 46 L. J. Bank. 26; 35 L. T. 769; 25 W. R. 258.

Under a clause in a building agreement, under which rent had not been paid (and not amounting to a demise), that in case of default in not completing the buildings, at successive periods, the owner should be at liberty to re-enter and seize the materials there, and successive defaults having been made and several periods of indulgence granted, but there being no waiver of the last default, and no alteration of the builder's position to his prejudice, and no default on the part of the owner, it was held that the owner was entitled to re-enter and seize the materials. Stevens v. Taylor, 2 F. & F. 419.

An agreement between a railway company and a contractor provided that, in case the contractor should be guilty of any delay or default in the fulfilment of the contract, the company might take the execution of the works out of his hand, and might use all or any of his plant, materials, or implements, and that, in addition to all rights and remedies which the company might have against the contractor, the company might apply any moneys to which the contractor would otherwise be entitled under his contract, toward satisfaction of all losses or expenses occasioned to the company by the delay; and that all the materials, plant, and implements which at the time of such delay or default should be in or about the site of the works, should thereupon become the absolute property of the company, and be valued or sold, and the amount of such valuation or sale credited to the contractor in reduction of the moneys (if any) recoverable from him by the company. The company took the execution of the works out of the contractor's hand under this clause. The contractor brought an action for breach of contract, which, with all matters in difference between the parties, was referred to arbitration. It was held that the plant and materials did not become the absolute property of the company, unless loss or expense had been occasioned to it; and an interlocutory injunction was awarded to restrain them from moving and selling the plant and materials pending the arbitration. Garrett v. Salisbury, etc., R. Co., L. R., 2 Eq. 358; 14 W. R. 816.

1. A contractor supplied materials to a railway company for the purpose of carrying out his contract. By the terms of the contract it was provided that the materials brought upon the railway should become immediately the absolute property of the company, except that they were to remain under the dominion of the contractor; that, if he should duly complete his contract, the company would give to the contractor, as part of his payment, the unconsumed materials; and that if, instead of the contractor, the company should use the materials, the company should compensate him in respect of them. It was held that the materials were not, by the terms of the contract, so absolutely the property of the company as to be seizable by the sheriff under an execution upon a judgment against the company. Beeston v. Marriott, 4 Giff. 436; 9 Jur. N. S. 960; 8 L. T. N. S. 690; 11 W. R. 856.

"But the operation of lien laws has made such clauses of little avail for their prime object—the protection of the landowner against the claims of mechanics and material men—and they are of little importance at present to American jurisprudence.” Lloyd’s Law of Building (2d ed.), § 73.

A agreed to build a ship for B within a certain period, B paying installments of the price from time to time; and it was provided that if A should fail to complete the ship as stipulated, it should be lawful for B to enter upon and take possession of the ship (which from the payment of the first installment was to be the property of B) and to cause the works to be completed by any persons whom he should employ, using such of the materials of A as should be applicable to the purpose. A failed to complete the ship, and B took possession of it. A committed an act of bankruptcy, and B proceeded to finish the ship, using applicable materials which were in the yard at the time of the act of bankruptcy, but were not then incorporated with the ship, nor had been specifically appropriated by A for the ship. Some of the materials had been selected by B before the bankruptcy, and some were piled within the ship, and the rest in a shed adjoining, but none had been actually used before the bankruptcy. It was held that B was not entitled to the materials under the agreement, as they had never been used, and therefore that the property in them passed to the assignees of A. Baker v. Gray, 17 C. B. 462; 84 E. C. L. 462; 25 L. J. C. P. 161; 2 Jur. N. S. 400.

A contract by a trader to do certain works contained a clause that if he should become bankrupt, or delay proceedings with the works, his employer should have power, after seven days’ notice to him to proceed, to employ others to do the work, that the advances made to the trader before his default should be taken as full payment, and that all tools and materials used upon the works should become the property of the employer. The trader, having delayed to proceed with the works, was served, on the eleventh of April, by his employer, with notice to proceed. On the seventeenth of April, the trader committed an act of bankruptcy; on the nineteenth of April, the notice to proceed not having been complied with, his employer took possession of the tools and materials. In June a fiat was issued against the trader. In trover by his assignees in bankruptcy against the employer for tools and materials left upon the works by the bankrupt, it was held that they did not become the property of his employer at the expiration of the seven days’ notice, because they had vested in his assignees by relation on the seventeenth of April, before the notice had expired. Rouch v. Great Western R. Co., 2 Railw. Cas. 505; 5 Jur. 826.

A railway company entered into a contract (dated December 27, 1836) with certain builders for building a bridge, all necessary implements and materials to be found by the builders, with power to the company, if, in the opinion of its architect, the contractors should not proceed with sufficient expedition, to employ other or additional workmen to complete the works, on giving them seven days’ notice, and in such case to use the cranes, machines, implements, and materials used on or about the works by the contractors, who were to defray the extra expenses incurred. The contract provided that the company should have a lien upon such machines, implements, and materials as should, for the time being, be in and upon the land, as a security for a completion of the bridge. On the twenty-sixth of July, 1837, the contractors committed an act of bankruptcy, and a fiat was issued on the thirty-first. Divers goods, timbers, etc., for building the bridge had been previously deposited by them on it and the land adjoining. These consisted of four kinds: First. Those actually on the land of the railway. Second. Those upon land adjoining the line (not the property of the company, but inclosed and taken possession of by them under the act). Third. Those deposited upon the lands of a temporary railway made by the bankrupts, over land not belonging to the company, for the convenience of conveying materials. Fourth. A crane erected by the contractors at the end of the temporary railway. On the thirty-first of July the company took possession of all these goods. On the first of August it gave the seven days’ notice that other workmen would be employed, and on the second they took upon themselves the completion of the bridge, using some of the goods, and retaining the remainder. In trover brought by the assignees of these goods, it was held that the company had a lien upon the first and second classes, but not upon the third and fourth, which, nevertheless, at the

Where the contract is silent as to old structures standing upon the land, and makes no reference to the materials in them, it has been held that they become the property of the contractor upon taking possession and removing them.¹

12. Erections in Violation of Law.—A contractor who knowingly erects a building in violation of law, as, for instance, in violation of building regulations, may not recover therefore.² There is some conflict of authority upon the question whether there can be a recovery when the contractor builds a house knowing that it is to be used for illegal or immoral purposes.³

13. Penalties and Liquidated Damages.—As a general rule, where the actual damage can be ascertained from the contract itself, the courts are inclined to disregard its language in so far as it fixes the damage, and particularly in cases where a strict construction of the language used would result in oppression to the party against whom the claim is asserted;⁴ but if the actual expiration of the notice, it had a right to retain and use about the work, for the agreement was lawful, not being made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and that these rights of the company were not invalidated by the possession of the bankrupt, under 6 Geo. IV., ch. 16, § 72, he being the true owner; nor by other implements and materials so used having been removed without any objection from the company's authority, the lien being a shifting one, and attaching to such articles as were brought from time to time, and ceasing to such only as were removed; nor by the implements and materials not being scheduled. Hawthorn v. Newcastle-upon-Tyne, etc., R. Co., 2 Railw. Cas. 288.

Dec. 512, where an excavation contract was silent as to whom the sand or material taken from the lots should belong to, it was held that a custom by which the earth removed in making excavations belongs to the excavator and not to the owner of the land, could be shown as evidence of the contract of the parties.

But the right given a lessee to make alterations, does not entitle him to claim the materials taken out of the building in making the alterations. Agate v. Lowenbein, 57 N. Y. 604.

2. A contract to build a house in violation of the building regulations of a city is unlawful, and no action will lie for its breach. Burger v. Roelsch (Supreme Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 460; 8

Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 319; Stevens v. Gourley, 7 C. B. N. S. 99; 97 E. C. L. 99.

In Brinkman v. Eisler (City Ct.), 16 N. Y. Supp. 154, where the plaintiff erected an awning in front of the defendant's premises, such erection being forbidden by a city ordinance, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on a quantum meruit for the work, labor, and materials furnished.

3. In Spurgeon v. McElwain, 6 Ohio 442, it was held that where the keeping of a ninepin alley was unlawful, the builder of such an alley could not recover therefor.

But in Michael v. Bacon, 49 Mo. 474; 8 Am. Rep. 138, it was held that the fact that a builder knows, at the time that he erects a house, that it is to be used for gambling purposes, does not prevent his recovering for work done and material furnished in fitting up the structure. And see generally CONTRACT, vol. 3, pp. 869, 872, 886; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, vol. 15, p. 1176.

4. Hahn v. Horstman, 12 Bush (Ky.) 249; Eva v. McMahon, 77 Cal. 467.

A stipulation to pay the owner a specified amount, as liquidated damages, for each day's delay in completing the building, is not sufficient of itself, in the absence of other evidence showing the impracticability or extreme difficulty of fixing the actual damage caused by the delay, to entitle the owner to recover the amount stipulated for. Patent Brick Co. v. Moore, 75 Cal. 205.

Although a building contract may damage sustained cannot be reached by any known rule of law, then the courts are disposed to look alone to the measure of damages fixed by the contract.¹

provide for a penalty of twenty dollars per day for every day's delay in completing a house, still, in the absence of proof that the owner is damaged by the delay, nominal damages only can be recovered. Wilens v. Kling, 87 Ill. 107.

Where a building contract contains many and various conditions, a breach of some of which would be easily and fully compensated by damages readily proven, and where a breach of others would not necessarily involve more than trifling damages, a provision for the forfeiture of five hundred dollars, in case of any failure to perform on either side, will not be enforced by way of liquidated damages, though such be the expressed intent. First Orthodox Cong. Church v. Walrath, 27 Mich. 232.

Where the damages can be assessed easily and accurately, and they are fixed by the contract itself at an unconscionable sum, it is the plain duty of the court to relieve against such injustice and to treat the sum named as a penalty merely, and hence, where a contract to build a house, the rental value of which was about twenty-five dollars a month, provided for the payment of one hundred and fifty dollars a week damages for delay in completion after the contract time, it was treated as a penalty and not as stipulated damages. Clements v. Schuykill, etc., R. Co., 132 Pa. St. 445.

Wherever there is a sum mentioned at the end of a contract as damages for the non-performance of any of a great number of stipulations therein, it must be treated as a penalty. In re Newman, 4 Ch. Div. 724; Wallis v. Smith, 21 Ch. Div. 243.

Where the cost of performing the contract would not exceed one hundred dollars, and the parties stipulate for damages in case of a breach, fixing the amount at five hundred dollars, they cannot have in contemplation actual compensatory damages, and the sum stipulated will be treated as a penalty. Condon v. Kemper, 47 Kan. 126.

Where a construction contract provided for the reservation of fifteen per cent. of the monthly estimates until the completion and acceptance of the work, it was held that the reserve was not liquidated damages, and that the contractor might recover the reserve less the employer's actual damages from his breach of the contract. Dullaghan v. Fitch, 42 Wis. 679.

In an action for the price of labor done and materials furnished under a contract, where it is found that the defendant should be relieved from the obligation of the contract because the plaintiff failed to complete the work, it is error to allow the defendant the stipulated daily penalty for delay, from the time of the plaintiff's abandonment of the contract until the defendant had the work finished. Lennon v. Smith, 124 N. Y. 578, reversing (C. Pl.) 1 N. Y. Supp. 97.

When it is difficult or impossible to ascertain the damages for the breach by any fixed rule, there is a reason why the parties should liquidate them in advance, as stipulated damages, and why the courts should afterward hold them to such liquidation. Clements v. Schuykill, etc., R. Co., 132 Pa. St. 445.

The parties may agree upon any amount of compensation as liquidated damages, for a breach of the contract, which does not manifestly exceed the amount of injury suffered; and the party in default will be required to pay this fixed sum as an equivalent for the loss sustained. Hahn v. Horstman, 12 Bush (Ky.) 249; Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223; 5 Am. Rep. 102; Bagley v. Peddie, 16 N. Y. 469; 60 Am. Dec. 713; Mott v. Mott, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 127.

A stipulation for the payment of fifty dollars for each day the contractor was in default, was considered, on breach, as liquidated damages, where the damages were uncertain and incapable of being ascertained by any satisfactory rule. Malone v. Philadelphia, 147 Pa. St. 416.

Where a contractor undertakes to do certain work within a given time or pay certain fixed sums, the fact that a bond with a penalty has been given to

Where liquidated damages are agreed upon in the contract, the plaintiff will be limited in his recovery to the amount specified.¹

The use of the terms "penalty," "forfeit," or "liquidated damages," in describing the sum to be paid, is not controlling upon the question of construction.²

14. Forfeitures.—A stipulation is inserted frequently in the contract, that the contractor shall forfeit his rights thereunder for certain breaches, such, for instance, as failing to prosecute the work to the satisfaction of the superintendent, or to complete it within the specified time, in which case the employer is empowered to take the work out of his hands and employ other contractors to complete it.³ Such a provision is similar in its nature to a penalty, and the same rules generally apply to both,⁴ but it secure the payment of them is in itself strong evidence to show that they are liquidated damages. Ranger v. Great Western R. Co., 5 H. L. Cas. 72.

Where the sum agreed upon is a reasonable one and such as the parties might well have fixed as a fair indemnity for a failure to substantially finish the work within the period fixed by the contract, the courts are inclined to uphold it; hence, where an agreement to repair certain houses for fifteen hundred dollars, provided that the contractor should "forfeit five dollars" for each and every day's delay in the completion of the work beyond the time specified, it was construed as fixing the amount of liquidated damages, and not as a penalty. Hall v. Crowley, 5 Allen (Mass.) 304; 81 Am. Dec. 745. For instances where a stipulation was held to be for liquidated damages, see DeGraff v. Wickham (Iowa, 1892), 52 N. W. Rep. 503; Lincoln v. Little Rock Granite Co., 56 Ark. 405.

2. Hall v. Crowley, 5 Allen (Mass.) 304; 81 Am. Dec. 745; Ward v. Hudson River Bldg. Co., 125 N. Y. 230.

But in Salters v. Ralph, 15 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 273, it was held that a provision that a party shall "forfeit" a fixed sum, implies a penalty.

A person who employs another on the understanding that the work is to be done in a workmanlike manner, may terminate the contract if the work be not so done, without regard to the intention of the contractor. Feinberg v. Weiher (C. Pl.), 19 N. Y. Supp. 215.

The incapacity of the contractor to do the work properly, arising from his ignorance and dissipation, and the incompetency and dissipation of his workmen, justifies the owner in terminating the contract. Rector v. McDermott (Ark. 1890), 13 S. W. Rep. 334.

Where the plaintiff contracted to execute certain works for the defendants, the agreement containing a proviso "that if the works did not proceed as satisfactorily as required by the defendants, they should have power to enter thereupon, pay whatever number of men should be left unpaid by the plaintiff, and set to work whatever number of men they might consider necessary, the amount so paid, and the cost of the men so set to work, to be deducted from whatever moneys might be due to the plaintiff," it was held that the intention of the parties was that the defendants, if dissatisfied with the progress of the work, should be at liberty to avail themselves of the terms of the proviso, and deduct from the money due to the plaintiff such sums as had been expended in pursuance thereof. Stadhard v. Lee, 3 B. & S. 364; 113 E. C. L. 364; 32 L. J. Q. B. 75; 9 Jur. N. S. 908; 7 L. T. N. S. 850; 11 W. R. 361.

A provision requiring the architect is often of the greatest importance to the employer to have the work completed within a given time, and a condition in the contract allowing him to take the work out of the contractor's hands on certain contingencies will be enforced,¹ and the latter to certify the contractor's failure must be complied with. O'Keefe v. St. Francis Church, 59 Conn. 551.

Eq. 43; Stadhard v. Lee, 3 B. & S. 364; 113 E. C. L. 364; 32 L. J. Q. B. 75; Ranger v. Great Western R. Co., 3 Railw. Cas. 298; Mohan v. Dundalk, etc., R. Co., L. R., 6 Ir. 477; Davies v. Swansea, 8 Exch. 808; 22 L. J. Exch. 297.

A building contract, entered into by a burial board, contained a clause that it should be lawful for the burial board, in case the contractor should fail in the due performance of any part of his undertaking, or should become bankrupt, or should not, in the opinion and according to the determination of the architect, exercise due diligence and make such progress as would enable the works to be effectually and efficiently completed at the time and in the manner therein mentioned, to determine the contract by a notice in writing under the hand of the clerk of the burial board, and to enter upon and take possession of the works, and of the plant, tools, and materials of the contractors, and use or sell, or use and sell, the same as the absolute property of the burial board. The architect having given a certificate that the contractor was not exercising due diligence, the burial board gave the notice required to determine the contract, and took possession of the works. The certificate was given bona fide, but the delay was in fact occasioned by the act of the board in ordering extra works and otherwise. It was held that the board was, notwithstanding, entitled to act as they did, their right to enter on the works being, by the terms of the contract, dependent on the opinion and judgment of the architect, and not upon the contractor's failure to exercise due diligence, in fact. Roberts v. Bury Imp. Com'rs, L. R., 4 C. P. 755; 38 L. J. C. P. 367.

But where the forfeiture is to be upon the judgment of two architects named, the contractor cannot be stopped from proceeding with the work, where the judgment of one architect is based solely on information derived from the other, and not on personal examination. Benson v. Miller (Minn. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 943.

Where a bill was filed by a contractor alleging unfair conduct on the part of an architect whose decision was by the terms of the contract made final, and who ousted the contractor and finished the buildings, the court, on proof of such unfair conduct, decreed payment of the balance due on the contract, and relieved the contractor from penalties, declared the architect's decision not binding, and ordered both the architect and the contracting party to pay the costs of the suit. Pawley v. Turnbull, 3 Giff. 70; 7 Jur. N. S. 792; 4 L. T. N. S. 672.

Where a contract, by which the plaintiffs agreed to mine iron ore from the defendant's mine by the carving system, gave the defendant the right of terminating the contract whenever it should decide that such system of mining was "prejudicial to the future welfare and development of said mine," it was held that this gave the defendant no right to arbitrarily terminate the contract, and, having stopped the plaintiffs from continuing the work, without even pretending to have determined that the system would be prejudicial, it was liable in damages for breach of the contract. Anvil Min. Co. v. Humble, 153 U. S. 540.

Not Entitled to Equitable Relief.—A contractor agreeing to execute the public works of a company, and binding himself for the due performance of his contract by forfeitures subjecting himself to the arbitrary decision of a person nominated by the company as to his liability thereto, is not entitled to relief in equity against the forfeiture. Ranger v. Great Western R. Co., 2 Jur. 787; 5 H. L. Cas. 72.

Failure of Contractor.—A builder contracted with a building club to erect houses for them on their own land. The contract contained a stipulation that, if the contractor should neglect or refuse to proceed with the work in a proper manner to the satisfaction of the architect of the club, or become bankrupt, or insolvent, or otherwise rendered incapable of completing the contract, the architect should have the power, after giving two days' notice in writing to the contractor, to appoint other persons to complete the work, and to provide the requisite materials, plant, and implements; provided that the contractor should have drawn money on account of his contract. The contractor commenced the works, and carried them on for some time, receiving a considerable sum from the club. On the thirtieth of May he filed a liquidation petition. On the second of June the architect of the club gave notice to the contractor that, as he had neglected to proceed with the works, he should, on the expiration of two days, employ other means of completing the works, and that he must not remove any materials, implements, or plant from the works, and on the expiration of this notice, the club took possession of the materials, implements, and plant. It was held that the club was entitled, as against the trustee in the liquidation, to retain what they had seized, the seizure being a protected transaction within the Bankruptcy Act (1869), § 94. In re Waugh, 4 Ch. Div. 524; 25 W. R. 258; 35 L. T. N. S. 769; 46 L. J. Bank. 26.

Delay in Awarding Amount Due Contractor.—A contract for the performance of works contained a provision that if the contractor should not, according to the determination of the employers' engineer, exercise such due diligence as would enable the works to be completed according to the contract, the employers might put an end to the contract, and that the contractor should be paid such sum as the engineer should determine to have been reasonably earned for the work actually done. The contract having been put an end to under this provision, the contractor filed a bill against the employers and the engineer, complaining of undue delay on the part of the latter in awarding the amount earned by the contractor, and seeking the payment of what was due upon the contract, but did not establish any case of fraud or collusion against the engineer. It was held that the bill was properly dismissed with costs. Scott v. Liverpool, 3 De G. & J. 334.

Forfeiture in Lieu of Damages.—No action lies against a contractor for failure to comply with a contract which provides that in case of non-compliance the owner may annul such contract and forfeit the unpaid part of the work. O'Connor v. Henderson Bridge Co. (Ky. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 251.

1. Disputes having arisen between a railway company and a contractor employed in making the railway, the company insisted upon a right under the contract, owing to the alleged default of the contractor, to discharge him, take possession of the line of materials, and complete the works itself. The contractor resisted such claim, imputing the backward state of the works to the acts of the company, and held forcible possession. Collisions occurring between the workmen of the two parties, each being charged with impeding the operations of the other, and the completion and opening of the railway for traffic being in the meantime delayed, the court, on the application of the company, restrained the contractor from continuing on the line, or interfering with the operations of the company, and directed an account of what was due the contractor for works and materials done and provided, without regard to the formal certificates of the company's engineer, and without an issue to try whether the company, at the time it proceeded to enter upon the works and remove the contractor, was lawfully justified in doing so, reserving as well the question of the right of the contractor to compensation for loss of profit on unexecuted works, as all other directions, until after the trial and the report. East Lancashire R. Co. v. Hattersley, 8 Hare 86.

2. The contract is one where, if the employer is wrong, the contractor can be amply compensated in damages, whereas, if the contractor were allowed to resume work, the court could not enforce specific performance of the contract in order to compel its completion. Garrett v. Banstead, etc., R. Co., 4 De G. J. & S. 462; 11 Jur. N. S. 654. And see Jennings v. Brighton Intercepting, etc., Board, 4 De G. J. & S. 735, note.

Such provisions are often inserted in contracts with subcontractors.¹

Forfeitures are not favored in law, however,² and must be declared at the time the cause therefor occurs,³ and if, after the time for forfeiture has passed, the employer treats the agreement as still subsisting, he will be held to have waived the forfeiture.⁴

A contractor agreed to execute the works of a railway within a certain time, and, on being paid in a certain manner, and under a condition that if he failed to proceed with the works as required by the engineer of the company, the contract should be void, and the implements and materials belonging to the contractor should be forfeited. The contractor did not satisfy the engineer of the company, and the company proceeded to take possession of the works. The contractor alleged that the proper payments had been made to him; and it was held that the court would not restrain the company by interlocutory injunction until the questions between the company and the contractor were decided. Munro v. Wivenhoe, etc., R. Co., 11 Jur. N. S. 612; 13 W. R. 880; 12 L. T. N. S. 655; 4 De G. J. & S. 723.

1. Maloney v. Malcolm, 31 Mo. 45. A contract for the excavation of a harbor was sublet under an agreement that the work would be performed "within the time fixed by said contract and the extensions thereof, granted or to be granted," and that the original contractor should have the right to proceed with the completion of the work if there should be a failure to perform the contract so as to endanger a forfeiture. The time fixed by the contract for the performance of the work was extended from December thirty-first to June thirtieth, and thereafter to July thirty-first and finally to December thirty-first. Pending this final extension the original contractor resumed possession of the work, and it was held that whether the danger of forfeiture was so great as to justify resumption of the work by the original contractor, was for the jury to determine. Mundy v. Stevens, 61 Fed. Rep. 77; 9 C. C. A. 366.

2. An arbitrary forfeiture is not justified. Chicago v. Sexton, 115 Ill. 230; White v. Harrigan, 41 Minn. 414. And see Hatch v. Fogerty, 33 N. Y. Super. Ct. 166; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Donnegan, 111 Ind. 179.

A contract with a city to construct and operate waterworks provided that, in case of the contractor's failure to do so, "the rights and franchises granted to him shall cease and determine." Time was not made of the essence of the contract, and although the works, as at first constructed, were not what they should have been, this was partly the fault of the city, and, moreover, the city used the water for some purposes. It was held that the city could not, by ex parte action, without judicial proceedings, annul the contract, and that, under the circumstances, the contractor was entitled to a reasonably further time in which to perfect the works, if possible. Foster v. Joliet, 27 Fed. Rep. 899.

Pay for Work Performed.—Where a contract was annulled by the city of New Orleans on account of the failure of the contractor to complete the work within the time prescribed, it was held that his right to recover pay for work already performed depended on whether the failure was through his fault. If overpowering force—such as an unusual high water—occurred to interfere with the operations of the contractor, he would be entitled to recover pay for what work he had actually performed, although the contract was forfeited. Bietry v. New Orleans, 22 La. Ann. 149.

3. The failure of the employer to declare a forfeiture at the time the cause therefor occurs, is a waiver thereof. Linch v. Paris Lumber, etc., Elevator Co., 80 Tex. 23.

A provision that if the work is not progressing to the satisfaction of the superintendent, the employer may take it out of the hands of the contractor and employ others to complete it, can only be enforced before the time originally fixed for the completion of the work has expired. Walker v. London, etc., R. Co., 1 C. P. Div. 518; 45 L. J. C. P. Div. 787.

4. Ex p. Newitt, 16 Ch. Div. 522. And see Arterial Drainage Co. v. Rathangan, etc., L. R., 6 Ir. 515; Murphy v. Buckman, 66 N. Y. 297.

A contractor did not perform a

Notice usually is required to be given the contractor, of the intention of the employer to take charge of the work,¹ but the service of such notice does not of itself terminate the contract and relieve the contractor from responsibility for the proper execution of the work done.² If there has been delay—and this is building contract according to its terms, and the owner of the building stopped him. The defects were then agreed upon, and the contractor agreed to remedy them, and to complete the work. It was held a waiver of forfeiture, and that as the owner again stopped the work without a failure on the contractor's part to perform as last agreed, the latter had a right of action. Fallon v. Lawler, 102 N. Y. 228.

A was a contractor for the grading of a railroad. B was a subcontractor under a contract stipulating that A might retain fifteen per cent. of the amount of the monthly estimates as security for B's execution of his contract. The contract provided that if B failed to carry on the work, A might carry it on at B's expense, or declare the contract forfeited and re-let the work, holding B liable for damages. B left the work. A declared a forfeiture, but neither re-let nor did further work, and by agreement with the railroad company abandoned the work, receiving full pay for what had been done. It was held that the amount retained by A from the monthly estimates belonged to B. Winters v. Fleece, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 546.

1. See Benson v. Miller, 56 Minn. 410; Rodemer v. Gonder, 9 Gill (Md.) 288.

Where a contract authorizes the government, in case of non-performance, to complete the work at the contractor's cost, "after eight days' notice in writing," the giving of such notice is a prerequisite to annulling the contract. Williams v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 132.

A notice to the contractor to "supply all proper and sufficient materials and labor for the due prosecution of said work, and with due expedition to proceed therewith," is sufficiently specific. Pauling v. Dover, 24 L. J. Exch. 128; 10 Exch. 753.

In Maloney v. Malcolm, 31 Mo. 45, an express declaration of forfeiture was held unnecessary.

A contractor agreed with a subcontractor to do certain work on a railroad, during certain months, and, upon ten days' notice, the former to have the right, upon written notice to the latter from the engineer of the railroad company, to declare the contract forfeited, or to assume control and carry it on himself, in case the work should not be completed rapidly enough. It was held that the contractor had no power to compel the engineer to give such written notice, but might give it himself with equal effect, when it should become necessary. Hendrie v. Canadian Bank of Commerce, 49 Mich. 401.

The plaintiff contracted with the defendant company to construct a bridge, it being stipulated that for any reason deemed sufficient to the company, it was to have the privilege, by giving the plaintiff one month's notice, to annul the contract, to discontinue the work, or continue it in such manner as it might choose, the contractor to be entitled to payment in full for all material delivered and work done, the company to take the working plant at a fair valuation, to be determined by an arbitrator. "In case the contract shall not well and truly . . . comply with and perform all the terms herein stipulated, or in case it should appear to the engineer of the (defendant) company that the work does not progress with sufficient speed or in a proper manner," the defendant could annul the contract, if he saw fit, and the unpaid part of the value of the work done could be forfeited. It was held that the right of the company to annul the contract whenever it appeared to its engineer that the work was not progressing with sufficient speed or in a proper manner, was to be exercised without question by, or previous notice to, the contractor. Henderson Bridge Co. v. O'Connor, 88 Ky. 303.

2. Washburn v. Dettinger, 76 Hun (N. Y.) 141.

The owner of a building notified the contractor that if he did not complete it he (the owner) would, at the expiration of the three days, complete it himself. The contractor informed the owner that he would proceed as soon as he could obtain certain materials. Afterward he notified the owner that he could not secure the materials, but that occasioned by the default of the employer, he cannot enforce a forfeiture.¹

VIII. EXTRA WORK—1. Who May Order.—It is stipulated usually in working contracts that no alterations or extra work shall be made without the assent of the owner.² In any case, in order to charge him for the extras, they must be ordered by his duly authorized agent,³ and the architect, or engineer employed merely to superintend the construction of the work, has no such authority.⁴ Where the contract requires the extra work to be ordered if the owner could get them elsewhere, he would send some men to finish the building. It was held that the contractor remained in charge of the building and was responsible for its proper construction. Washburn v. Dettinger (Supreme Ct.), 27 N. Y. Supp. 540; 76 Hun (N. Y.) 141.

1. Haughery v. Thiberge, 24 La. Ann. 442; McAndrews v. Tippet, 39 N. J. L. 105; Standard Gas-Light Co. v. Wood, 61 Fed. Rep. 74; 9 C. C. A. 362.

The right to annul a contract for non-performance of its terms by the contractors is lost, where the employers are in default by failure to estimate and pay for the work done and materials furnished by the contractors. O'Connor v. Henderson Bridge Co. (Ky. 1894), 27 S. W. Rep. 251. And see supra, this title, Time of Performance.

The superintendent cannot bind the contractor by his decision that the delay is not caused by the default of the employer. Roberts v. Bury Imp. Com'rs, L. R., 5 C. P. 310; 39 L. J. C. P. 129; 22 L. T. N. S. 132; 18 W. R. 702.

Where the plaintiff contracted to do work for the defendant, and to complete it "by November 15th, under a penalty of $100 per day, provided you have foundation ready by June 15th," it was held that the completion of the foundation was a condition precedent, in default of which the defendant could not claim the penalty as liquidated damages for the plaintiff's delay. Standard Gas-Light Co. v. Wood, 61 Fed. Rep. 74; 9 C. C. A. 362.

2. Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314; 71 Am. Dec. 635; Baltimore Cemetery Co. v. Coburn, 7 Md. 202; Franklin v. Darke, 3 F. & F. 65.

3. Gillison v. Wanamaker, 140 Pa. St. 358. In Russell v. Sa Da Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. 149; 106 E. C. L. 149; 2 L. J. C. P. 68; 7 L. T. N. S. 804, they were allowed to be ordered by a duly authorized agent; and in Myers v. Sarl,

3 El. & El. 306; 107 E. C. L. 306, by the direction of the architect, in writing.

Implied Authority.—In Wallis v. Robinson, 3 F. & F. 307, extra work was ordered by the architect with the knowledge of the employer. This was held sufficient evidence of an implied authority and new contract to pay for them.

Contractor and Subcontractor.—A contractor is not liable to a subcontractor for extra work done by the latter which was ordered on behalf of the owner and not on behalf of the contractor, of which fact the subcontractor had notice. Wendt v. Vogel, 87 Wis. 462.

4. Baltimore Cemetery Co. v. Coburn, 7 Md. 202; Starkweather v. Goodman, 48 Conn. 101; 40 Am. Rep. 152; Sexton v. Cook County, 114 Ill. 174; Sharpe v. San Paulo Brazilian R. Co., L. R., 8 Ch. 605, note; 27 L. T. N. S. 699; Reg. v. Starrs, 17 Can. Supreme Ct. 118. See Homersham v. Wolverhampton Waterworks Co., 6 Exch. 137.

Where the extras in question were ordered by the superintendent under a power to inspect and reject work, and the contractor gave no notice at the time that he should regard it as extra work, it was held that no claim for extras could be made. Bowe v. U. S., 42 Fed. Rep. 761.

The fact that, when a statement of the extra work and materials was handed the employer, he made no objection, does not estop him from making the objection afterward. Starkweather v. Goodman, 48 Conn. 101; 40 Am. Rep. 152.

A supervising engineer cannot, in a contract for clearing a roadbed, direct work outside of the roadbed and bind the company to pay for it. Alexander v. Robertson, 86 Tex. 511.

In Sexton v. Cook County, 114 Ill. 174, it was held that the county board by a building committee, an order by a minority only of such committee is insufficient.¹

2. Special Stipulations—a. GENERALLY.—Special stipulations in regard to the ordering of alterations and extras are inserted frequently in working contracts,² and must be complied with always in order to charge the employer with the additional expense.³ Such, for instance, as requiring the expense to be agreed upon at the time the extras are ordered,⁴ and the order to be in writing,⁵ and a claim made in writing within a specified time after the work is performed.⁶ But special provisions for determining as to extras may be waived always by the parties, who may agree to alterations by parol.⁷

alone had authority to bind the county and that it could not be held liable for extras ordered by its building committee and supervising architect. See, to the same effect, Benton County v. Patrick, 54 Miss. 240. But in Gibson County v. Motherwell Iron, etc., Co., 123 Ind. 364, it was held that where the board of county commissioners employed an architect, and intrusted him with the full supervision of the construction of a public work, ordering alterations and extras, and the commissioners accepted the work after completion, the county was liable for such extra work.

Where persons who have agreed to put glazing in certain houses are told by the architect, who has no authority to make any contracts, that bent glass would be an extra, no contract by the owner to pay for such extra will be implied. McKey v. Nelson, 43 Ill. App. 456.

Where, in the progress of building, work done under a contract, some process more expensive than contracted for was ordered by the architect, with the knowledge of the employer, and the builder's subcontractor was told it was to be paid extra for, it was held that there was evidence of a contract to pay extra for it, and of authority in the architect to make such a contract with him. Wallis v. Robinson, 3 F. & F. 307.

But a subcontractor cannot recover from the contractor for extras done on the order of the superintendent, given to his knowledge, on behalf of the owner, and not of the contractor. Wendt v. Vogel, 87 Wis. 462.

It is not competent to show a ratification by the board of commissioners of extra work done, under a contract for building a jail, by proof that the disputed items were omitted by mistake in the architect's report to the board of extra work, the board having approved some and rejected others of the items so reported. Eigemann v. Posey County, 82 Ind. 413.

1. Sexton v. Cook County, 114 Ill. 174. And subcontractors are chargeable with notice of such provision. Shaw v. First Baptist Church, 44 Minn. 22.

2. "It will, however, be generally advisable to see that there is a condition in the contract regulating this subject, and particularly that no extras whatever shall be incurred unless consented to by the owner in writing." Lloyd's Law of Building (2d ed.), § 53.

3. Bentley v. Davidson, 74 Wis. 420; Homersham v. Wolverhampton Waterworks Co., 6 Exch. 137. Where the contract is with a municipal corporation, any statutory provisions for binding the city for extra work must be complied with. O'Brien v. New York, 139 N. Y. 543.

4. Baltimore Cemetery Co. v. Coburn, 7 Md. 202; Miller v. McCaffrey, 9 Pa. St. 245.

Where the parties proceed without regard to such provisions, they will be held to have waived them. Meyer v. Berlandi, 53 Minn. 59.

And evidence of a promise to pay for the extras is admissible as tending to show a waiver. O'Keefe v. St. Francis' Church, 59 Conn. 551.

But a waiver of such provisions will not be implied from the fact that one

b. WRITTEN ORDERS.—The contract frequently provides that no extras or alterations shall be made except upon a written order of the employer or superintendent.¹ Where such is the case, nothing but a written order will suffice, and the contractor performing extra work without an order in writing cannot recover therefor,² and this has been held even though the work be member of a building committee approved of an alteration—that sometimes all of the committee, at others a less number, attended while the work was going on—that in the opinion of the witness they must have known of the work, and that they talked of it often without expressing any displeasure at the alteration. Miller v. McCaffrey, 9 Pa. St. 245.

And where the superintendent, when verbally ordering the extra work to be done, promises to pay a certain amount for it, the waiver of the requirement in the contract that the claim for extra work shall be made by the contractor to the architect in writing, applies only to that particular piece of extra work. O'Keefe v. St. Francis' Church, 59 Conn. 551.

In Ford v. U. S., 17 Ct. of Cl. 60, it was held that the parties to a written building contract are not bound by a clause that no claim shall be made for extra work unless first agreed on in writing; it will not avoid a transaction implying a verbal agreement for extra work. Such provision was inserted in government contracts merely to limit the power of architects and superintendents.

1. Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314; 71 Am. Dec. 635, where the contract provided that "no extra charges to be made unless a written agreement be made and attached to the contract." Russell v. Sa Da Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. 149; 106 E. C. L. 149; 32 L. J. C. P. 68; 7 L. T. N. S. 804, where "additions made by order in writing" of the defendant's agent were to be paid for at a price previously agreed upon. Myers v. Sarl, 3 El. & El. 306; 107 E. C. L. 306; where extras were to be ordered in writing under the hand of the architect, and a weekly account of the work done thereunder delivered to the architect or clerk of the works every Monday next ensuing the performance of such work; and the delivery of such account was made a condition precedent to the right of the contractor to recover payment for such extras.

In Thames Iron Works, etc., Co. v. Royal Mail Steam-Packet Co., 13 C. B. N. S. 358; 106 E. C. L. 358, the contract provided that alterations should not be made by the contractor unless on the authority of a letter signed by the secretary of the defendant company, stating that the board of directors had directed such alterations to be made, and specifying the precise amount they would allow for the same. Such a provision is reasonable. Howard v. Pensacola, etc., R. Co., 24 Fla. 560.

Under a contract "to construct seven rock culverts, more or less, as directed by the engineer," none of the specifications containing a particular description of the structures or their parts, but one providing that "no claim for extra work, or for work not provided for in the contract, will be made or allowed," unless on written order of the engineer, it was held that no work done in the construction of the culverts under the direction of the engineer was extra work. Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Trentem, 63 Tex. 442.

2. Sutherland v. Morris, 45 Hun (N. Y.) 259; Woodruff v. Rochester, etc., R. Co., 108 N. Y. 39; Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314; 71 Am. Dec. 635; Illinois Institution, etc. v. Platt, 5 Ill. App. 567; Duncan v. Miami County, 19 Ind. 154; Bentley v. Davidson, 74 Wis. 420; Russell v. Sa Da Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. 149; 106 E. C. L. 149; 32 L. J. C. P. 68; 7 L. T. N. S. 804; Myers v. Sarl, 3 El. & El. 306; 107 E. C. L. 306; Thames Iron Works, etc., Co. v. Royal Mail Steam-Packet Co., 13 C. B. N. S. 358; 106 E. C. L. 358; Franklin v. Darke, 3 F. & F. 65; 6 L. T. N. S. 291; Nixon v. Taff Vale R. Co., 7 Hare 136; Taff Vale R. Co. v. Nixon, 1 H. L. Cas. 111.

If a contract with a railroad company for constructing its road provides that the contractor shall not deviate from the contract, nor receive any pay for extra work, unless a written order for the same is made and signed by the engineer, the contractor cannot recover for extra work done on the verbal ordered verbally by the owner himself,¹ unless a waiver of such order of the engineer, even if there is another clause in the contract which provides that the engineer may direct alterations in, and additions to, the work. White v. San Rafael, etc., R. Co., 50 Cal. 417.

Where the contract provides that all extras and alterations must be agreed upon beforehand and the price indorsed upon the contract, the builder cannot recover therefor unless the price is so agreed upon and indorsed. Baltimore Cemetery Co. v. Coburn, 7 Md. 202.

And a contractor cannot recover for extra work which was, in effect, additions and alterations, where none of such additions and alterations have been specified in writing as required by the contract. Condon v. Jersey City, 43 N. J. L. 452.

But where, after work was commenced on a church under a contract providing that no extras should be paid for unless agreed to in writing signed by the parties, city building inspectors ordered changes, a sketch of which was prepared by the architect, and the contractor was directed to make such changes, it was held that though there was no express contract for the extras made necessary by the order, it was the duty of the church corporation to see that the order was obeyed, from which arose an obligation to pay for the work necessary therefor, done with the consent of the corporation, under the direction of its architect. Cunningham v. Fourth Baptist Church, 159 Pa. St. 620.

Though a subcontractor's contract provides that all extra work shall be first agreed on in writing by the superintendent and the contractor, he will be entitled to compensation for extra work made necessary by a change of plans and dimensions not known to him until after the work was done, the principal contractor having absconded, and the superintendent refusing to give any writing. Fitzgerald v. Beers, 31 Mo. App. 356.

Mere sketches of the manner in which the extra work is to be done, prepared, and furnished to the contractor by the architect, but not signed by him, are not directions in writing under the hand of the architect. Myers v. Sarl, 3 El. & El. 306; 107 E. C. L. 306.

Progress certificates issued by the superintendent, ordering payments on the work done, do not amount to written orders. Lamprell v. Billericay Union, 18 L. J. Exch. 282. Thus, in Tharsis Sulphur, etc., Co. v. M'Elroy, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 1040, during the execution of a contract for the construction of large iron buildings, the contractors alleged that it was impossible to cast certain iron trough girders of a specified weight, and subsequently they were allowed to erect girders of a much heavier weight, and the actual weights were entered in the engineer's certificates issued from time to time authorizing the interim payments. On the completion of the work, the contractor claimed a considerable amount in excess of the contract price for the extra weight of metal supplied, and it was held that the certificates were not written orders, and the claim was therefore excluded. See Goodyear v. Weymouth, 1 H. & R. 67; 35 L. J. C. P. 12.

Where a building contract contained a clause that no extras should be paid for unless ordered in writing and the weekly bills delivered for the same, and this had not been done, though extra work had been executed, it was held that the fact that the architect's certificate for the final balance awarded a certain sum in respect of extras, did not entitle the builder to recover beyond the certified sum for extras in respect of which written orders had not been given nor weekly bills delivered. Brunsdon v. Staines Local Board, 1 C. & E. 272.

1. It was said to make no difference that the extra work was ordered by the owner. The contractor may refuse to do it, or may assent under the protection offered by the contract; but if he does extra work without such protection, he waives his right to additional compensation. Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314; 71 Am. Dec. 635. But see Baum v. Covert, 62 Miss. 113, where it was held that, notwithstanding a building contract provided that no extra work should be allowed or paid for unless authorized by a previous agreement in writing, if the contracting party ordered the builder to do extra work, which was done, he would be liable therefor. And see infra, note 7.

Where a building contract provided requirement is shown;¹ and the rule is the same in equity as in law.² But a written contract may be altered or modified by parole, and if the owner orders extra work and promises to pay therefor, the contractor can recover,³ and the verbal that no claim should be made for additional work unless the same should be done pursuant to a written order from the architects, and that written notice of all claims should be given the architects within three days of the beginning of such work, it was held that, in the absence of an agreement modifying the original contract, the builder was not liable for extra work unless it was done on a written order; and the court erred in an instruction that the contractor could recover for extra work if it was done "at the request, or with the knowledge and consent, express or implied," of the builder "or his agent," without charging the jury concerning the effect of a waiver by the builder of a written order, or of his independent promise to pay for the work. Wortman v. Kleinschmidt, 12 Mont. 316.

1. Illinois Institution, etc. v. Platt, 5 Ill. App. 567; Baltimore Cemetery Co. v. Coburn, 7 Md. 202; Ahern v. Boyce, 19 Mo. App. 552.

The parties may waive the provision and make changes in the original contract by parol. Erskine v. Johnson, 23 Neb. 261; McLeod v. Genius, 31 Neb. 1. But the superintendent has no authority to waive it. Ahern v. Boyce, 19 Mo. App. 552.

In Gibson Co. v. Motherwell Iron, etc., Co., 123 Ind. 364, it was held that where the extras were ordered by the superintending architect, and the work accepted by the county commissioners, and it did not appear that they, or any one acting for them, ever requested an agreement as to the price of the extra work, or that the contract therefor be reduced to writing, the county was liable.

The provision in a building contract that no extra work shall be paid for or allowed, unless done on the written order of the engineer in charge, and that all claims for such work must be made to the engineer in writing before payment of the next succeeding estimate after the work is performed, or be considered as abandoned, is waived by the engineer's ordering extra work without putting his orders in writing. Elgin v. Joslyn, 136 Ill. 525, aff'd 36 Ill. App. 301.

2. Kirk v. Bromley Union, 17 L. J. Ch. N. S. 127; 2 Ph. 640.

The parties are presumed to have understood the import of their contract. Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314; 71 Am. Dec. 635.

3. Under a written contract, by which the plaintiffs undertook to build a house for the defendant, according to certain specifications and at a specified price, containing a stipulation that "no new work done on the premises shall be considered as extra unless a separate estimate in writing for the same, before its commencement, shall have been submitted by the contractor to the proprietor, and his signature obtained thereto," the parties may, by mutual assent given orally, make changes and alterations in the plans as the work progresses; and if there is no agreement as to the cost of the alterations, the presumption is that no increase of cost is contemplated, and the contractor is entitled to recover on the contract as if the omitted work had been done instead of that substituted for it; but if the new agreement fixes a higher price for the alterations or substituted work and materials, he is entitled to recover the difference, although no written estimate was submitted and signed. Badders v. Davis, 88 Ala. 367. Stone, C. J., in delivering the opinion in this case, said: "We hold that, if the defendant promised to pay for extra work done at his request, and if such work was worth more, considering both materials and workmanship, than the omitted parts for which it was substituted, then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the difference. If he made no promise to pay, then the presumption arises that the alterations were agreed to be made, and were made, without extra charge." And see Erskine v. Johnson, 23 Neb. 261.

A building contract which provides that no work shall be considered as extra unless a separate estimate in writing shall be submitted by the contractor to the architect and the owner, and their signatures obtained thereto, does not preclude a recovery for extra work done under a parol agreement between the contractor and the owner.

order of the owner will be evidence of a waiver of the requirement.¹

c. ESTIMATE AND CERTIFICATE OF SUPERINTENDENT. — Where the contract provides that no claim for extra work shall be allowed except upon the estimate and certificate of the superintendent, there can be no recovery unless such estimate has been made and certificate given.² Such a stipulation gives the superintendent implied authority to determine what are extras,³ and his certificate is conclusive upon the parties.⁴

Lewis v. Yagel (Supreme Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 833; 77 Hun (N. Y.) 337.

1. Where the contractor did certain work at the oral request of the owner, and upon his promise to pay for it, and other work upon his oral request only, it was held that there was evidence of a waiver of the requirement as to writing and a substitution of an oral contract therefor, resting upon sufficient consideration. Bartlett v. Stanchfield, 148 Mass. 394. And see Elgin v. Joslyn, 36 Ill. App. 301; McLeod v. Genius, 31 Neb. 1.

A departure from the original plan with the consent of the owner, or notice by the owner to the contractor, at the expiration of the time, to go on and complete the work, has been held sufficient waiver. Close v. Clark (C. Pl.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 538. And see Hogan v. Burton (Supreme Ct.), 7 N. Y. Supp. 722.

2. Shaw v. First Baptist Church, 44 Minn. 22. And see Rude v. Mitchell, 97 Mo. 365.

The certificate must be provided or a good reason for not procuring it shown. Mills v. Weeks, 21 Ill. 561.

Until the value of the work has been ascertained by the superintendent, no action for its value is maintainable. Westwood v. Secretary of State for India, 7 L. T. N. S. 736; 11 W. R. 261.

In an action for services rendered, the issue was whether the work was extra, or was part of the work called for by a contract between the parties. It was held that, where the contract called for a certificate from the defendant's engineer that the work was fully completed, absence of evidence on that point would not affect the plaintiff's claim for extra work, where the defendant denied any liability therefor. Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Crumbo, 4 Ind. App. 456.

Where a contract provides that the value of extra work should be ascertained by persons mutually chosen, if such valuation has not been actually made, the plaintiff, in an action upon a quantum meruit, may give other evidence of the value of the work. Baker v. Herty, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 249. But a provision in a building contract that disputes with respect to the value of extra work, or of work omitted by direction of the owner, should be determined by arbitrators, is no bar to an action by the contractor for damages for a breach of contract by the owner in refusing to allow the contractor to do the work contracted for and letting the work to another. Boyd v. Meighan, 48 N. J. L. 404.

3. Richards v. May, 10 Q. B. Div. 400; 52 L. J. Q. B. 272; 31 W. R. 708.

4. Richards v. May, 10 Q. B. Div. 400; 52 L. J. Q. B. 272; 31 W. R. 708; Lepthorne v. St. Aubyn, 1 C. & E. 486; Goodyear v. Weymouth, 1 H. & R. 67; 35 L. J. C. P. 12; Swift v. State, 89 N. Y. 52. But see Dubois v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 334.

The plaintiffs contracted to execute for the defendants specified works, and also all such additional works as should be deemed necessary by the defendants' principal or resident engineer. The contract deed provided that no extra works should be made without an order in writing, signed by the principal engineers or engineer, or by the resident engineer; that such extra works should be valued by such engineers or engineer, having regard to the schedule of prices in the specification, and that the decision of such engineers or engineer should be final as to the value of such extra works; that if any extra works should be ordered, the contractors should send in accounts thereof within one month; and that in default of their doing so, the defendants should not be bound to pay for them. That the defendants

3. Where Independent of Contract. — A contractor, agreeing to perform certain work for a specified sum, cannot recover for increased cost as extra work, upon discovering that he has made a mistake in his estimate, or that the work will be more expensive than he has anticipated. The hazards of the undertaking are assumed voluntarily by him.¹ No recovery can be had for extra should not be bound to pay for any works, except upon the production of a certificate signed by some principal or resident engineer, and that the principal engineers or engineer for the time being should be the exclusive judges of the execution of the works and of everything connected with the contract; and that the certificates under their or his hands or hand should be binding and conclusive on both parties. It was held that the engineers having given a certificate for the extra works, the defendants were precluded from setting up, as defenses to the action for the price of the extra works, that the extra works had not been ordered in writing, and that no accounts had been sent in for them, as required by the deed. Connor v. Belfast Water Com'rs, 5 Ir. R. C. L. 55.

On a building contract, whereby additions and alterations were not to avoid it, but to be allowed for at amounts to be named by the employer's surveyor, the contract being made up of a tender framed on quantities calculated by the surveyor, and specifications referred to them, and signed by the builder alone, it was held that the builder, having completed the work and claimed payment under the contract, could not claim for work as excess of the quantities on which it was based, nor for any additions or alterations beyond the amount allowed by the surveyor. Coker v. Young, 2 F. & F. 98.

Where a city lets a contract for the erection of a building, containing a provision that, in case of any dispute between the architect and the contractor as to the meaning of the plans and specifications, or as to what is extra work, the same shall be decided by the architect, and his decision shall be final; but afterward, on disputes arising, the city makes a supplemental contract, which, though making the architect the final interpreter of the plans and specifications, provides that, in the event of a difference between him and the contractor, the latter shall

"under protest" complete the work under the architect's interpretation, leaving the contractor's rights as to such work done under protest open without impairment until after the full completion of the contract—the contractor, in an action, based on the supplemental contract, for extra work done and material furnished, is not bound by the architect's decision that such work and material were required by the plans and specifications. Galveston v. Devlin (Tex. 1892), 19 S.W. Rep. 395.

Where a building contract provides that the work shall be done to the satisfaction of the architect, and that any dispute as to claims for extra work shall be referred to him, it is error, in an action by the builder on the contract, to refer to the jury such questions as to extra work and the performance of the contract, in the absence of evidence of fraud, or if the question of fraud is not submitted to the jury. Guthat v. Gow, 95 Mich. 527.

Where a building contract provides that all estimates of extra material and labor furnished and performed by the contractor shall be estimated by the architect, and that the estimate shall be binding on the parties, it is a fraud on the contractor if the architect does not make a fair allowance for the extra work and material, and makes an estimate for which there is no substantial basis, and in such case the contractor is not bound by the estimate. Anderson v. Imhoff, 34 Neb. 335.

But where the architect has, unknown to the contractor, guaranteed the owner that the cost of the building should not exceed a certain sum, his decision as to what are extras is not binding on the contractor. Kimberley v. Dick, 25 L. T. N. S. 476; 20 W. R. 49; 41 L. J. Ch. 38; L. R., 13 Eq. 1. And see Kemp v. Rose, 4 Jur. N. S. 919.

Columbia, 18 Ct. of Cl. 291. In Love-lock v. King, 1 M. & Rob. 60, Lord Tenterden said: "The person intending to make alterations generally consults the person whom he intends to employ, and ascertains from him the expense of the undertaking, and it will very frequently depend on this estimate whether he proceeds or not. It is therefore a great hardship upon him if he is to lose the protection of this estimate, unless he fully understands that such consequences will follow and assents to them. In many cases he will be completely ignorant whether the particular alterations suggested will produce an increase of labor and expenditure, and I do not think that the mere fact of assenting to them ought to deprive him of the protection of his contract."

Under a contract to excavate "solid rock" at so much a foot, no extra charge can be made for flint rock, though it costs four or five times more to excavate than limestone, there being no evidence of usage attaching to the terms used in any other than their ordinary sense. Fruin v. Crystal R. Co., 89 Mo. 397. And where the contractor undertook "to furnish at his own expense all necessary material and labor, and excavate and build" a certain sewer, and the specifications provided that he should make all necessary excavations in such directions and of such width and depth as should be necessary, it was held that the fact that part of the excavation was through rock would not entitle him to extra compensation, though neither party contemplated that rock would be met, and parol evidence of that fact was inadmissible. McCauley v. Des Moines, 83 Iowa 212.

In an action for the price of cut stone furnished for a depot, it appeared that the plaintiffs had agreed to furnish stone for the depot, "agreeable to drawings and specifications bearing same date herewith," drawn and prepared by E., architect, and signed by the contracting parties. There was a drawing, stamped with the name of the architect and signed by the plaintiffs, showing the tower of the depot, the stone for which, they claimed, was extra. It was held that the burden was on plaintiffs to show that such stone was extra. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Thomlinson, 33 Ill. App. 388.

An act empowered a corporation to scour an inland harbor, and they did so by taking up the mud in barges, and letting it out at the mouth of the harbor, so as to be carried down the river. The corporation employed the plaintiff to excavate and remove certain estimated quantities of earth down the river at certain prices, the contract (not noticing the scouring process) providing only for extra work ordered by the engineer of the plaintiff in writing. In consequence of the cleansing, which was continued while the plaintiff was engaged in the work, the quantity of soil he had to remove was vastly increased by great deposits of mud. The plaintiff applied for and was refused any additional remuneration, and after the work was completed sued the corporation for compensation, but the case of the plaintiff, as stated at the trial, did not show that the mode of cleansing adopted by the corporation was unusual or unreasonable, and, on the contrary, it appeared rather to be a proper mode of carrying out the powers of the act. It was held that, as it did not appear that the process was unlawful or wrongful, it was no cause of action. Rigby v. Bristol, 29 L. J. Exch. 359.

A agreed to build a house for B, who prepared a specification, which contained particulars of the different portions of the work. Under the head of "Carpenter and joiner," there were specified the scantling of the joists for the different floors, the rafters, ridge and wall, but no mention was made of the flooring. The specification stated that "the whole of the materials mentioned or otherwise in the foregoing particulars, necessary for the completion of the work, must be provided by the contractor." At the foot of the specification, A signed a memorandum, whereby he agreed with B "to do all the works of every kind mentioned and contained in the foregoing particulars, according, in every respect, to the drawings furnished, or to be furnished, for £1,100. The house to be completed, and fit for occupation, by the 1st of August, 1858." A prepared the flooring boards, brought them to the premises, and planed and fitted them to the several rooms, but refused to lay them down without extra payment, because the flooring was not mentioned in the specification, whereupon B put an end to the contract, took possession of the works, and, proceeding to complete the building, used the flooring boards so prepared and fitted by B. It was held, first, that A was not entitled to recover work voluntarily done without consulting the owner.¹ If extra work is done, however, independent of the original contract, and is ordered and accepted by the employer, the contractor can recover therefor, upon a quantum meruit,² but where the changes for the flooring as an extra, because it was included in the contract, though not mentioned in the specification. Williams v. Fitzmaurice, 3 H. & N. 844.

Under a contract for construction of a ditch at sixteen cents "per cubic yard of earth or gravel necessarily moved," except a portion between certain points, which is to be at eighteen cents per cubic yard, extra compensation cannot be recovered on the ground that "cement gravel" or hard pan was found between those points, and was not contemplated by the parties in fixing the price. Wilkin v. Ellensburg Water Co., 1 Wash. 236.

Where extra work and material are voluntarily furnished by contractors, with knowledge that the payment therefor must depend upon the action of Congress, they cannot recover, though the extra work may embellish and improve a government building. Merchants' Exchange Co. v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 270.

The employer will be liable for the reasonable worth of extra work ordered by him. Donlin v. Daegling, 80 Ill. 608. But not if the extra work results in the work being done, not better than the contract calls for, but better than it otherwise would have been done. Kinsley v. Charnley, 33 Ill. App. 553.

Where, by reason of failure to complete a building, a balance of the money to be paid for its construction is not recoverable, the contractor may still recover the reasonable value of any extra work. Griffin v. Miner, 54 N. Y. Super. Ct. 46.

The claim for extras is not defeated by a clause in the contract binding the contractor to "furnish all materials and labor," where the plans are altered by the owner; and the fact that, but for extra plumbing ordered by the owner, the building would not have been well plumbed, will not defeat the claim. Cassidy v. Fontham (C. Pl.), 14 N. Y. Supp. 151.

A subcontractor suing an employer for work extra to the original contract, must put in that contract, if in writing, and also prove a separate and distinct contract with the employer to do the work sued for. Eccles v. Southern, 3 F. & F. 142.

A subcontractor cannot recover from the owners of the building for work and labor performed in replacing work rejected by the architect, where the original contract provided that all defective work should be replaced, and there was no promise to pay for such work. Fire Proof Bldg. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 54 N. Y. Super. Ct. 511.

In an action to recover for extra work in erecting a building, where the evidence is conflicting, the court on appeal will not disturb the judgment. Thurber v. Anderson, 35 Ill. App. 628.

A contract for the construction of a building by the plaintiff for the defendant did not refer to any plans as having been drawn or prepared at the date of the contract, and the plaintiff claimed that the contract contemplated the erection of a two-story building instead of the three-story one actually built, and that he was consequently entitled to additional compensation. It was held, on the defendant's denying such claim, that evidence was admissible of the facts existing at the time of the contract, and the circumstances of the parties, and of the building. Doane College v. Lanham, 26 Neb. 421.

In Muckle v. Moore, 134 Pa. St. 608, the question was said to be one for the jury.

A contractor agreed with an incorporated company to do certain works, the contract being under seal. In this contract there was a stipulation that if the company should think proper at any time to make any addition to the original work, the company should be at liberty to do so on giving the contractor written instructions for that are proposed by the contractor, he should notify the employer if they will be attended with any increased cost, and if this is not done, the employer has a right to infer that there will be no increase in the expense.¹ The original contract should be offered in evidence to show that the work was not included therein.²

4. When Impliedly Authorized.—Extra work may be impliedly authorized, as where it is done under the eye of the owner, and to such an extent that he must perceive necessarily that it cannot be done possibly at the contract price,³ but, in order to make him liable on the ground of such approval or assent, he must be purpose, signed by the principal or assistant engineer. A verbal arrangement was afterward made by the principal engineer for the execution of certain extension works, allowing for a variance in the prices, but stipulating that, with the exception of that variance, all the provisions of the contract should be considered as applicable to the extension works. This work was executed by the contractor under this arrangement. It was held that he could not afterward reject the terms of the contract and claim remuneration for the work as upon a quantum meruit, nor could he ask in equity for accounts to be taken, independently of the contract. Ranger v. Great Western R. Co., 5 H. L. Cas. 72.

Where it is impossible to determine what are the rights of the parties to a building contract, or whether the work performed by the contractor came within, or was in excess of, the obligations of his contract, the presumption of law is that it was required by the contract. Crocker v. U. S., 21 Ct. of Cl. 255.

1. Jones v. Woodbury, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 167.

One contracting for the building of a house will not be liable to pay additional compensation for extra work, merely on proof that he ordered it, that it was done, and that he accepted the work when completed, Collyer v. Collins, 17 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 467; unless he be informed, or must be aware, necessarily, from the nature of the work, that the alteration will increase the expense. Lovelock v. King, 1 M. & Rob. 60. And see Simpson v. New York, etc., R. Co., 51 N. Y. Super. Ct. 419.

Where a change in contract work is ordered amid circumstances which imply or warrant the belief that no additional expense will result from the change, it is the duty of the contractor to notify the other party that he cannot make the substitution for the contract price. But where a change is ordered which must necessarily cause increased expense, no such notice is necessary. Gibbons v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 174.

A person who contracted to construct a canal cannot recover as for extra work on account of changes in the specifications and mode of construction, where he made no protest or claim for extra compensation at the time such changes were made. Price v. Kearney Canal, etc., Co., 29 Neb. 33.

Where it was stipulated between A and B that a house should not cost more than four hundred dollars, and, after the work was commenced, A made a calculation, and proposed to B to put extra work upon the house, which would make the whole building cost not over five or six hundred dollars, it was held that this amounted to an agreement that if B would permit the extra work to be put on the house, A would not charge more than six hundred dollars for the entire work. Britney v. Bolding, 28 Miss. 53.

2. Eccles v. Southern, 3 F. & F. 142. In Cook County v. Harms, 10 Ill. App. 24, the plaintiff began work under a building contract containing a provision for pay for extra work caused by a change of plan. After the work was begun another plan was adopted, in accordance with which the work was finished. Upon a suit, the question was as to whether the original contract was rescinded. It was held that this was a question for the jury; that the contract should have been produced at the trial; and that it was error to allow the plaintiff to state what work was within its terms.

apprised from the nature of the work that it will be attended with increased cost.¹

5. Necessary Extra Work.—Where the extra work is absolutely necessary to the prosecution of the undertaking,² or is rendered necessary by the failure of the employer to perform his portion of the agreement,³ or results from an error of the superintendent under whose direction the work is being done,⁴

A party cannot recover for extra work or better materials than those specified in his contract, if he had not the authority of the other party therefor. But in a suit against the government, such authority will be implied where the officers of the quartermaster department, charged with the supervision of the work, saw and knew of the extra work in time to object and stop it, but, instead of doing so, received and accepted the benefit of it for the government; and where charges ordered by them necessarily imply an increased price, the contractor may recover therefor. Cooper v. U. S., 8 Ct. of Cl. 199.

2. As where, in the construction of a tunnel, rock should fall from the roof, or it should become necessary to remove dangerous rock outside the lines of the tunnel. Seymour v. Long Dock Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 396. See Voorhis v. New York, 62 N. Y. 498.

Extra excavations for foundations, caused by peculiarities in the soil, unknown to either the plaintiff or defendant at the time the contract was signed, constitute extra work. Anderson v. Meislahn, 12 Daly (N. Y.) 149. Compare Gustavson v. McGay, 12 Daly (N. Y.) 423.

Where a contractor, under a contract made with a city for grading and paving an avenue, finds it necessary, in order to so grade and pave the street, to do certain extra work and to furnish extra materials not expressed in his contract, he can recover from the city for the value of such work. Riley v. Brooklyn, 56 Barb. (N. Y.) 559.

In an action upon a contract for building a bridge, the plaintiff sought to recover for extra expenditure occasioned by the necessity for the use of cofferdams, not contemplated by either of the parties to the contract at the time it was entered into. It was held that the rights of the parties should be determined by the contract, and that equity would not afford relief therefrom. Owens v. Butler County, 40 Iowa 190.

3. For any additional expense incurred in consequence of the party being obliged to do the work under disadvantageous circumstances, occasioned by the opposite party, he is entitled to an allowance. Dubois v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 285.

Where the defendant, in a contract by the plaintiff to build for him an extension to a water tower, agreed to maintain the water at any height desired for the convenience of the workmen, but failed to do so, whereby it became necessary for the plaintiff either to erect scaffolding or to abandon the work, the plaintiff might erect the scaffolding, even against defendant's will, and recover therefor as for extra work. Nason Mfg. Co. v. Stephens (Supreme Ct.), 3 N. Y. Supp. 303.

Where extra work in laying the foundations of a building was made necessary by the failure of the employer to properly grade the location as required by the contract, the contractor will be entitled to recover from the owner for such extra work. Becker v. National Prohibition Park Co., 69 Hun (N. Y.) 55.

4. The superintendent is the special agent of the employer, and if measurements and calculations made by him are not correct, and extra and unnecessary work and expenditure should result, the loss should not fall on the contractor, but on the employer. Seymour v. Long Dock Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 396.

Where a government contract provides that the work done and the materials furnished shall be subject to the inspection of a certain officer, who shall have full power to reject any work or materials which in his opinion do not conform to the plans and specifications of the contract, the contractor can have no extra claim against the government for work done and materials furnished under the requirements of such officer, or for delay in the work or from a change in the plans, the contractor may recover therefor.¹

6. Effect on Contract.—Additions and alterations do not amount to a waiver of the contract, unless it be abandoned so entirely that it is impossible to trace it and say to what part of the work it shall be applied.²

7. Rate of Remuneration.—The rate of charge for the extra work should be governed by the prices fixed in the original contract, in so far, at least, as they can be made to apply;³ but if the extra work is of such a character that its value cannot be fixed by the prices agreed to be paid in the contract, a different rule will prevail, and the recovery will be according to its value.⁴

caused by such requirements, where the officer made his requirements in good faith, in order to compel the execution of the contract as he understood it, and the contractor failed to make, at the time, any claim for extra compensation for work or material which he now insists were outside of the contract. Bowe v. U. S., 42 Fed. Rep. 761.

Defective Plans.—The owner is liable for alterations rendered necessary by defective plans. Erskine v. Johnson, 23 Neb. 261.

1. Wood v. Ft. Wayne, 119 U. S. 312.

2. It is held still to exist, and to be binding on the parties as far as it can be followed. McKinney v. Springer, 3 Ind. 59; 54 Am. Dec. 470. And see Pattison v. Luckley, L. R., 10 Exch. 330; 44 L. J. Exch. 180; 33 L. T. 360; 24 W. R. 224.

The measure of compensation should be graduated by the terms of the contract so far as the work can be traced under it. DeBoom v. Priestly, 1 Cal. 206.

Where work is done under a special contract, at estimated prices, and there is a deviation from the original plan by the consent of the parties, the estimate is to be the rule of payment as far as the special contract can be traced, and, for the extra labor, the party is entitled to his quantum meruit. Dubois v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 285.

In McSorley v. Prague, 137 N. Y. 546, the plaintiff contracted to do certain plumbing for a certain sum, no mention being made of double plumbing, but the contract providing that the defendant might require any alteration in, or addition to, the contract, the reasonable valuation thereof to be added or deducted, as the case might be. The parties had made another contract previously, which had been surrendered, by which the plaintiff was to have three hundred dollars extra for every house in which double plumbing should be ordered. It was held that the plaintiff could recover an extra sum for double plumbing ordered by the defendant, and, in the absence of other proof, the reasonable value of such extra work might be taken to be the amount fixed by the parties in their former agreement.

Where by the terms of a building contract extra work is to be estimated in proportion to the contract price of the entire work, evidence of the reasonable value of the extra work is not admissible. Eigemann v. Posey County, 82 Ind. 413.

In McCormick v. Connolly, 2 Bay (S. Car.) 401, it was held that extras should be paid for at a reasonable valuation. And see Elgin v. Joslyn, 136 Ill. 525, where it was held that although a contract provides that extra work is to be paid for according to a schedule of prices fixed therein for extra work of a different character from that specified, the contractor will be entitled to be paid what it is shown to be reasonably worth.

4. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Vosburgh, 45 Ill. 311.

Where a contractor was directed to sink the foundations of a certain building three feet deeper than the depth agreed on in the contract between himself and the United States, and, in

IX. ARBITRATION.—Where the parties to a working contract agree to submit all matters in dispute to the architect or engineer and to be bound by his decision, the general rules applicable to arbitration apply,¹ and his decision, in the absence of fraud, is final.² But the arbitrator must be disinterested, and where an architect, to whom it is agreed to submit all disputes as to the answer to the letter of the defendant's agent, replied that the additional costs would be $1,350, but the extra work was actually done at a cost of $160, it was held that he was entitled to recover only the actual expense and a reasonable profit of ten per cent. Murphy v. U. S., 13 Ct. of Cl. 372.

Where a contract authorizes a superintendent to order alterations and additions to the building, provided that he agree beforehand upon the price, and he orders some, for which he makes an estimate, but the contractors refuse to make them for that price, offering, however, to make them for their actual cost, if he allows them to proceed in that understanding, they may recover therefor. Merchants' Exchange Co. v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 270.

Where there is an agreement to refer a question of amount due for work to an engineer, and to exclude the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals till an award shall be made by him, it will be valid. Scott v. Liverpool Corp., 4 Jur. N. S. 402; 27 L. J. Ch. 641.

A clause in a building contract providing that the valuations, certificates, orders, and awards of the arbitrator appointed thereunder should be final and binding, and should not be set aside for any pretense, charge, suggestion, or insinuation of fraud, collusion, or confederacy, is not obnoxious to public policy, for, in the absence of fraud on the part of the parties to the contract, it was competent to them to agree not to raise any question in the arbitrator. Tullis v. Jacson (1892), 3 Ch. 441.

Where the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to build him a house, and that after it should be built, they should disagree as to the plaintiff's bill, and two workmen should be selected to value the work, and they were selected and did value it, the court refused to instruct the jury that the action ought to have been brought on the special agreement. Mudd v. Mudd, 3 Har. & J. (Md.) 438.

McGreevy*, 18 Can. Supreme Ct. 609; Stevenson v. Watson, 4 C. P. Div. 148; Tullis v. Jacson (1892), 3 Ch. 441.

The architect or superintendent, in granting or refusing the certificates of approval, or in estimating and classifying the work, acts as an arbitrator, and his decision, in the absence of fraud or gross error, is conclusive. See supra, this title, Certificates of Approval, and infra, this title, Payment Upon Estimate or Classification of Engineer.

Where the parties to a contract for the construction of a railroad agreed to submit to a civil engineer, in charge, disputes as to the meaning of the contract, or the sufficiency of work done under it, or the price to be paid, they are bound by the decision of such engineer. O'Donnell v. Henry, 44 La. Ann. 845. And where by contract an award of the architect is final, and is made fairly and impartially, the court will not relieve against it, however severe it may be in its effect; but where the arbitrator is found guilty of unfairness or partiality, the court will relieve against his award. Ormes v. Beadel, 2 Giff. 166; affirmed 30 L. J. Ch. 1; 9 W. R. 25; 3 L. T. N. S. 344.

Under a contract for railroad construction work, making the decision of the chief engineer conclusive as to any dispute between the parties, and providing that such decision shall be in value of work, has guarantied the owner, unknown to the contractor, that the total cost shall not exceed a specified sum, the contractor is not bound by the submission.¹ Where the contract is so framed as to make the reference of disputes to arbitration a condition precedent to recovery, no action will lie by a contractor upon a claim which he refuses to so submit;² but the employer the nature of an award, it is not necessary that the engineer's written decision be signed by him also before it becomes binding on the parties. Malone v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 157 Pa. St. 430.

The contract under which the defendant undertook to erect a building provided that any disagreement or difference between the owners and the contractor, as to the kind or quality of the work required, should be determined by the engineers and architects, whose decision should be final and conclusive. The defendant let the plastering of the building to the plaintiff, under a contract which adopted, as between them, all the terms and requirements of the original contract. It was held that the arbitration clause was likewise adopted, and the plaintiff thereby waived any right to an action arising out of disputes as to the quality of the plastering, except his action on the architect's award. Brown v. Decker, 142 Pa. St. 640.

But the decision of the arbitrator is only final as to those matters agreed to be submitted to him. Thus, where, by the contract, it was provided that if any dispute or difference should arise with the contractors in any way relating to the contract, or if any question should arise between any of the several contractors relating to the proposed building, such dispute, difference, or question should be settled by the architect, whose decision should be absolute and final, the condition was held to apply only to disputes as to the mode of carrying on the several works, and not to differences between the contractors and their employers as to their claim for extras. Pashby v. Birmingham, 18 C. B. 2; 86 E. C. L. 2.

The provision of a railroad contract that the decision of the engineer shall be final and conclusive in any dispute which may rise between the parties relative to the same, does not include within its terms of submission damages happening to the plaintiff from a rescission of the contract. McGovern v. Bockius, 10 Phila. (Pa.) 438.

Though a building contract provided that any dispute as to the construction of the specifications should be decided by the architect, his letter to the contractor, at a time when there had been no dispute as to the specifications in regard to the mixing of the plaster, complaining of the manner in which the work was being done, and directing him to follow the superintendent's instructions, does not authorize him to follow the instructions of the superintendent directing a mixture of plaster inferior to that fixed by the specifications. Fitzgerald v. Moran, 141 N. Y. 419.

Parol Alteration of Contract.—Where a written contract for railroad construction work has been modified materially by a subsequent parol agreement, a decision of the chief engineer, made by the written contract the final arbiter of disputes between the parties, cannot stand if he entirely ignores the parol agreement. Malone v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 157 Pa. St. 430.

1. A building contract contained a clause appointing the architect arbitrator in respect of extra works; the architect had guarantied to his employer, unknown to the builder, that the total cost should not exceed a specified sum, and it was held that the guaranty was a material fact tending to influence the architect's decision, and, as it was not disclosed to the builder, he was not bound by the submission to the architect's arbitration, and the court would perform the part of arbitrator in the matter. Kimberley v. Dick, L. R., 13 Eq. 1; 41 L. J. Ch. 38; 25 L. T. N. S. 476; 20 W. R. 49.

But the fact that an engineer, to whose decision matters in dispute are referred, is a stockholder in the railroad, is immaterial. Williams v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 112 Mo. 463.

2. Ball v. Doud (Oregon, 1894), 37 Pac. Rep. 70. And see Mayers v. Soady, L. R., 18 Ir. 499.

An agreement to refer does not bar a suit in law or equity, unless the contract is so framed as to make the may waive his right to insist upon an arbitration by defending upon other grounds.¹

X. SURETIES.—The rules of law governing sureties generally apply to sureties in working contracts,² and any material alterareference a condition precedent. In such case a reference must be alleged in the declaration, or an excuse for the want of it. Smith v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 36 N. H. 458.

In Fulton v. Peters, 137 Pa. St. 613, it was held that where the contract provided for the submission of all disputes as to the quality or quantity of the work to the superintendent, whose decision should be final, the contractor could not recover a disputed claim which he refused to submit to the superintendent.

If the parties to a contract provide that any dispute which may arise between them, in reference to the subject-matter of the contract, shall be determined by a person therein named, whose decision shall be final, no action can be sustained at law in reference to matters embraced in the prospective submission. But in order to oust the courts of their jurisdiction, it must appear clearly that the subject-matter of the controversy was within the prospective submission. The right of trial by jury is not to be taken away by implication. Lauman v. Young, 31 Pa. St. 306.

But see Cole Mfg. Co. v. Collier, 91 Tenn. 525, where the fact that the parties to the contract had provided that all differences arising between them "as to the quality of work or material, or other questions arising under the contract, should be settled by arbitration," was held to constitute no bar to a suit brought upon the original contract by a party who had failed or refused to make an effort for settlement by arbitration.

Where extras are furnished under a building contract providing that the value of such extras, if disputed, should be ascertained by arbitration, and that the last installment of the contract price should be retained by the owner for thirty-five days after the completion of the building, to cover liens, etc., the last installment cannot be recovered till its amount is fixed by arbitration. Ball v. Doud (Oregon, 1894), 37 Pac. Rep. 70. But a provision for arbitration does not apply where the owner refuses to pay for the work on the ground that the contract has not been substantially performed. Oberlies v. Bullinger (Supreme Ct.), 27 N. Y. Supp. 19; 75 Hun (N. Y.) 248; Gallagher v. Sharpless, 134 Pa. St. 134.

The contractor may sue for the value of the work in the absence of evidence that the employer took steps for the selection of arbitrators. Williams v. Shields (C. Pl.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 502.

When a building contract provides that all disputes as to the construction of the work shall be settled by the architect, and all disputes as to the value of extra work and omitted work shall be settled by arbitration, and the owner refuses to allow the contractor to proceed with the work, such provision ceases to be operative, and the contractor may bring an action for the value of the work done and materials furnished. Velsor v. Eaton (Supreme Ct.), 14 N. Y. Supp. 467.

1. A clause in a building contract provided that, should the contractors and a building committee named disagree as to the quality of material, or the proper construction of any part of the building to be erected, then the architect should decide the issue. In a proceeding to enforce a lien claimed by the contractors, the defendants failed to set up said clause in abatement of the action, but interposed pleas involving a consideration before the jury of the entire merits of the controversy, and proceeded to trial on the issues presented without insisting on the decision of the architect, and without raising any objection to the plaintiffs' testimony. It was held that the right to an adjustment of the differences by the architect was waived. Summerlin v. Thompson, 31 Fla. 369.

2. See SURETYSHIP, vol. 24, p. 714; GUARANTY, vol. 9, p. 67. And see Blossom v. Farnham, Clarke's Ch. (N. Y.) 158; Andrews v. Lawrence, 19 C. B. N. S. 768; 115 E. C. L. 768.

The agreement of suretyship is invalid if entered into after the working contract and without any new consideration. La Fayette Mut. Bldg. Assoc. v. Kleinhoffer, 40 Mo. App. 388.

And if a surety promises that the principal shall pay for work, a workman cannot recover from him unless it

tion of the contract without the assent of the surety will discharge him from liability.¹ But the surety in a bond given by the contractor for the benefit of laborers and material men having liens upon the work, is not discharged by any agreement or act of the owner or nominal obligee.²

XI. BANKRUPTCY OF CONTRACTOR.—Upon the bankruptcy of the contractor, his contracts, unless of a nature personal to him and appears that he knew of the agreement before the performance of the labor. Ball v. Newton, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 599.

Consideration.—Where the plaintiff working under a contract was coerced by the defendant, under threats of stopping the work, into giving a guaranty not included in the original contract, failure thereof could not be pleaded to a suit on the original contract, there being no consideration therefor. McCarty v. Hampton Bldg. Assoc., 61 Iowa 287.

1. Berks County v. Ross, 3 Binn. (Pa.) 520.

If the owner fails to insure the property as agreed, the surety is discharged. Watts v. Shuttleworth, 5 H. & N. 235; 29 L. J. Exch. 229. And so if he makes advances to the builder in excess of those provided for in the contract. General Steam Nav. Co. v. Rolt, 6 C. B. N. S. 550; 95 E. C. L. 550; Gordon v. Rae, 8 El. & Bl. 1065; 92 E. C. L. 1065; 27 L. J. Q. B. 185; Simonson v. Grant, 36 Minn. 439. It is immaterial that the alteration is for the benefit of the surety, Weir Plow Co. v. Walmsley, 110 Ind. 242; and he has been held discharged where the contract was altered by increasing the compensation to be paid the contractor. Warden v. Ryan, 37 Mo. App. 466.

A contract and bond executed by contractors and their sureties with the commissioners of a county, some of the provisions of which were not in accord with a former order of the county commissioners' court which referred to the contract, cannot be avoided by the contractor and sureties who thus assented to a disregard of the prior order. Miliken v. Callahan County, 69 Tex. 205.

Where a contract for the building of a hall provided for changes in the plans, and for extra pay therefor to be either mutually agreed upon or referred to arbitrators before the changes were made, it was held that the owner, in ordering changes but refusing to have the price fixed, waived the provision therefor; and that the change, etc., released the sureties on the contractor's bond. Truckee Lodge v. Wood, 14 Nev. 293.

The surety will be discharged pro tanto where payments are made without the engineer's certificates as required by the contract. Brennan v. Clark, 29 Neb. 385. Where the contract allows alterations to be made, a surety will not be discharged by alterations. Hayden v. Cook, 34 Neb. 670; McLennan v. Wellington, 48 Kan. 756; Moore v. Fountain (Miss. 1891), 8 So. Rep. 509.

It has been held that the surety was not discharged where the contractor consented to minor changes without binding himself to perform them. Henricus v. Englert, 63 Hun (N. Y.) 625. Nor where one of two contractors assigned to the other without notice to the surety. Abbott v. Morrisette, 46 Minn. 10. Nor where payments were made before the expiration of the time for filing liens. Hayden v. Cook, 34 Neb. 670. Nor where the fronting of a building was changed, the sureties never having seen the original plans. Dorsey v. McGee, 30 Neb. 657. The payment of a contractor in full upon the completion of the contract will not discharge a surety. Duluth v. Heney, 43 Minn. 155. Nor will the fact that the owner paid the contractor without retaining enough to cover the claims of lien men, though allowed by the contract to do so. Casey v. Gunn, 29 Mo. App. 49. Nor is he released by the payment of contractors who have fraudulently concealed defective work. Kingston-upon-Hull v. Harding (1892), 2 Q. B. 404.

Where by a contract certain disputes are to be submitted to arbitration, and other matters are afterward included in the submission without the knowledge or assent of the surety, he will not be bound by it. Cooke v. Odd-fellows' Fraternal Union (Supreme Ct.), 1 N. Y. Supp. 498.

2. Conn v. State, 125 Ind. 514.

The act of the owner extending the depending upon his peculiar skill and fitness, pass, along with all his property, to the assignee, subject to existing liens.¹

XII. ASSIGNMENT OF CONTRACT.—A beneficial interest in a working contract may be assigned by the party engaging to perform the work and labor, so as to entitle the assignee to recover the contract price upon the fulfillment of the contract by the assignor,² but the employer is not liable to the assignee for money paid under the contract to the original contractor before he is notified of the assignment.³

XIII. RESCISSION.—The rules of law touching the rescission of contracts generally apply to working contracts, which may be time for the completion of the building does not affect the obligation of such sureties. Steffes v. Lemke, 40 Minn. 27.

1. Avery v. Hackley, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 407; Emden v. Carte, 17 Ch. Div. 768. And see Taff Vale R. Co. v. Nixon, 1 H. L. Cas. 111; also BANKRUPTCY, vol. 2, p. 67. And, as we have seen, provisions for a forfeiture of the contract will not be allowed to operate in fraud of the bankrupt laws. See supra, this title, Penalties and Forfeitures.

2. Bates v. B. B. Richards Lumber Co., 56 Minn. 14; McPhee v. Young, 13 Colo. 80; Drew v. Josolyne, 18 Q. B. Div. 590; 56 L. J. Q. B. 490; Aspinall v. London, etc., R. Co., 11 Hare 325; Tyner v. Scofield, 11 Ind. 550; Smith v. Mayberry, 13 Nev. 427. But one cannot assign his contract to work for another. Thus, if A agree to work for B, the latter is not obliged to receive the services of another. Robson v. Drummond, 2 B. & Ad. 303; 22 E. C. L. 81. An agreement by A to work for B cannot be assigned so as to compel A to work for C, yet a contract to work for B or bearer may be. Haskell v. Blair, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 534.

A and B having entered into a joint agreement with a railway company to execute a contract for the construction of a tunnel upon the line, A assigned all his right and interest in the contract to B, and the latter agreed to pay A a given sum on the completion of the contract. After this agreement had been entered into, it became necessary to alter the levels of the line, and B, by agreement with the company, abandoned the contract, and another was entered into between the company and other persons, under which the tunnel at the altered level was completed; and it was held that A was not in a position, upon the completion of the substituted contract, to maintain an action against B for the payment of the sum stipulated to be paid by his agreement. Humphreys v. Jones, 5 Exch. 952; 20 L. J. Exch. 88.

A provision in a building contract that the contractor should not, without the written consent of the owner, assign any of the moneys, payable thereunder, under penalty of forfeiture, etc., is for the benefit and protection of the owner alone, against the dereliction or insolvency of the contractor. If an installment of the moneys not yet due be assigned to material men, and notice thereof given to the owner without his exception, subsequent creditors of the contractor can derive no advantage therefrom. Burnett v. Jersey City, 31 N. J. Eq. 341.

A assigned to B a contract to build a railroad, partially performed by A, and B assumed debts therein incurred by A, not exceeding ten thousand dollars. B paid more than this amount, without paying the whole indebtedness, and it was held that the unpaid creditors had no right of action against B; not even C, whose claim B had specifically promised to pay, the promise being without consideration. Odell v. Mulry, 9 Daly (N. Y.) 381.

Notice of Assignment.—Where notice of the assignment of a building contract, written in the English language, is given to one who does not read or write English, the notice, in order to be effectual, must be sufficient, precise, and complete enough to put the defendant fully on his guard as to the fact of such assignment and to make him understand it. Whether notice is given or not, and if given whether it is sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry, is a question of fact. Renton v. Monnier, 77 Cal. 449.

waived, canceled, or rescinded by agreement of the parties,¹ and it is frequently provided that upon default of the contractor the employer may rescind the contract and enter and complete the work.² Upon the mutual rescission of the contract, the workman may recover the value of the work performed upon a quantum meruit, if used by the employer and of value to him.³

XIV. PAYMENT—(See PAYMENT, vol. 18, p. 148)—1. Generally.—Upon the completion of the work the contractor is entitled to payment therefor at the rate of compensation specified in

1. See RESCISSION, vol. 21, p. 24; Badders v. Davis, 88 Ala. 367.

The exercise of a right of election to rescind a building agreement must be signified in an unqualified manner and within a reasonable time, or, at all events, not after the other party to the agreement has gone to expense in the belief of the right of election not being exercised. The party rescinding the contract is not entitled to make entry on the premises, for the purpose of removing the goods, after the date of rescission. Marsden v. Sambell, 43 L. T. 120; 28 W. R. 952.

Where A agreed to employ B to superintend a specific work at a specific time, and B, though knowing that the work had been let out to contractors, took no steps under the contract, he was held to have rescinded it. Wehrli v. Rehwooldt, 107 Ill. 60.

The plaintiffs, trustees of a school district, contracted with the defendant, in writing, to build for them a school-house, and authorized S., one of the plaintiffs, to superintend the construction. After the work had been partly performed, the defendant abandoned it. To an action by the plaintiffs for damages for breach of the contract, the defendant set up as a defense that he had been discharged from the contract by the said S. It was held that the discharge by S. without the knowledge or consent of his co-trustees rescinded the contract. Schofield v. McGregor, 1 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 404.

Where it is stipulated in a building contract that, on failure of the contractor to pay for labor and material, the owner may refuse to pay certain installments, otherwise payable, such refusal is no evidence of an abandonment of the contract; nor is it evidence of abandonment that, upon the refusal of the builder to complete the work, the owner has had the work finished. Casey v. Gunn, 29 Mo. App. 14.

2. Henderson Bridge Co. v. O'Connor, 88 Ky. 303; Harder v. Marion County, 97 Ind. 455. And see supra, this title, Forfeitures; Lawrence v. Dale, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 23.

If a contractor stipulates to build and finish a house by a certain day, and at the expiration of the time he has not commenced the work, the other party may rescind the contract. Miller v. Phillips, 31 Pa. St. 218.

Where one party to a building contract, on demand of the other, made only a qualified refusal to fulfill, it was held that before the latter could insist on a forfeiture, he was bound to give the former an opportunity to comply with the demand, after notice that a failure to do so would be treated as a rescission. Davison v. Jersey Co. Associates, 71 N. Y. 333.

Waiver of Right to Rescind.—By accepting an electric light plant constructed for it, before it is entirely completed, and by making use thereof, the company for which it is constructed waives its right to rescind for failure to entirely complete the plant. Flourance Gas, etc., Power Co. v. Hanby (Ala. 1893), 13 So. Rep. 343.

3. Kirkland v. Oates, 25 Ala. 465; Prince v. Thomas, 15 Ark. 378. But see Curtis v. Smith, 48 Vt. 116.

Where a contract has been rescinded by one of the parties thereto, after the same has been in part performed by the other party, the former is not entitled to the benefit of any stipulation contained in such contract, as to the method in which the amount of compensation to be paid to the latter is to be determined, so as to prevent the latter from recovering upon a quantum meruit for the work done by him previous to the rescission of the contract; but the amount of compensation for the work actually done is to be ascertained by a reference to the prices which the parties themselves have fixed the contract,¹ or if no rate be specified, then to a reasonable compensation.² The time of payment may be regulated by in their contract. Clark v. New York, 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 288.

1. S. submitted to the State of New York proposals to furnish the labor and various materials required to erect a quarantine structure in New York harbor, specifying the prices for specific quantities, etc. Afterward S. contracted with the state to erect the structure for $252,491, "being the aggregate cost of the construction of the said exterior walls and foundation at the prices specified in the said proposals." It was held that this statement of the cost was intended only as an estimate, and did not conclude either party as to what the actual cost would be, it being intended to pay the specified prices for such materials and labor as should be actually furnished. Swift v. New York, 26 Hun (N. Y.) 508; reversed, by Court of Appeals, 89 N. Y. 52.

A contracted to build a "rip-rap" wall for B at fifty cents per cubic yard, and, in the absence of proof of any general usage or uniform custom which could control the mode of measurement, it was held that the terms used implied pay by the cubic yard, for the "rip-rap," after the stone was fitted and laid in the wall. Wood v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 24 Vt. 608.

A contract stipulating for the payment of a certain rate "per square yard" for the removal of dirt, means cubic yard. Louisville v. Hyatt, 2 B. Mon. (Ky.) 177.

Where the terms of a contract for the payment of money for work are ambiguous, they will be interpreted most strongly against the promisor of the money, the work having been done. Gantz v. District of Columbia, 18 Ct. of Cl. 569.

Where a written contract to fill in a trestle on a railroad track provides for compensation by the cubic yard of dirt, the contractor cannot recover for the space occupied by a brick culvert constructed by the company under the trestle. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Matthews, 85 Ga. 457.

In Smith v. Molleson, 74 Hun (N. Y.) 606, the plaintiff let a contract to one M. to do the stonework on a building, providing for monthly payments, not to exceed eighty per cent. of the estimated value of "the work performed on the building." The most expensive part of such work was quarrying and dressing the stone before it was put in the building, and it was held that the contract intended that the payments to M. should be based on the stone prepared for the building, as well as that actually put in.

A building contractor who has arranged with a subcontractor for materials for fireplaces, to be estimated at a certain price for each fireplace, the owner of the building to "have the privilege of selecting all these materials within the above figures," is entitled, in settling with the subcontractor, to a credit for the amount by which such estimated price exceeds the price of fireplace materials selected by the owner and actually used. Harrison v. Reeves, 160 Pa. St. 134.

Where a building contract provides that the contractor shall receive as compensation the cost of labor and material used in the building, "and ten per cent. added thereto as profit," the amounts paid by the contractor on subcontracts for various portions of the work, including the customary profits of the subcontractors, will be considered as "the cost of labor and material" in estimating the amount due to the contractor. Hamilton v. Coogan (C. Pl.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 21; 7 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 677. And see Ford v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 54 Iowa 723.

Payment Upon Test of Work.—The last installment under the contract for the construction of a dock was to be paid after a satisfactory test with a vessel to be furnished by the government and approved by the contractors within a specified time. The offer of one vessel approved by the contractors was withdrawn, and others were offered and were not approved, because they were not of the class contemplated by the parties when the contract was made, and no test was made. It was held that the contractors, on making formal tender of the dock after the time for a test had expired, were entitled to such last installment. International Bow, etc., Dock Co. v. U. S., 60 Fed. Rep. 523.

board to perform work and labor for whatever "recompense the board might allow as right and proper," an action will lie to recover a reasonable recompense, although the board tenders what they consider right and proper. Bird v. M'Gahey, 2 C. & K. 707; 61 E. C. L. 707.

1. Under an agreement to pay a certain sum on the completion of work, and the remainder of the price within sixty days thereafter, without interest, a further provision that, if such remainder is not paid within six months after the work is completed, a specified rate of interest shall be paid thereon, does not prevent the debt from falling due at the end of sixty days. Cook v. McCabe, 53 Wis. 250; 40 Am. Rep. 765.

One who agrees to pay for work done on a structure when it shall be sold, is entitled to credit for a reasonable time for selling; after expiration of this, he may be held liable, although no rule has been made. Williston v. Perkins, 51 Cal. 554.

Where no time is fixed for payment, the contractor cannot require payment until the completion of the contract. Boody v. Rutland, etc., R. Co., 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 25.

A stipulation in a building contract, that, on completion of the work, half the price should be paid in the owner's three notes for one, two, and three years respectively, being for the builder's benefit, may be waived by him; and at the end of a period for which a note was to run, and upon non-payment of the corresponding sum, he may maintain an action therefor against the owner or his legal representatives, but no earlier. Bannister v. Patty, 35 Wis. 215.

A contract for the construction of waterworks for a village provided that an estimate should be made each month of the value of the labor and materials, and all work completed, up to the first day of the month, and ninety per cent. of the contract price of such completed work paid to the contractor. It was held that the word "completed" did not mean "entirely completed," but the contractor was entitled to an estimate of, and payment for, any work of which a material and substantial part had been performed. DeLafield v. Westfield (Supreme Ct.), 28 N. Y. Supp. 440; 77 Hun (N. Y.) 124.

A stipulation in a contract for building a county courthouse that the county should pay eighty-five per cent. "on the amount of material furnished on the grounds, and the work done on the building, on the first of each month, as the work progressed," does not restrict the payments to be made by the county so that they shall at no time aggregate more than eighty-five per cent. of the amount bearing the same proportion to the total contract price as the amount of the materials then furnished and the work then done might bear to the total amount of the work and materials necessary to complete the contract. Howard County v. Baker, 119 Mo. 397.

Bond to Indemnify Against Liens.—Under Missouri Rev. Stat., § 3725, allowing specialties to be impeached for want of consideration, where a builder gave a bond, two months after the signing of the building contract, to the owner, to indemnify him against mechanics' liens, it was a mere gratuity, there being no new consideration. Ring v. Kelly, 10 Mo. App. 411.

The fact that no claims were filed under the mechanic's lien law within one year after the filing of the contract, which is the limit provided by statute, afforded the required evidence. *Wallis Iron Works v. A building contract containing an agreement that the contractors would hold G. harmless from liens for labor and materials, was not broken by the mere existence of unpaid claims, for which no proper acts have been performed to perfect a lien. Simonson v. Grant, 36 Minn. 439.

Where, by the terms of a building contract, the owner agrees with the contractor to convey to him certain real property on the final completion of the building, but the contractor makes default in payment for materials used, so that the building becomes incumbered with liens, the owner is not bound to make such conveyance until the liens are discharged, but may hold the property for his security. Erickson v. Brandt, 53 Minn. 10.

Where a building contract provided that seventy-five per cent. of the contract price should be paid on weekly estimates of the architect, the remainder to be retained until the building should be completed and accepted, and satisfactory evidence furnished that no claims existed, it was held that such evidence was not required on the weekly payments and only on the final one. Leavel v. Porter, 52 Mo. App. 632.

1. See PAYMENT, vol. 18, p. 163.

Where one proposes to do work and furnish material for another at a certain rate gold, or a certain other rate currency, which proposal is accepted, an option as to mode of payment is created. The first right to exercise such option belongs to the party who is to make such payment, provided he makes it before he is in default for such payment, and if he so makes such option he binds both parties to the contract. Stephens v. Howe, 34 N. Y. Super. Ct. 133.

2. Titus v. Cairo, etc., R. Co., 46 N. J. L. 393, where payment for the construction of a railroad was to be made in bonds of the company. And see Holly Mfg. Co. v. New Chester Water Co., 48 Fed. Rep. 879; Sample v. Pickens, 1 Smed. & M. Ch. (Miss.) 501, where it was to be in the notes of a particular bank.

Where two men agreed to perform a piece of work on a railroad, upon the same terms of payment as the original contractor, one of whom was to receive twenty per cent. in stock at par, but, a third person being substituted in place of one of them, the other agreed to pay him his share of the above provision, it was held that he was bound to pay in cash, and a tender of half the stock was insufficient. Knapp v. Levanway, 27 Vt. 298.

It was competent for the parties to a written building contract providing for payment only in cash, to afterward agree, orally, that the amount of a note made by the builder and held by the other party should be paid thereon, by delivering up and canceling the note; and thereafter, as soon as work enough is done under the contract to pay such note, the note in the hands of such holder would thereby be satisfied; and, if the note has not become due when the work was completed, the new agreement would operate to extend the time of payment on the building contract until the note matured, and the builder could not, in the meantime, maintain an action for the money due upon the contract; nor could he, by suspending work on his contract, defeat this new agreement to the extent of the money earned. Roberts v. Wilkinson, 34 Mich. 129.

Where a building contractor was to receive as part payment an eight per cent. mortgage running six years, an offer to show, in defense to his action, that by reason of his failure to complete the contract in season the employers were compelled to borrow money at a higher rate to complete it themselves, is not sufficiently specific, in the absence of any proposal to show that the current rates for six year loans were higher than eight per cent. to warrant its reception as a basis for estimating damages. Friedland v. McNeil, 33 Mich. 40.

A contractor who agrees to take some of the buildings he erects in part payment for his work may sell them before all the work is done. McPherson v. Walton, 42 N. J. Eq. 282.

A contractor with a company who, by his contract, is bound at the option of the company to accept payment to a certain amount in shares, cannot, after the company has been ordered to wind up, be called upon to accept payment in shares, the option not having been exercised till after the winding up. Ex p. Sharon, 12 Jur. N. S. 482; 14 W. R. 855.

Where a contract for the building of a railroad provided that until five hundred thousand dollars should be realized by subscription or from the sale of the securities, the contractor might make necessary purchases and contracts on the credit of the company, but that he should be paid for his work only in the stock and bonds of the company, it was

3. Payment Upon Estimate or Classification of Engineer.—Where the contract provides that the employer's engineer or superintendent shall measure and classify the several kinds of work done, and that payment shall be made upon his calculations and estimates, the valuation of the superintendent, and his classification of the work, is, in the absence of fraud, gross error, or mistake, conclusive upon the parties,¹ subcontractors held that the contractor was not entitled to cash from the company to the extent of five hundred thousand dollars to aid in the work, nor to an allowance for the discount at which he should be compelled, for the purpose of raising funds, to dispose of the stock and bonds issued to him. Wood v. Boney (N. J. 1891), 21 Atl. Rep. 574.

Payment in Tax Assessments.—A city contractor who agrees to take pay in tax bills, may, if the tax bills prove to be invalid, bring suit to recover the contract price for the work done, without returning the void bills and demanding others. Fisher v. St. Louis, 44 Mo. 482.

But where a contractor for the construction of a railroad for the defendant, agreed to collect and receive in part payment a certain sum from a township tax voted by the people of the township, or from certain subscriptions to stock that had been made, to entitle him to recover he must show proper effort and diligence to collect either from the subscription or tax, or some excuse for not doing so. Arnold v. River R. Constr. Co., 35 Iowa 99.

Where a contractor contracts to make payment to one from whom he purchases material, in transferred street assessments to be issued to him by the city for his work, it is no defense to an action for the price of the material furnished him that when the payment became due he was unable to transfer the assessments because of the city's failure to issue them, since he binds himself at his own risk, for the act of the city. Hughes v. Eschback, 7 D. C. 66.

Provisions in a railroad construction contract making the contractor's compensation depend upon the opinion or award of a person in the employ of the company, may, though severe and highly penal, be enforced. Phelan v. Albany, etc., R. Co., 1 Lans. (N. Y.) 258.

The estimate is binding on both parties unless based on wrong views of the contract. Alton, etc., R. Co. v. Northcott, 15 Ill. 49. And see McAvoy v. Long, 13 Ill. 147.

In Price v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 38 Fed. Rep. 304, the work was done under the supervision of an assistant engineer, who each month forwarded his estimates to the chief engineer, who paid the plaintiffs, the principal contractors, monthly on the basis of such estimates, and they paid their subcontractors monthly on the same basis. After the completion of the work the chief engineer discovered that the assistant engineer's estimates, without the fault of the plaintiffs or their subcontractors, were largely in excess as to quantities, the result being that the subcontractors had been greatly overpaid. It was held that the defendant must bear the loss; that, notwithstanding the terms of the contract, the defendant was estopped to deny the correctness of the estimates of the assistant engineer whom it had placed in charge of the work.

The measurements and estimates of the engineer may always be impeached for fraud or gross mistake. Williams v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 112 Mo. 463.

Such a stipulation is binding, since it is a part of the consideration of the contract. Williams v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 112 Mo. 463.

In Ricker v. Collins (Tex. 1891), 17 S. W. Rep. 378, the defendants were contractors for certain construction on a railroad, and contracted with the plaintiff to do a portion of the work. The plaintiff was to receive twenty-five cents per cubic yard for removing loose rock, and seventy-five cents for solid rock, the classification to be made by the chief engineer of the railroad, or by one appointed by him for that purpose. The plaintiff commenced work, and then notified the local engineer in charge of the work that, unless the job was classified as solid rock, he would abandon it; whereupon the engineer so classified it, and the plaintiff completed his contract. A member of the defendant firm was present during the work, and knew of the classification shortly after it was made, and told the plaintiff that it was all right. It was held that the defendants were liable on such classification.

Where the contract under which the plaintiff performed work for the defendant construction company in building a railroad provided that monthly advances were to be made him on the basis of measurement and classification of the work by the defendant's engineer, and that all disputes as to amount or classification of work were to be referred to the divisional engineer, whose decision thereon should be final, it was held that the plaintiff could maintain an action for the fraud of the defendant's engineer in underestimating and classifying his work, without alleging that reference had been duly made to the divisional engineer, or that he was privy to the fraud, so that the reference would be useless. Meyers v. Pacific Const. Co., 20 Oregon 603.

Where the measurement and estimate were to be by the city engineer, the measurement of the work by his assistant, revised by himself, was held such a performance of his duties as the contract intended. Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373.

In Price v. Kearney Canal, etc., Co., 29 Neb. 33, the plaintiff contracted to construct a canal for the defendant for so many cents a cubic yard. It was shown that the defendant's engineer, in making estimates upon which the plaintiff's pay was based, measured excavations only, and that the plaintiff acquiesced in this method. It was held that the evidence warranted a finding that the plaintiff was not entitled to compensation for earth placed in embankments which had been once paid for in excavation.

Notice of Measurement.—The superintendent need not give notice to the contractor of the time he intends making the measurements and estimate in order that the latter may be present. Wilson v. York, etc., R. Co., 11 Gill & J. (Md.) 58.

By Whom Made.—The plaintiffs contracted to do certain railroad bridge masonry, to be paid for on final estimates of the "engineers in charge" of the railroad. It was held that "engineers in charge" meant the engineers in charge of the entire road, and not one in charge of the specific masonry in question, whose decision was subject to the approval of the engineers in chief. Reilly v. Lee (Supreme Ct.), 16 N. Y. Supp. 313; 61 Hun (N. Y.) 627.

Pleading—Evidence.—In an action against a railroad company for work performed under a construction contract which stipulated that the amount of work done should be determined by the measurement of the company's engineer, the first count in the complaint set out the contract, and then alleged that the engineer, though often requested, did not make the measurements as required by the contract, and certify them, and that his failure to do so was fraudulent, and collusive with the defendant. The answer denied this allegation, and set out the final estimate of the engineer. The reply inferentially admitted that there was an estimate made by the engineer, but alleged that it was made in violation of the contract, and was fraudulent. It was held that before the plaintiffs could introduce evidence of the amount and value of the work done by them, they must first show that the engineer had refused to make an estimate as required by the contract, after demand, since that was the issue presented by the pleadings on the first count. Williams v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 112 Mo. 463.

Refusal of Engineer to Act.—Where a contract for the grading of a railroad provided that the estimates and decision of the engineer should be conclusive and binding on the parties, and both the contractor for whom the work was done and the engineer refused to make the estimates, it was held, in an action to recover for the work performed, that estimates made by another engineer employed by the plaintiff therefor, were, under a proper issue made by the pleadings, admissible in evidence. Crawford v. Wolf, 29 Iowa 567.

1. O'Reilly v. Kerns, 52 Pa. St. 214.

Where the plaintiff, as subcontractor, agreed to grade land for a railway company, the work to be done under the supervision of the company's chief engineer, whose classification and measurement of the work performed was to be conclusive on all parties, the contract was valid, and the parties were bound by the estimates, unless they were fraudulently made. Ross v. McArthur, 85 Iowa 203.

Where the contract with a subcontractor for railroad construction work stipulates that payment shall be made the subcontractor only on an estimate and certificate of the original contractor's engineer, the stipulation is binding on the parties, and the subcontractor, if he recovers at all for his work, can only recover the amount of such estimate. Gulbault v. McGreevy, 18 Can. Supreme Ct. 609.

But the engineer's estimates which, by the contract, are to be conclusive, cannot be held binding on subcontractors, on proof that the engineer was under the control of the contractor, and that his final estimates were withheld at the contractor's desire, contrary to his promise to the subcontractors. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Kerr, 48 Ill. App. 496.

Under an agreement with a railroad company, that the measurement and classification of work done shall be the same as made by the engineer of the company, a subcontractor cannot recover for "second class masonry;" the estimates and testimony of the engineer showing that he did only certain "third class masonry," for which he was paid. Clark v. Diffenderfer, 31 Mo. App. 232.

A contract between the defendants contracting for the construction of a railroad, and the plaintiff, a subcontractor, provided that the defendant should receive three times as much compensation for removing solid rock as for removing loose rock, the classification to be made by the engineer of the railroad. The latter, at the plaintiff's request, classified the job as solid rock. It was held that by accepting the defendants' last payment under a new classification, made when the plaintiff's work was about completed, the plaintiff did not abandon his right under the first classification, when he accepted the money on condition that it would be applied as a credit on the amount claimed under such first classification, and the defendants' bookkeeper allowed him to so receipt for the money. Ricker v. Collins, 81 Tex. 662.

In Cummings v. Bradford (Ky. 1893), 22 S. W. Rep. 548, the defendant, having a contract for grading certain sections of railroad, sublet several sections to the plaintiffs, who were to do the work in conformity with the contract between the defendant and the railroad. After payment to the defendant of the amount due according to the estimates of the railway's engineer, and repayment by the defendant to the plaintiffs of the amount estimated on their sections, the defendant had other estimates made, and, finding seventy-seven thousand two hundred and twenty-six dollars additional due, sued for the amount. The amount recovered, however, was only twenty-two thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight dollars, and, as the judgment did not show in relation to which section the mistake in the former estimate had been made, the master proceeded to set off a ratable share to the plaintiffs of the twenty-two thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight dollars, after deducting the costs and attorneys' fees paid in the litigation, which was held the only feasible or just mode of ascertaining the plaintiffs' share, the plaintiffs not being entitled to receive pay for their work beyond what was recovered in the litigation.

A building contract awarded by a city to the plaintiff provided that the plaintiff should not be entitled to any payments until the completion of the work, except that the commissioners might direct payments on estimates made by the architects from time to time, where the value of the work should amount to twenty thousand dollars. The plaintiff's subcontract with M. provided for monthly payments on the estimated value of the work done by him. It was held that, while payments were to be made by the plaintiff to M. on estimates of architects, they were not the estimates provided for in the contract between the plaintiff and the city, which were based only on the work actually performed on the building. Smith v.

made.¹ But if the contractor alleges that the estimate is fraudulent and unjust he may prove the nature, extent and value of the work by other evidence,² and the court will always relieve against mistakes in measurements and calculations, clearly proven, or from oversight to measure or estimate any particular part of the work, or from wrong construction put upon the contract by the superintendent.³ The estimate or

—The contract between the contractor and his subcontractor for the construction of a railroad, providing that the estimate of the chief engineer should be final and conclusive as to the amount of work and its value, is binding on the judgment creditors of the subcontractors, on garnishment of the contractor, and no other evidence is admissible. St. Joseph Iron Co. v. Halverson, 48 Mo. App. 383.

1. A contract to pay for materials, to be furnished for the erection of a building, in monthly installments, upon the architect's estimates, is not broken by a failure to pay at the end of a month, and before the architect has made his estimates. Thurber v. Ryan, 12 Kan. 453.

2. Byron v. Bell (C. Pl.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 693. And see Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Ricker (Tex. 1891), 17 S. W. Rep. 382.

Fraud cannot be presumed merely because his estimates for work done pursuant to the contract are less than the measurement of the work actually done, nor because more work was done than is included in the estimate. There must be evidence that such party knowingly and willfully disregarded his duty, and rejected or condemned work which he knew, or at least should have known, fully conformed, in all respects, to the contract. Snell v. Brown, 71 Ill. 133.

The report of the engineer cannot be impeached for mistake arising from error in judgment, or in drawing conclusions from evidence and observations. Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373.

But it is error to admit evidence that upon other excavations in other places the engineer had classed as solid rock, material similar to that which he refused to class as solid rock in the excavation in question, it not appearing that the contract under which such classification was made was the same as the contract in the case on trial.

Dorwin v. Westbrook, 86 Hun (N. Y.) 363. And the opinion of a witness that the certificate is erroneous, and as to whether the issuing of such a certificate is evidence of bad faith, is insufficient to show bad faith, fraud or misconduct on the part of the superintendent. Zimmerman v. German Luth. Church, 11 Misc. Rep. (N. Y. Super. Ct.) 49.

3. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Henry, 65 Tex. 685.

The court will relieve against mistakes in measurements and calculations apparent upon the face of the estimates, or clearly proven, though not so apparent, or from oversight to measure or estimate any particular part of the work, or from wrong constructions put upon the provisions of the contract by the engineer; but will not relieve against alleged mistakes in determining the kind of materials found in the several cuts, the parties being bound by the judgment of the engineer selected by them for special skill and attention as the umpire on such questions; nor will it relieve against slight discrepancies in measurements. Lewis v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 49 Fed. Rep. 708; Summers v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 49 Fed. Rep. 714. And see Sherman v. New York, 1 N. Y. 316, where it was held that other evidence than the engineer's final estimate of the work was competent.

In an action for the price agreed to be paid for removing earth at a given rate per cubic yard, where a witness has testified that he was employed to cross-section the work before the grading was done, and that his measurements are correct, the testimony of another witness that he made estimates from such measurements, and found that a certain number of cubic yards had been removed, is admissible. Clarke v. Williams, 29 Neb. 691.

A contract for work and materials to be performed and furnished on the Quebec harbor works provided for the payment of a bulk sum therefor, and the specifications included dredging as classification, however, is binding only as to matters within the jurisdiction of the superintendent to determine,¹ and if not one of the items. The contract provided that the engineers of the harbor commissioners should determine all matters in dispute by their final certificate. The engineers, by their final certificate, only granted a balance of $52,011, as due the contractors, deducting from the bulk sum agreed to be paid a large sum as for a clerical error in computing the amount of dredging to be done. The contractors rejected the engineers' certificate as to the amount due them of the contract price, and it was held that the engineers' certificate was binding on the contractors as to all matters within their jurisdiction to determine, but they had no right to deduct any sum from the bulk contract price on account of error in calculating the amount of dredging to be done, which was stated in the specifications, and the quantity of dredging actually done, and their certificate should be corrected in that respect. Peters v. Quebec Harbor Com'rs, 19 Can. Supreme Ct. 685.

The plaintiff agreed to grade land for a railway company, the contract providing that there should be no classification of the material excavated, other than that found in the specifications, which provided that, if the material to be excavated could be plowed with a strong ten-inch grading plow, well handled, behind a good six mule or horse team, it was to be classed as loose earth; but if it required more force than this, and less than solid rock, it was to be classed as loose rock. The engineer was instructed to use his best judgment in making the classifications; where the material was so hard that six horses could plow only half the time, he was instructed to allow a fair portion of loose rock, "say twenty-five per cent.;" where eight horses would be required, he was to call about fifty per cent. loose rock. It was held that though the instructions did not strictly conform to the contract where there was no material error in the engineer's classification, the estimates would not be set aside. Ross v. McArthur, 85 Iowa 203.

Where the respective quantities of the different kinds of excavation for which different prices are to be paid are to be determined "by the measurements and calculations" of the engineer, he need not determine by actual measurement the quantity of each kind of material excavated, but the word "calculations" is to be understood in the sense of "estimate," and, after the measurement of an embankment or cut, he may determine, by reference to the known contents and data, the quantities of the different materials excavated. Scoville v. Miller, 40 Ill. App. 237; Musson v. Musson, 40 Ill. App. 237.

Burden of Proof.—In an action to recover for excavating, at so much per yard, the number of which it had been agreed was to be ascertained by the certificate of a certain surveyor, where the plaintiff offers such certificate as evidence of the number of yards, and the defendant denies its correctness, the burden is on the defendant of disproving its correctness. Pucci v. Barney (City Ct.), 20 N. Y. Supp. 375; 1 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 84; Pucci v. Barney (C. Pl.), 21 N. Y. Supp. 1099; 2 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 354.

Waiver of Right to Object.—Where monthly estimates by an engineer in charge of a work are to be the means for his final account, which is to be conclusive upon the contractors, according to the terms of their agreement, a dispute as to the price allowed in a monthly estimate, followed by the acceptance of payment, and a receipt in full, will estop the contractor from seeking a greater price. Case v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 712. And see Henegan v. U. S., 17 Ct. of Cl. 273; Green v. Jackson, 66 Ga. 250.

1. Peters v. Quebec Harbor Com'rs, 19 Can. Supreme Ct. 685.

In O'Reilly v. Kerns, 52 Pa. St. 214, it was held not to apply to extra work not contemplated by the contract.

A contract to furnish stone for a building at a certain amount per perch, "architects' measurement in the wall, to be paid as per architects' estimate to the contractors, viz., ninety per cent. monthly," provides no method for the final measurement of the walls, and the determination of the system to be used is properly left to the jury under the evidence. Fellows v. Snyder, 50 Kan. 705.

A provision in a contract for excavating, etc., on a railroad, that all questions concerning the quantity and provided for at all by the contract has no binding force whatever.¹

XV. SUBSCRIPTIONS TO WORK.—Where various parties subscribe to the construction of a work, they will be liable to the extent of their subscriptions in an action by the contractor upon the agreement,² but if the subscription is conditional, the condition must be performed before the subscription can be collected.³ If the quality of the work, and the amount of money payable therefor, should be submitted to the chief engineer, has no application to an additional compensation promised on the work turning out to be harder than anticipated. Osborne v. O'Reilly, 42 N. J. Eq. 467.

1. Where the contract does not provide for estimates by the architect, they are not binding upon the employer. Schuler v. Eckert, 90 Mich. 165.

2. See SUBSCRIPTIONS, vol. 24, p. 326; Southern Hotel Co. v. Chouteau, 53 Mo. 572; Jewett v. Siddons, 9 Ind. 455; McCrimmin v. Cooper, 27 Tex. 113.

A subscription paper, stipulating that the sums annexed to the subscriber's names would be paid to any person who would build a free bridge at a designated place, constitutes a valid contract between the subscribers and anyone who afterward builds a bridge in accordance with the tenor of the instrument. Such an instrument is like a note payable to bearer, so far as relates to the payee; and when the bridge is completed the consideration is unimpeachable. Cooper v. McCrimmin, 33 Tex. 383; 7 Am. Rep. 268.

In Culver v. Banning, 19 Minn. 303, it was held that there was no consideration for the subscription.

In an action upon a contract to grade and pave an alley in which the parties agree to pay "according to their respective ownerships on said alley," the plaintiff need not allege a party to be a fee-simple owner. A lease for a term of years, in connection with such party's signature to the contract, is a sufficient ownership within the meaning of the contract. Jewett v. Siddons, 9 Ind. 455.

Where the subscription paper does not import that the work is to be done under the personal supervision of the person to whom the subscription is made, he may assign it and the subscribers will be liable to his assignee. Southern Hotel Co. v. Chouteau, 53 Mo. 572.

But a party is only liable to the extent of his subscription, and where a party was authorized by the defendant and others to contract for certain grading, but, the sum originally subscribed proving insufficient, notice was sent the defendant of a meeting to make a new contract, which meeting he did not attend, he was held liable only on the original contract to which he subscribed. Berchorman v. Murken, 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 98.

Where the plaintiff contracted with a committee of citizens to build a schoolhouse on the lands of a corporation, and, to pay the expenses, a subscription list was made, and it was agreed that the plaintiff should get payment for his work from the parties whose names were on the subscription list, it was held that the corporation was not liable for the work done by the plaintiff, and much less so was a new corporation, created long after the work was done for the same purpose as the old one. Clayton v. Newton Academy, 95 N. Car. 298.

Where the subscribers plead that they have performed their contract of subscription by paying the same to those authorized to collect, and that it has been properly applied to the payment of obligations for which it was bound, evidence to establish such facts is admissible. Sullivan v. Miller (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 819.

3. Porter v. Raymond, 53 N. H. 519.

In a suit by a bridge builder against the subscribers to the building of a bridge, it is not competent for the latter to vary or contradict the subscription paper by parol proof that the building of the bridge was to be let out to the lowest bidder, where there is no such provision in the paper itself. Cooper v. McCrimmin, 33 Tex. 383; 7 Am. Rep. 268.

Evidence of the unfinished state of improvements in the street is not admissible in defense of a suit upon a subscription paper promising to pay as the work progresses. McCormack v. Reece, 3 Greene (Iowa) 591.

enterprise is abandoned and the contractor afterward performs the work without the assent or ratification of the subscribers, relying merely upon their sense of liberality for his compensation, he cannot recover upon the subscription.¹

English Employers and Workman Act.—An omnibus conductor or a driver of a tram car is not a workman, as the duties of neither involve labor, and those of the conductor at least could not be regarded as manual. Morgan v. London General Omnibus Co., 13 Q. B. Div. 832; Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co., 18 Q. B. Div. 683.

A designer of patterns is not a workman. Jackson v. Hill, 13 Q. B. Div. 618.

But one who has to labor manually is not less a workman because he has to employ other manual laborers to assist him. Granger v. Ainseley, 6 Q. B. Div. 182. And so one, a substantial part of whose time is taken up in manual labor, is a workman within the act mentioned, although he is an overlooker of others. Leech v. Gartside, 1 Times Rep. 391. So is a miner, working for a "buttyman." Brown v. Butterley Coal Co., 53 L. T. 964.

Civil Engineers.—In Pennsylvania, etc., R. Co. v. Leuffer, 84 Pa. St. 168, a civil engineer was held not to be a workman within the Mechanic's Lien Law. The court said: "When we speak of the laboring or working classes, we certainly do not intend to include therein persons like civil engineers, the value of whose services rests rather in their scientific than in their physical ability. We thereby intend those who are engaged, not in head, but in hand, work, and who depend upon such hand work for their living."

3. A clause in a lease provided that the lessee should cultivate the farm in a "workmanlike manner." This was held to mean in a "farmerlike manner."

The court said: "This expression was undoubtedly intended to mean in a 'farmerlike-manner,' or as good farmers usually do, and so we construe it. If it was required by this test that lime should be spread the autumn before putting in spring crops, as contended for by the defendant below, then the work performed by the plaintiff in spreading the lime hauled upon the ground might and ought to be presumed to have been for the tenant's own benefit, and he should not charge for it. His lease was dated in September preceding the commencement of his term, and there being no obstacle to his entering to spread the lime in the fall, whether he did it or omitted it must enter into the consideration of what would be good husbandry under these circumstances. Of course, if it had been a case in which he could not have entered without being a trespasser, it could not be presumed that it was within the meaning of the clause that he must enter. 'Workmanlike,' 'farmerlike,' and such like expressions, necessarily have relation to the circumstances of the thing to be done as indicated." Aughinbaugh v. Coppenheffer, 55 Pa. St. 349.

Contract for Sawing Lumber.—Where a contract provided for the manufacture of lumber "in a good and workmanlike manner," without reference to any particular kind of mill, it was held error to admit testimony "that portable mills were not expected to manufacture as good lumber as stationary ones," and to instruct the jury that, "if plaintiffs used reasonably good machinery, as compared with the machinery generally used in doing similar jobs at that locality, and in the surrounding lumbering country, this would be sufficient as far as machinery was concerned." Grice v. Noble, 59 Mich. 516.

The word has no technical or legal signification; the cases in which its meaning has been the subject of contention have been decided upon their own merits.³

In a suit for payment under a written contract to manufacture logs "in a workmanlike manner" it is error, in the absence of evidence on the subject, to charge that the contract was sufficiently complied with if plaintiff had made as good lumber as he could with the mill and appliances he had. Button v. Russell, 55 Mich. 479.

1. Distinction Between Worn and Carried in Revenue Law.—In Richardson v. Lawrence, 1 Blatchf. (U. S.) 502, the court said: "The evidence in this case shows that a distinction has always been recognized and acted upon, in the collection of the revenue, between articles worn by men, women and children, and those carried. An article worn appears to have been understood, as the term properly imports in a strict philological sense, as intended to designate some article of clothing or raiment—some garment used or worn upon the person, as distinguished from an article carried or used about the person for convenience or ornament. A hat, coat, or shoe, is an article worn, in the proper sense of the word; but a cane, snuffbox, or lady's fan, is, properly speaking, an article not worn but carried."

2. Worrying Domestic Animals—Dogs.—Within a statute giving the owner of domestic animals a right to kill a dog for worrying them, worry means to run at, chase, bark at. Marshall v. Blackshire, 44 Iowa 478.

Within an act making the owner of a dog liable for damage done by it to sheep, and permitting the killing of the dog, it was held that worrying did not imply tearing with the teeth, and that if a dog pursues and barks at sheep, it is worrying under the statute. Campbell v. Brown, 1 Grant's Cas. (Pa.) 82.

In Johnson v. McConnell, 80 Cal. 545, it was held that the dog must be actually worrying the sheep at the time it is killed. In that case, the court said that it was doubtful from the evidence whether the dogs were in fact chasing the sheep, or whether they were merely hunting in the field. The court commented upon the case of Marshall v. Blackshire, 44 Iowa 478, cited above, quoting the definition there given, and saying that that case fully sustained their view; but McFarland, J., dissenting, claimed that the facts showed that the dogs were worrying the sheep within the definition given in that case.

Business Meeting.—A prosecution for disturbing a congregation assembled for religious worship will not be sustained by proof that the congregation, though disturbed, were assembled exclusively for business purposes, even though the proceedings were opened with religious exercises. Wood v. State, 11 Tex. App. 318. But in Hollingsworth v. State, 5 Sneed (Tenn.) 518, it was held that a religious congregation assembled to transact church business were entitled to the protection afforded by the laws against disturbing public worship. Thus, where the church judicature assembled after the religious services were over, for the trial of an offending member, it was held that a disturbance of such an assembly was indictable.

was held not to come within the term "divine worship" in an agreement between two congregations to use a church jointly for that purpose. The court said: "These congregations never so understood or acted upon their agreement of union. They built their church for divine worship, by prayer, praise, and the preaching of God's word. Its use was to be congregational worship, not school instruction. Their worship was to be led by pastors who should regulate their appointments in due regard to mutual harmony, and was not to be the instruction of youth, even though part of it were in divine things, led by individual laymen. There are reasons, also, why a chamber or audience room, dedicated to public congregational worship, should not be thrown open to thoughtless, giddy, sometimes vicious, youths, to deface and soil it. We think the court erred in deciding the case according to the general meaning of the words 'divine service,' as testified to by some of the witnesses, instead of confining their signification to the sense in which the congregation understood it when they entered into the agreement, and afterwards practiced upon it." Gass's Appeal, 73 Pa. St. 46; 13 Am. Rep. 726.

But in Martin v. State, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 234, a Sunday school was held to be a "worshiping assembly" in the sense of a statute making the disturbance of public worship indictable.

Camp Meeting—Question of Fact.—In State v. Norris, 59 N. H. 536, it was held to be a question of fact whether a temperance camp meeting was an assembly for the purpose of worship. The court said: "The case presents no question of law. The question of fact is, Was the State Temperance Camp Meeting, in this case, a public 'assembly convened for the purpose of religious worship?' G. L., ch. 273, § 9. The term religious worship having no technical meaning in a legal sense, the determination of this question is within the province of a jury." Compare Summit Grove Camp Meeting Assoc. v. School Dist., 12 W. N. C. (Pa.) 103, where it was held that if the camp-meeting grounds belonged to an association, and profit was derived from them, it was not a place of worship. And see Com. v. Wagner, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 27.

Christmas Tree Festival.—A "Christmas tree" festival for Sunday school scholars at a schoolhouse is not an assembly for religious worship. Layne v. State, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 199. The court said: "It appears that the meeting was held at a schoolhouse, and is described by the witnesses as a 'Sunday school celebration and Christmas tree,' at which no religious service had been appointed, but speeches were made upon the subject of Sunday schools and public morality. On a Christmas tree were hung presents, and singing and music upon violins were the entertainments of the occasion. Two persons were distributing the presents from the tree, calling the names of those for whom they were intended, when plaintiff in error, under the influence of liquor, placed himself on his back on the floor, and kicked the Christmas tree, swearing in a loud voice, to the great annoyance and disgust of the decent people present. He was finally induced to leave. His conduct was very reprehensible, and he might have been indicted, and should have been exemplarily punished for his indecent profanity in the presence of the women and children and other good people there assembled, and we regret that we cannot affirm the judgment against him. But the act under which he is presented is intended to protect 'assemblies met for religious worship.' The meeting disturbed was for the enjoyment of a Christmas festival, and the fact that it was especially intended for Sunday school scholars and their teachers and friends does not change its character nor make it an 'assembly for religious worship.'"

Residence of Priest or Clergyman.—In St. Joseph's Church v. Assessors, 12 R. I. 19; 34 Am. Rep. 597, it was held that the residence of a priest or clergyman is not exempt from taxation, "as a building for religious worship," although it contains one room set apart as a chapel for religious worship. See Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229.

In State v. Leonard, 22 Mo. 449, it is said: "We may suppose from the evidence that the prosecutrix was wounded in the legal sense of the term, for she says that there is a scar still left made by the wound." Shaddock v. Alpine Plank-road Co., 79 Mich. 11.

A wound is a solution of continuity in the soft parts, suddenly occasioned by external causes, and generally attended at first with hemorrhage. Rex v. Wood, 4 C. & P. 381, note; 19 E. C. L. 430.

To wound means to divide the surface of the body, whether it be an internal—e. g., the inside of the mouth—or an external surface. Stephen's Criminal Law 171, citing Reg. v. Leonard, 8 C. & P. 173; 34 E. C. L. 341.

With the Hand.—Wounding may be done with the hand. R. v. Bullock, L. R., 1 C. C. R. 115.

Breaking a Bone.—It seems that to break a bone without breaking the skin is not a wound. Rex v. Wood, 4 C. & P. 381; 19 E. C. L. 430; Rex v. Owens, 1 M. C. C. 205; Rex v. Hughes, 2 C. & P. 420; 12 E. C. L. 200.

Stab, Cut or Wound.—Where these words were used together in a statute, it was held that a wound must be accomplished by an instrument, because wounding is associated with stabbing and cutting, and a stab and cut must be made by an instrument. Jennings' Case, 2 Lew. C. C. 130. See also R. v. Stevens, 1 Mood. 409; Rex v. Harris, 7 C. & P. 446; 32 E. C. L. 578.

Blow Substituted for Wound.—"It remains for us to inquire, whether the substitution of the word 'blow' for the word 'wound,' in the indictment now before us, is such an informality as is cured by the statute. The counsel for the prisoner contends that it is not—that, on the contrary, it is a defect in the substance of the averment of the means whereby the deceased came to his death, and therefore fatal; that the word 'blow' signifies the cause only of the wound, which is the effect of the blow, from which effect the death ensues, and that such wound, being the immediate cause of the death, must be stated, instead of the remote cause, which is the blow. The language of the court in the case of State v. Martin, 3 Dev. (N. Car.) 329, to which we have referred particularly in State v. Tom (decided at the present term, 2 Jones (N. Car.) 414), goes far to support this argument. But it is to be remarked, that the act of 1811 is not at all alluded to in that case, and the decision seems to have been put upon the strict principles of the common law. We admit the force of the argument, provided the premises be true, that the word 'blow,' in the connection in which it is used, does not convey 'the whole requisite legal idea' of the means whereby the deceased was killed. The charge is that the prisoner, 'with a certain club, which he, the said Alfred W. Noblett, in both his hands then and there had and held, the said John Davis, in and upon the left side of the head, cutting the left ear and mashing the nose and left cheek bone of him, the said John Davis, then and there feloniously, etc., did strike, giving to the said John Davis, then and there, with the club aforesaid, in and upon the left side of the head, cutting the left ear and mashing the nose and left cheek bone of him, the said John Davis, one mortal blow, of which said mortal blow the said John Davis on, etc., instantly died.' Mr. Walker defines the word 'blow' to mean a 'stroke,' and the verb 'to mash,' of which 'mashing' is a participle, to mean 'to beat into a confused mass.' Now it seems to us that a blow or stroke with a club, which has the effect of cutting the left ear and mashing, or beating into a confused mass, the nose and left cheek bone of the deceased, shows to the court, as clearly, the means whereby the deceased was killed, as if the word 'wound' had been used. The case of State v. Moses, 2 Dev. (N. Car.) 452, decides that the act of 1811 dispenses with the necessity of stating the dimensions of a wound, and we think that it is equally effectual to dispense with the necessity of using the word 'wound,' when other terms of equivalent meaning are employed." State v. Noblett, 2 Jones (N. Car.) 433.

Wound and Bruise.—" 'Wound' is a hurt given by violence, no matter with what kind of weapon. 'Bruise' is a hurt with something blunt and heavy. Wound includes a bruise. As, therefore, the present charge is of wounds with a stick, they must be taken to be such wounds as a stick commonly inflicts. Is it competent for the prisoner to object to the use of a word in one of its proper significations? It is admitted, on his behalf, that if the word 'bruises' had been used in this indictment, instead of the word 'wounds,' no description would be required; but if every wound includes a bruise, why shall that word, in this indictment, be stripped of its ordinary extent of meaning? The word wound is not a technical word; it is one of common parlance. If this word, ex vi termini, imported a separation of the skin, and was confined in its signification to injuries of that character, then it might be alleged that it always differed from a bruise and did not include it. But it is clear, that in common parlance, and also in judicial decisions, wound and bruise are used as synonymous." State v. Owen, 1 Murph. (N. Car.) 456; 4 Am. Dec. 571.

I. DEFINITION.—The term "wreck," in its popular sense, means a ship which has received such injuries as to render her innavigable and unable to pursue her voyage without repairs.¹

But according to the purely technical common-law sense, "wreck" applies only to property cast upon the land by the sea. Things are not "wrecks" in their legal sense so long as they remain at sea.²

Life Insurance.—Within the meaning of a question of an application for life insurance, viz: "Have you received any wound, hurt, or serious bodily injury?" the words "hurt" and "wound" mean an injury to the body causing an impairment of health or strength, or rendering the person more liable to contract disease, or less liable to resist its effects. A cut on the face, finger or any part of the body, from which blood flows, though healing in a few days, is a hurt or wound, but not within the meaning of the contract under consideration. Bancroft v. Home Ben. Assoc. (Ct. App.), 30 N. Y. St. Rep. 175, reversing (Super. Ct.), 8 N. Y. St. Rep. 129.

Where the Whole Skin Is Not Separated.—A scratch on the face by rupturing the cuticle only, without separating the whole skin, is not a wound. Reg. v. M'Loughlin, 8 C. & P. 635; 34 E. C. L. 561; Rex v. Wood, 4 C. & P. 381; 19 E. C. L. 430. Com. v. Gallagher, 6 Met. (Mass.) 568; State v. Leonard, 22 Mo. 450.

Wreck is the ruins of a ship which has been stranded or dashed to pieces upon a shelf, rock, or seashore by tempestuous weather. Respublica v. LeCaze, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 59.

Goods cast into the sea to unburden a ship in a storm and never intended as merchandise are wrecks when cast on shore without any shipwreck. Sheppard v. Gosnold, Vaugh. 168.

"'Wrecke,' or 'Varech' (as the Normans, from whom it came, call it) is where a ship is perished on the sea, and no man escapeth alive out of the same, and the ship, or part of the ship so perished, or the goods of the ship, come to the land of any Lord, the Lord shall have that as a wrecke of the sea. But if a man, or a dog, or a cat escape alive, so that the party to whom the goods belong come within a yeare and a day and prove the goods to be his, he shall have them againe, by provision of the Statute of Westm. 1, ch. 4, made in King Edw. 1 dayes, who therein followed the decree of H. I., before whose dayes, if a ship had been cast on shore torne with tempest, and were not repaired by such as escaped alive within a certain time, that then this was taken for wrecke." Termes de La Ley.

"De wreck de mere" (3 Edw. 1, ch. 4), — "Wrecke or Shipwrecke, is an English word, in French Naufnage, in ancient French Varech, in Latine Naufragium, legally Wreccum Maris, wrecke of the sea in legall understanding, is applied to such goods as after shipwreck at sea are by the sea cast upon the land; and, therefore, the jurisdiction thereof pertaineth not to the lord

II. WHO ENTITLED TO WRECKS.—In England, a right to wreck of the sea and to its custody, is vested in the Crown until its owner appears.¹ If the owner does not claim within a year and a day, it vests in the Crown absolutely.² Several of the United States bordering on the sea have enacted statutes providing for a similar disposition of such property. They declare that nothing cast by the sea upon the land shall be adjudged a wreck until it has been kept safely for the space of a year for the true owner, to whom the same is to be delivered on his paying reasonable salvage; and if the goods be not claimed within that time, they shall be sold and the proceeds accounted for to the state.³

III. PROTECTION AND DISPOSITION OF WRECKS.—The states have different provisions respecting the protection and disposition of wreck; they are, however, the same in their general features, providing for the appointment of officers, whose duty it shall be admiral but to the common law. Although this statute speaketh onely of wrecke, yet this statute extendeth to Flotsam, Jetsam, and Lagan." 2 Inst. 167, citing Constable's Case, 5 Coke 106a.

Goods contained in a vessel sunk in tide water are not wrecks within the provisions of the Revised Statutes; but are derelict, upon which the salvor by maritime law has a lien for salvage. Baker v. Hoag, 7 N. Y. 555; 59 Am. Dec. 431.

Where the owners of goods that have been shipwrecked, or their servants, remain in possession of them, such goods are not in any sense wreck, and do not belong to the Crown or its grantee by virtue of its prerogative. Sutton v. Buck, 2 Taunt. 302; Dunwich v. Sterry, 1 B. & Ad. 831; 20 E. C. L. 492; McKinney v. Brights, 16 Pa. St. 399; 55 Am. Dec. 512.

The term cannot be extended to a boat or other property afloat, not appearing to have ever been cast overboard, or lost from a vessel in distress. Chase v. Corcoran, 106 Mass. 288, citing Sheppard v. Gosnold, Vaugh. 159; Palmer v. Rouse, 3 H. & N. 505; Baker v. Hoag, 7 N. Y. 555; 59 Am. Dec. 431.

A cargo of a vessel sunk in forty feet of water and abandoned to the underwriters, is not a wreck of the sea. Murphy v. Dunham, 38 Fed. Rep. 503.

English Shipping Act.—The second section of the Merchant's Shipping Act 1854 provides that the term wreck shall include jetsam, flotsam and ligam, or derelict found in or on the shores of any sea or tidal water. 17 & 18 Vict., ch. 104; The Zeta, 44 L. J. Adm. 22.

Timber found floating at sea, without any apparent owner, having drifted from its moorings, is not wreck within the meaning of the act. Palmer v. Rouse, 3 H. & N. 505; Legge v. Boyd, 14 L. C. P. 138; Barry v. Arnaud, 10 Ad. & El. 646; 37 E. C. L. 206.

Abandonment.—In Wood v. Lincoln, etc., Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 482; 4 Am. Dec. 163, it was held that when a ship becomes a wreck it is generally a total loss, and the owner may abandon it as a wreck. In this sense it is defined as follows: "A ship becomes a wreck [says the court] when, in consequence of the injury she has received, she is rendered absolutely innavigable, or unable to pursue her voyage, without repairs exceeding half her value."

Owner of Land.—It has been held in Massachusetts that the owner of the shore has the title to wreck thrown upon the shore, as against all strangers, and may maintain trespass against to save and secure such property, appraise its value, and to keep it in a safe place to await the claim of persons who may thereafter appear entitled to it. There are also provisions as to advertising and sale.¹

Congress has also made provisions for the protection and disposition of wreck, requiring a license from vessels engaged in carrying property from a wreck;² and providing punishment for plundering wrecks or for showing false lights.³

IV. RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF OWNERS OF WRECKS.—Where a vessel is sunk through an unavoidable accident in navigable water, the owner is not obliged to remove the wreck, nor is he liable for injuries it may cause to others, nor indictable for maintaining a nuisance, although navigation is obstructed.⁴ If, however, instead of abandoning the wreck, he retains possession, he is liable for any injuries arising from his failure to take proper precautions for the public safety.⁵

This statute has been held constitutional. U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 72.

Under this statute the court was held to have jurisdiction, although the vessel was lying upon the shore, and the property plundered after it had been separated from the vessel. U. S. v. Pitman, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 196.

It is not larceny alone which is punishable under this section, but any act of depredation, whether it be of the character that would be piracy if committed upon the high seas, robbery or other forcible taking, theft, trespass, or other malicious mischief, or any fraudulent and criminal breach of trust if committed on land, whether the common or statute law prevail. No specific intent is necessary to constitute the offense. The value of the goods is immaterial. U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. Rep. 232.

Until goods are removed from the place where landed or thrown ashore from the stranded or wrecked vessel, or cease to be under the charge of the officers or other parties interested, the act will apply if a larceny of them is committed, even though the vessel may in the meantime have gone entirely to pieces and disappeared from the sea. But the act is not intended to reach cases where the property abandoned by the officers or other parties interested is recovered by third persons. U. S. v. Smiley, 6 Sawy. (U. S.) 640.

Indictment.—An indictment which alleged that the defendant "furnished and loaned" a skiff to be used by others in plundering a wrecked vessel, was held good. U. S. v. Sanche, 7 Fed. Rep. 715.

The indictment need not distinguish between acts supposed to be characterized as "plundering" and other acts supposed to be properly designated as "stealing" or "destroying," nor between acts of depredation committed on the wreck and such acts committed on property belonging to but separated from it. U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. Rep. 232.

Jurisdiction of United States Courts.—Where property abandoned by the officers of the vessel lies under the water within 150 feet of the Mexican shore, the federal courts of the United States have no jurisdiction. U. S. v. Smiley, 6 Sawy. (U. S.) 640.

WRIT.—(As to specific writs, such as Mandamus, Habeas Corpus, Summons, Error, Certiorari, Quo Warranto, etc., see their respective titles.)

A writ is, in its general meaning, a mandatory precept issued by the authority and in the name of the sovereign or the state, for the purpose of compelling the defendant to do something therein mentioned.³

Trespass.—It has been held that one entering upon the sea beach of another, for the purpose of removing and restoring to its owner a boat cast ashore in a storm and in danger of being carried away by the sea, was not a trespasser. Proctor v. Adams, 113 Mass. 376; 18 Am. Rep. 500.

So one purchasing at a wreck commission sale is not guilty of trespass in hauling the goods from the plaintiff's land, although forbidden to do so, when the goods could not be taken in any other way without great inconvenience to the owner. Lead Pencil.—In State v. Anderson, 45 La. Ann. 651, it was held that it was not necessary that a verdict in a criminal case should be written in ink.

In Myers v. Vanderbelt, 84 Pa. St. 510, it was held that where a statute provided that every will should be in writing, a will written and signed with a lead pencil was valid. In re Dyer, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 219; Raymes v. Clarkson, 1 Phil. Ecc. 22; Dickenson v. Dickenson, 2 Phil. Ecc. 173; Main v. Ryder, 84 Pa. St. 217. See also WILLS, p. 118, ante.

So contracts in lead pencil have been held sufficient. Jeffery v. Walton, 1 Stark. 267; 2 E. C. L. 108; Geary v. Physic, 5 B. & C. 234; 11 E. C. L. 213; Merritt v. Clason, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 102; 7 Am. Dec. 286; Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 490.

So a book account made in pencil was held admissible in evidence as a book of original entries. Hill v. Scott, 12 Pa. St. 169.

Alterations and cancellations in pencil, of a will written in ink, have been held valid. In re Tomlinson's Estate, 133 Pa. St. 245; 19 Am. St. Rep. 637.

Print.—A printed business card was held a writing within the statute against false pretenses. Jones v. State, 50 Ind. 476.

In O'Bryan v. State, 27 Tex. App. 340, it was held that an indictment partly written and partly printed was valid. The court said: "Whilst it is declared by statute that 'an indictment is the written statement of a grand jury accusing a person therein named of some act or omission which by law is declared to be an offense' (Code Crim. Proc., art. 419), still it is no objection to its validity that it is in form partly printed and partly written. The word 'writing' or 'written' under our statutes, civil as well as criminal, includes 'printing' (Texas Rev. Stats., art. 3140, subd. 3; Texas Penal Code, art. 30; Winn v. State, 5 Tex. App. 621)."

Printed Ballots.—In Henshaw v. Foster, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 312, it was held that printed ballots are a compliance with the constitutional requirement that representatives shall be chosen by written votes. To the same effect, see Temple v. Mead, 4 Vt. 535. In that case the court said: "The definition of the word writing includes printing; it means no more than conveying our ideas to others by letters or characters visible to the eye. It is so used by all writers, and generally comprehends printing, engraving, etc., in opposition to the mode of conveying them viva voce. In all legal writers, and in the statutes which have been enacted in this state and elsewhere, the expression is made use of in the same general and comprehensive sense. Several instances of this were mentioned in the argument. A deed is defined to be a writing, signed, etc.; yet it is always said that it may be printed. The statute says, 'no action shall be maintained on any agreement for the sale of lands,' etc., unless the agreement, etc., be in writing and signed by the parties. Other contracts, to be legally binding, are required to be in writing. It would not be contended that, by these statutes, an agreement wholly in print, signed by the parties, would be ineffectual. Writs are defined to be precepts in writing, yet it is notorious that they are printed. In some states, not only the writs, but the names of the clerks or prothonotaries, from whose office they issue, are printed. The instances are numerous in which printing is considered essentially the same as writing. The same question has lately been agitated in the State of Massachusetts in a case between Henshaw, plaintiff, and Foster and others, defendants, under a constitution where the expression is similar to ours. Chief Justice Parker, in a very able and elaborate opinion, shows most clearly that the use of printed votes is not contrary to the letter or spirit of the constitution, but is in strict conformity to both, and he was sustained by the decision of the other members of the court. It has been said that the decision of the supreme court of the State of Maine is to the same effect."

A Printed Theater Ticket in the usual form and stamped upon its face with an inscription in the style of a seal is a writing subject to forgery. In re Benson, 34 Fed. Rep. 649; 10 Crim. L. Mag. 682.

Stamping.—Where a statute provided that tax certificates might be assigned by the proper official writing his name upon the back, it was held that such certificates might be assigned by the officer stamping his name and official character upon them with intent to assign. The court said: "We are clearly of the opinion that such stamping the name is writing the same, within the meaning of the statute; and we are more strongly convinced of the propriety of so holding, from the fact that the same statute declares that the words 'written' and 'in writing' may be construed to include printing, engraving, lithographing, and any other mode of representing words and letters. It is true, this definition does not in express terms define the words 'by writing,' and so it may be said it is not applicable, and has no force in defining the words 'by writing.' We may, however, we think, consider the definition given by the statute to the words 'written' and 'in writing,' as showing the liberal construction which should be given to all words or terms of a like character where used in the statute. It cannot, we think, be doubted that if it were not for the statute which declares that 'when the written signature of any person is required by law, it shall always be the proper handwriting of such person,' etc., the statute which requires him to assign the certificates 'by writing his name on the back thereof,' would be complied with by placing it on with a stamp, as was done in this case. See Barnard v. Heydrick, 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 62; Schneider v. Norris, 2 M. & S. 286; Brown v. Butchers', etc., Bank, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 443; 41 Am. Dec. 755; Saunderson v. Jackson, 2 B. & P. 238; Hubert v. Turner, 11 L. J. Rep. (C. P. N. S.) 78; Johnson v. Dodgson, 6 L. J. Rep. Exch. (N. S.) 185; Lobb v. Stanley, 13 L. J. Q. B. 117. In the case of Potts v. Cooley, 56 Wis. 45, an assignment was held sufficient when the official character of the clerk was printed after the written name. All the cases seem to hold that when a party places his name to an instrument in writing with intent to be bound thereby, it is immaterial whether the name be printed, written or stamped; either will answer the purpose, and is a compliance with a statute requiring his subscription or signature. If this be so, then we cannot say that such statute necessarily requires the written signature of the clerk, and so does not come within the provision above quoted. We think the cases of Scott v. Seaver, 52 Wis. 184, and Mezchen v. More, 54 Wis. 214, cover the point made by the learned counsel for the appellant, and are conclusive that the objection to the assignment is not well taken." Dreutzer v. Smith, 56 Wis. 297.

Stenography.—Stenography has been held to be writing within a provision that a witness's oral testimony shall be taken in writing. Nichols v. Harris, 32 La. Ann. 646. The court said: "We are of opinion that the notes of the stenographer, taken when the witness gives his oral testimony in court, is a 'taking in writing,' as contemplated by article 602. It is true this shorthand report may be illegible or unintelligible to others than the reporter himself, but it is the writing, the taking down, word for word, of the oral testimony, under the eye and within the hearing of the court, by a sworn officer, and when transcribed is to be filed in the record. It cannot be transcribed unless previously taken down in writing, and when thus transcribed and filed, it is only an intelligible translation of written testimony, taken in shorthand or phonetic characters, into characters generally understood."

Telephone Message.—Where a notice was required to be in writing, a notice by telephone is insufficient. The court said: "Telephone messages cannot be regarded as anything more than verbal notices." In re Shier's Estate (S. Car. 1892), 14 S. E. Rep. 931.

Telegraph.—A telegram from a judge to the clerk of court, ordering an adjournment, was held a written order. The court said: "Contracts may be made by telegram even where it is required they must be in writing, and it has been said it makes no difference if the writing is done with a steel pen an inch long attached to an ordinary penholder, or whether the pen be a copper wire one thousand miles long. Howley v. Whipple, 48 N. H. 487; Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307; 93 Am. Dec. 411. The telegraph operator was the agent of the judge, and by means of the wire and instruments attached thereto, and the operator, the judge wrote the telegram which was delivered to the clerk. We think it was a written order within the meaning of the statute." State v. Holmes, 56 Iowa 590; 41 Am. Rep. 122.

Paper.—A paper is a writing. U. S. v. Gaylord, 17 Fed. Rep. 438.

A writing means anything written, a written paper of any kind. Thomas v. State, 103 Ind. 425.

Writing in the Sense of Instrument in Writing—False Pretenses.—"Writing, as used in the statute, must mean some instrument, or at least letter—something in writing, purporting to be the act of another, or certainly of some person; but the paper presented in this case does not answer any such description; it was no writing at all, because it did not purport to be the act of any person. Writing, as used in the statute, cannot mean anything written upon paper, not purporting to be of any force or efficacy, but some instrument in writing, or written paper, purporting to have been signed by some person; and such writing must be false." People v. Gates, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 320.

Copyright Law—Photograph.—In Burrow-Giles Lithographic Co. v. Sarony, 111 U. S. 53, it was held to be within the constitutional power of a congress to confer a copyright upon the author, inventor, designer or proprietor of a photograph. The court said: "So, also, no one would now claim that the word 'writing' in this clause of the constitution, though the only word used as to subjects in regard to which authors are to be secured, is limited to the actual script of the author, and excludes books and all other printed matter. By writings in that clause is meant the literary productions of those authors, and Congress very properly has declared these to include all forms of writing, printing, engraving, etching, etc., by which the ideas in the mind of the author are given visible expression. The only reason why photographs were not included in the extended list in the act of 1802 is probably that they did not exist, as photography as an art was then unknown, and the scientific principle on which it rests, and the chemicals and machinery by which it is operated, have all been discovered long since that statute was enacted."

Writing Distinguished from Letter.—A United States statute provided that it would be a misdemeanor to deposit any obscene writings in the mails. In U. S. v. Chase, 135 U. S. 258, the court said: "The contention on the part of the United States is, that the term 'writing,' as used in this statute, is comprehensive enough to include, and does include, the term 'letter,' as used in the indictment; and it is insisted, therefore, that the offense charged is that of unlawfully and knowingly depositing in the mails of the United States an obscene, lewd and lascivious 'writing,' etc., etc. We do not concur in this construction of the statute. The word 'writing,' when not used in connection with analogous words of more special meaning, is an extensive term, and may be construed to denote a letter from one person to another. But such is not its ordinary and usual acceptance. Neither in legislative enactments, nor in common intercourse, are the two terms 'letter' and 'writing' equivalent expressions. When, in ordinary intercourse, men speak of mailing a 'letter,' or receiving by mail a 'letter,' they do not say mail a 'writing' or receive by mail a 'writing.' In law the term 'writing' is much more frequently used to denote legal instruments, such as deeds, agreements, memoranda, bonds, notes, etc. In the Statute of Frauds, the word occurs in that sense in nearly every section. And in the many discussions to which this statute has given rise, these instruments are referred to as 'the writing' or 'some writing.' But in its most frequent and most familiar sense the term 'writing' is applied to books, pamphlets and the literary and scientific productions of authors. As, for instance, in that clause in the United States constitution which provides that Congress shall have power 'to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.' In the statute under consideration, the word 'writing' is used as one of a group or class of words—book, pamphlet, picture, paper, writing, print—each of which is ordinarily and prima facie understood to be a publication; and the enumeration concludes with the general phrase 'or other publication,' which applies to all the articles enumerated, and marks each with the common quality indicated. It must, therefore, according to a well defined rule of construction, be a published writing which is contemplated by the statute, and not a private letter, on the outside of which there is nothing but the name and address of the person to whom it is written."

Written Contract.—A written contract is one which in all its terms is in writing. A contract partly in writing and partly oral is in legal effect an oral contract. Bishop on Contracts, §§ 163, 164. Railway Pass., etc., Mut. Aid, etc., Assoc. v. Loomis, 142 Ill. 567.

WRONG—(Compare RIGHT, vol. 21, p. 466; TORTS, vol. 26, p. 72).—Wrong, in its broadest sense, includes every injury to another, independent of the motives causing the injury.¹

WRONGFULLY.—Wrongfully means in a wrong manner, unjustly, in a manner contrary to the moral law or to justice.²

YARD.—See note 3.

1. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Henry, 36 Kan. 570. But in that case it was held that, as used in an instruction as to negligence, "it means and could mean nothing but that kind of wrong the court was defining to the jury in defining negligence; that it was the failure to exercise great or extraordinary care, or a want of that care which an ordinarily prudent man would ordinarily exercise, or it is the want of slight diligence; and that the failure to take this kind of care where others are liable to injury, was the wrong as to which the court was charging the jury that an injury caused thereby was a prima facie case of compensation made out."

"A wrong is an invasion of right to the damage of the party who suffers it. It consists in the injury done, and not commonly in the purpose or mental or physical capacity of the person or agent doing it. It may or may not have been done with bad motive; the question of motive is usually a question of aggravation only. Therefore, the law, in giving redress, has in view the case of the party injured and the extent of his injury, and makes what he suffers the measure of compensation." Williams v. Hays, 143 N. Y. 447.

2. Howard County v. Armstrong, 91 Ind. 528.

Wrongfully Distinguished from Unlawfully.—The words wrongfully and unlawfully are not convertible terms. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Payne (Ind. 1895), 1 West. Rep. 185; Howard County v. Armstrong, 91 Ind. 528; Durham v. Montgomery County, 95 Ind. 182; Henry County v. Murphy, 100 Ind. 570.

Mistake.—An act may be wrongful although done by mistake. Webber v. Quaw, 46 Wis. 118.

3. Cubic Yard.—A cubic yard is a term well known to everyone. It means twenty-seven cubic feet. Corcoran v. Chess, 131 Pa. St. 356. And in that case it was held that where parties used the term in their contracts, they used it in its ordinary and proper meaning, and that, therefore, there was no ambiguity.

Railroad Yard.—"The yard of the company, as the court may know from its general knowledge of the methods and appliances of railroad companies, as well as from the evidence in this case, consists of side tracks upon either side of the main tracks, and adjacent to some principal station or depot grounds where cars are placed for deposit, and where arriving trains are separated and departing trains made up. It is the place where such switching is done as is essential to the proper placing of cars, either for deposit or for departure." Harley v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 57 Fed. Rep. 145.

In a Yard.—Where an indictment charged the use of abusive and profane language in a yard, it was held not to be sustained by proof of the use of such language near the yard. Quin v. State, 65 Miss. 479.

Courthouse Yard.—A statute prohibited the summoning of jurors within the courthouse yard. In a trial for murder, the sheriff summoned the jurors within twenty feet of the courthouse, which was situated in an uninclosed public square used as an open market and public resort. It was held

YEAR—(As to estates for years, or estates from year to year, see LANDLORD AND TENANT, vol. 12, p. 658; and as to computation of time, see TIME, vol. 26, p. 1).—The period in which the revolution of the earth around the sun, and the accompanying changes in the order of nature, are completed. Generally, when a statute speaks of a year, twelve calendar and not lunar months are intended. The year is either astronomical, ecclesiastical or regular, beginning on the first of January, or the 25th of March, or the day of the sovereign's accession.¹

that the uninclosed square was not the courthouse yard. Matthews v. State, 6 Tex. App. 23.

English Statute.—A yard for bonding foreign timber, in which there were a deal shed and two buildings, with saw pits, is held not to be a yard within the English Commercial Ry. Act (Stone v. Commercial R. Co., 9 Sim. 621).

Conveyance.—The parcels in a conveyance were described by reference to colored parts of a plan. A yard, delineated but not colored in the plan, was held to pass under the general word "yards." Willis v. Watney, 51 L. J. Ch. 181.

1. Wharton's Law Dictionary, citing Bishop of Peterborough v. Catesby, Cro. Jac. 166.

Whether Year Is Equivalent to Year of Our Lord.—In Com. v. McLoon, 5 Gray (Mass.) 91; 66 Am. Dec. 354, it was held that an indictment which stated the year of the commission of the offense in figures only, without prefixing the letters "A. D.," was insufficient.

But this rule has been changed by statute in many states. Thus, in State v. Bartlett, 47 Me. 392, it is said: "It is objected that the complaint, which described the offense as having been committed in the year 'eighteen hundred and fifty nine,' is defective, in that it does not state in what era this year occurred. Under the authority cited by the defendant, Com. v. McLoon, 5 Gray (Mass.) 91; 66 Am. Dec. 354, this defect would be deemed fatal. But by chapter 1, section 4, clause 11, Rev. Stat., it is provided that the word 'year,' used for a date, means the year of our Lord. This cures that defect." And see 1st Stimson's American Statute Law, p. 139; Com. v. Doran, 14 Gray (Mass.) 37; Com. v. Sullivan, 14 Gray (Mass.) 97.

Whether Calendar Year.—A year, unless from the context or otherwise a different intent is gathered, is generally construed to mean a calendar year. Fretwell v. McLemore, 52 Ala. 145; Owen v. Slatter, 26 Ala. 549; 62 Am. Dec. 745; Bishop of Peterborough v. Catesby, Cro. Jac. 166; Engleman v. State, 2 Ind. 91; 52 Am. Dec. 494; U. S. v. Dickson, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 162.

The meaning of the term, however, must be determined from the connection in which it is used. Knode v. Baldridge, 73 Ind. 54; Thornton v. Boyd, 25 Miss. 598.

Thus, where there was a contract to sell all fruits which might be raised during a certain year on a certain farm, and a portion of the purchase price was to be paid "when the crop is taken off at the end of the year," it was held that by the end of the year was meant end of the fruit season. Brown v. Anderson, 77 Cal. 238. And where applied to matters of revenue there is a presumption in favor of referring the word year to the fiscal year. Glasgow v. Rouse, 43 Mo. 479.

And so, where an officer is elected to fill the term of one year, this has been held to mean from the time the officer is chosen until the next election. Paris v. Hiram, 12 Mass. 262.

Term of Years.—(See also LANDLORD AND TENANT, vol. 12, p. 688).—Where a statute imposes additional punishment upon a second conviction and sentence for a term of years, that expression includes sentences for life. Com. v. Evans, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 448.

2. Indictment.—A description, in an indictment for larceny, of the property stolen as a "yearling" was held insufficient in Stollenwerk v. State, 55 Ala. 142. The court said: "Any animal in the second year of its growth is a 'yearling.' The description in the present indictment is too indefinite. It may include many animals, for the stealing of which the act of February 20, 1875, YIELD.—See note 1.

YIELDING AND PAYING.—These are the words used at the beginning of the reddendum clause of a lease in reference to the rent payable under the lease. No special form of words is, however, essential.²

does not provide. If the indictment had charged that the animal stolen, describing it, was 'an animal of the cow kind,' it would have been sufficient. Nor is the indictment a sufficient charge of petit larceny. The animal may have been one which had no recognized money value. The motion in arrest of judgment should have been sustained."

But in Berryman v. State, 45 Tex. 1, it was held an indictment for theft of "a bull yearling" is sufficient under the statutes for theft of cattle. The court said: "As understood in common language, a 'yearling' comes under the denomination of cattle, and is so classed in other statutes for the protection of cattle."

1. In Struthers v. Clark, 30 Pa. St. 213, it was said that the word yield implies a natural accretion from the business of a company.

2. Abbott's Law Dictionary.

The words "yielding" and "paying" make an implied covenant only, and the lessee is not liable, therefore, for rent after he has assigned his term. Kimpton v. Walker, 9 Vt. 191.

3. Exemptions.—In Mallory v. Berry, 16 Kan. 294, it was held that an unbroken steer was exempt from execution under a statute exempting one yoke of oxen. The court said: "The expression 'yoke of oxen,' as used in an exemption statute, does not necessarily imply cattle already broke to work. If they are cattle intended by the owner for use as work cattle, and old enough to be so used, it seems to us that they are fairly within the purview of the statute. A 'horse' is exempt; but at what particular age an animal ceases to be a colt and becomes a horse, is not specified in the statute. Is he considered to be a colt, whatever his age, until broke to saddle or harness? Or does he become a horse as soon as broke, no matter how young? One fair test, it would seem, is that he is old enough to be worked, and bought or raised by the owner therefor. We find several decisions in other states which throw light on this case. In Carruth v. Grassie, 11 Gray (Mass.) 211; 71 Am. Dec. 707, under a statute exempting a cow, a heifer only twenty months old, and not giving milk for more than a year thereafter, was held to be exempt, it appearing that the owner was raising it for his family cow. Under a like statute, in Dow v. Smith, 7 Vt. 465; 29 Am. Dec. 202, a heifer, forward with calf, was declared exempt; and later, by the same court, in Freeman v. Carpenter, 10 Vt. 433; 33 Am. Dec. 210, a heifer not with calf was also adjudged exempt. In Mundell v. Hammond, 40 Vt. 641, two calves, less than a year old, were held to be exempt under a statute exempting a yoke of oxen or steers. See also, construing exemption statutes, Harthouse v. Rikers, 1 Duer (N. Y.) 606; Wolfenbarger v. Standifer, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 659. Under the ruling of the district court, a poor man, unable to purchase a yoke of oxen already broken and trained to work, who should purchase a couple of young, unbroken cattle, although old enough to be worked, intending to break them himself and thus save that expense, could not hold them exempt, while his more prosperous neighbor, who can afford to pay the added cost of breaking, buys a yoke of cattle already broken, and holds them against his creditors. This does not seem like carrying out the spirit of the exemption law, which was intended for the benefit of the poor man, and should be so construed as to secure protection to those most in need of it." See also Wolfenbarger v. Standifer, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 659; Bowzey v. Newbegin, 48 Me. 410.

4. When a fund is left in trust to support a school for "youths," the proceeds may be spent to support a school for both sexes, and the trustees are not bound to carry on the school for boys alone. Nelson v. Cushing, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 519.
